(Supreme Court of California. May 22, 1896.)

PERJURY — EVIDENCE — INDICTMENT—ALLEGATION AND PROOF—VARIANCE.

1. A person cannot be convicted of perjury for having falsely sworn, in qualifying as surety on a bail bond, that he was the owner of certain real estate, where the evidence merely proves that title to the property was in another person at a date more than a year prior to defendant's affidavit of ownership, but does not show who had title when such affidavit was made.

2. Where the indictment charges defendant with perjury committed in qualifying as surety on the bail bond of a person held to answer for the crime of grand larceny, and the evidence shows that such person was in fact arrested, examined, and held on a charge of robbery, the variance is fatal.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Carroll Cook, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

HENSHAW, J. Defendant was indicted for and convicted of the crime of perjury. It was charged that, in qualifying as a surety upon the bail bond of one Kate Farley, who had been held to answer upon a charge of grand larceny, the defendant falsely swore that he was the owner of a certain piece of real property in the city and county of San Francisco.

1. Upon the trial evidence was introduced which traced the record title to the property into one Hilda Strassman more than a year before the date of the alleged perjury. Here the evidence of ownership came to an end. No witnesses were called to prove, and no other evidence was introduced to show, who was the owner or in possession of the property at the time when defendant made affidavit to his ownership. Hilda Strassman was not called as a witness, and there was not even the negative evidence of her testimony that she had not conveyed to the defendant or to another the title which had vested in her. That a conviction of perjury cannot be supported upon such insufficient and incomplete evidence does not admit of discussion. The only argument advanced by the people is that, having shown title in Hilda Strassman more than a year before the date of the alleged crime, the law presumes that she continued to own it until the defendant overcomes the presumption. But all such disputable presumptions give way before the presumption of innocence, which belongs of right to every defendant, and which remains with him until the prosecution by convincing proof has established his guilt. As is said in People v. Douglass, 100 Cal. 1, 34 Pac. 490, there cannot be two presumptions in a criminal case. In the recent case of Hunter v. Hunter, 43 Pac. 756, this court considered at some length the question of conflicting presumptions, and quoted with approval from Matthews on Presumptive Evidence: "A charge of an act of immorality or of disobedience of a positive law will not be received, unless supported by direct evidence. Circumstances showing probability merely are not enough. The fact averred must be conclusively proven."

2. While the indictment charged the defendant with having committed perjury in justifying upon the bail bond of Kate Farley, held for trial for grand larceny, and while the recital in the bail bond itself was that Kate Farley had been committed for trial for the crime of grand larceny, the evidence, and all the evidence, showed that, in fact, Kate Farley had been arrested, examined, and held to answer for the crime of robbery. So far as the proofs disclose, she was not under arrest for grand larceny, or for any other crime saving that of robbery. Kate Farley, then being in custody for robbery, would not be entitled to her liberty upon the bail bond given, and it was mere negligence upon the part of the officer having her in charge to release her. There was no justification, in law or in fact, for her enlargement upon the robbery charge under the bond reciting the separate and distinct crime of grand larceny. The materiality of defendant's false oath is shown by the fact, pleaded in the indictment, that it was given in the course of judicial proceedings pending against Kate Farley. Upon the trial there was no evidence offered to substantiate these averments. No showing is made that proceedings upon a charge of grand larceny are or have been pending against her, and the proof is limited to the establishment of a fact at total variance with the charge in the indictment, namely, that the proceedings against Kate Farley were for the crime of robbery. "In respect to records," says Wharton (Cr. Ev. § 115), "great care is necessary, as any variance at common law is fatal. Thus, at common law, if the whole record to which perjury is incidental is not accurately set forth, there must be an acquittal." The question, then, resolves itself to this: The indictment charged the perjury to have been committed in the course of the proceedings had in the matter of the proceedings against Kate Farley for the crime of grand larceny. It was a necessary averment to show the materiality of the false oath. The matter was one of record. The record was or should have been before the officer who drew the indictment. Upon the trial no effort is made to support this averment, and the prosecution rested its case upon evidence of record proceedings in another and different case. The averment being material, the variance between it and the proof is fatal; or, even if the designation of the crime by any possible stretch of the rule could be considered as descriptive matter, still it, having been pleaded, must be proved as laid. Bish. New Cr. Proc. § 488, subd. 2. So plainly marked is the variance that the facts themselves foreclose the need of discussion. But in illustration of the principles enunciated, and of their application to cases where the failure or omission has been much less conspicuous than that under review, may be instanced, generally, the cases of People v. Coon, 45 Cal. 672; People v. Cox, 40 Cal. 275; Moore v. State, 12 Ohio St. 387; State v. Crogan, 8 Iowa, 523; Chute v. State, 19 Minn. 271 (Gil. 230); while bearing specifically upon the question of perjury are those of State v. Bailey, 31 N. H. 521; State v. Tappan, 21

N. H. 56; Brown v. State, 47 Ala. 47; Com. v. Monohan, 9 Gray, 119; U. S. v. Bowman, 2 Wash. C. C. 328, Fed. Cas. No. 14,631.

It is unnecessary to discuss any of the other points presented by appellant. The judgment is reversed.

GIBSON v. STERLING FURNITURE CO.

(S. F. 9.)[1]

APPEAL—REVIEW—EVIDENCE—MASTER AND SERVANT—PERSONAL INJURIES.

1. A verdict based on conflicting testimony will not be disturbed, though the number of witnesses testifying in appellant's behalf on the issue in question are much greater in number.

2. Where, in an action by a servant, a child 11 years of age, against his master, for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant in ordering plaintiff to clean a dangerous machine while in motion, defendant claims that the machine was at rest when plaintiff was ordered to clean it, and that it was started by plaintiff in disobedience of orders, an instruction as to the effect of the negligence of a fellow servant of plaintiff is properly refused, as impertinent.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, City and County of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by John T. Gibson, by guardian, etc., against the Sterling Furniture Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. J. & J. H. Moore and Smith & Murasky, for appellant. H. H. Davis and Dunne & McPike, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. The plaintiff, a lad of 11 years, while in the employment of the defendant, in its furniture factory, was set to the task of cleaning the rollers of a sandpapering machine, and while thus engaged, the machine being at the time in motion, one of his hands was caught by the sandpaper drum, which was revolving at a high rate of speed, and badly lacerated, torn, and otherwise injured to such an extent as to leave plaintiff permanently maimed. He brought this action to recover for the injury, alleging, in substance, negligence of defendant in putting him at a dangerous task, without knowledge or experience on his part of the dangers incident thereto, and without warning thereof by defendant, or instruction as to how to avoid such dangers. He recovered a verdict, and defendant appeals from the judgment entered thereon, and from an order denying a new trial.

It is very strenuously urged by defendant that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict. But we find absolutely nothing in the record to support such claim. No motion was made for a nonsuit, nor is it now pretended that there was not evidence, on behalf of plaintiff, tending, in legal effect, to make out a case; but it is contended that "the testimony of defendant's ten witnesses overwhelms in toto that of plaintiff," and that the preponderance of defendant's evidence over that of plaintiff made the latter "legally incredible." Without reciting the evidence in detail, which would subserve no useful purpose, it is only necessary to say that there is nothing in the essential nature of the evidence as it appears in the record, with the manner and bearing of the witnesses lacking, to disclose any necessary preponderance in favor of defendant; nor is there anything inherently or otherwise so improbable in the character of the evidence on behalf of plaintiff as to render it legally incredible, or which tends to deny it the effect, which we think it clearly has, of creating a substantial conflict. It is true that defendant's witnesses greatly exceeded in number those of plaintiff, and there was a very sharp and decided conflict between the two as to the facts; but, however great the disparity, mere preponderance in number of witnesses, of itself, cannot of course control the finding of the jury. Much less can it affect our consideration in determining if the verdict finds support in the evidence. Notwithstanding the disparity in this instance, not only did the jury choose to give credence to the plaintiff's evidence, but the action of the judge in denying a new trial must, for the purposes of this review, be implicitly regarded as indicating a like view by the latter, since, had his judgment been otherwise, it would have been his duty to grant a new trial. In such a case, under well-settled principles, we would not be justified in saying, even if we regarded the evidence as strongly preponderating in defendant's favor, that the verdict is not supported by the evidence.

It is claimed that there was error in the refusal of the trial judge to give certain instructions, requested by defendant, designed to submit to the jury the rule that a master is not liable when the injury is suffered through the negligence of a fellow servant. But there was no such issue or question in the case under the pleadings, nor, as we regard it, any evidence to which such principle was pertinent. The theory of plaintiff's case, as we have indicated, was that the injury resulted from the defendant's putting plaintiff at work about a dangerous machine, with which he was not familiar, while the same was in motion, and the failure of defendant to properly warn and instruct him as to the dangers involved in the task he was required to perform; while that of the defendant was that neither it nor any of its employés other than plaintiff himself was in any way negligent or responsible for the injury, but that, when plaintiff was set at work cleaning the machine, it had been wholly stopped, and was not in motion, and that there was no danger whatsoever attendant upon plaintiff's work while the machine remained in that condition, and that the accident and injury occurred solely "from a freak of willful, unforeseen, and reckless disobedience on plaintiff's part in putting on the motion gearing and removing the safeguard to said machine." The fact that plaintiff was directed by defendant to perform the task in question was not denied; the only material issue being whether or not he was set at work while the machine was in motion, and so dangerous without knowledge on his part of such dangers, or proper warning by defendant to enable him to avoid them. This issue in no way involved the principle which it is sought to have submitted to the jury. If there was negligence in the particular involved in that issue, it was the negligence of the master, and for which he is responsible, notwithstanding the immediate instrumentality through which such negligence occurred was the act of a fellow employé of the plaintiff. Ingerman v. Moore, 90 Cal. 410, 27 Pac. 306. Under the pleadings, therefore, and evidence, the instructions in question were properly refused. Conlin v. Railroad Co., 36 Cal. 404. The refusal of the other requested instructions involves no error. So far as they were pertinent to the evidence, and were correct expositions of the law, they were sufficiently covered by the instructions given.

[1] Rehearing denied.

We discover no error in the rulings of the court on questions of evidence. Nor do we think the court abused its discretion in denying defendant's motion for a new trial. There is no such showing of accident or surprise as should be required to invoke the favorable consideration of a court and induce it to set aside a verdict. As to the ground of newly-discovered evidence, the showing wholly fails to disclose a requisite degree of diligence, assuming that the evidence can be regarded as of a character likely to produce a different result upon another trial, which to our minds is not obvious. The judgment and order are affirmed.

JOHN A. ROEBLING'S SONS CO. v. BUTLER. (S. F. 129.)

CORPORATIONS—LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS—PLEADING.

In an action against a stockholder for his proportionate share of a corporate debt, it must be alleged in the complaint what the whole number of subscribed shares was, the liability of the stockholder being dependent upon the proportion which his own holding bears to the total number of subscribed shares; and, in default of such allegation, the complaint is subject to a general demurrer.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by John A. Roebling's Sons Company against C. C. Butler and another. Defendant Butler interposed a general demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled; and, upon failure to answer, judgment was rendered for plaintiff. Defendant Butler appeals. Reversed.

Rodgers & Paterson, for appellant. Wall J. Tuska, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The trial court overruled defendant's general demurrer to plaintiff's complaint. Defendant refusing to answer, judgment against him was entered. From this judgment he appeals.

The plaintiff, a creditor of the S. S. Construction Company, a corporation, sought to charge defendant, as a stockholder thereof, for his proportionate share of the debt. The complaint averred the amount of capital stock of the defendant corporation, and the number of shares into which it was divided. It likewise averred ownership in defendant of a certain specified number of shares of this stock during the period within which the liability was created. But it did no more than this. It did not allege, nor can it be determined from the complaint, what the total number of the subscribed shares actually was, nor what proportion the holding of this defendant bore to the total amount of subscribed stock. As the number of individual stockholders' shares is to the whole number of subscribed shares, so is his proportion of the debt to the total amount of the debt. Unless, therefore, these three known factors are pleaded,—namely, the number of the stockholders' shares, the total of the subscribed shares, and the amount of the debt,—it is impossible from the complaint to determine what amount of liability is sought to be charged against a stockholder. This is so plain that it is conceded by respondent, but it insists that the admitted defect in the complaint is one which cannot be reached by general demurrer, but is subject to attack by special demurrer only. The precise question arose in Bidwell v. Babcock, 87 Cal. 29, 25 Pac. 752, where this court said that the averment of these elements is essential to the statement of a cause of action. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to sustain defendant's demurrer.

In re BLYTHE'S ESTATE. (S. F. 185.)

COURTS—PROBATE JURISDICTION—CONCLUSIVENESS OF JUDGMENT AGAINST CLAIMANT.

By Code Civ. Proc. § 1664, the superior court is given jurisdiction of proceedings to ascertain and determine the heirship, ownership, and interest of all parties in and to the property of a decedent, and the interest of each respective claimant thereto; and where any claimant in such proceedings is adjudged to have no interest in an estate, and the judgment is affirmed on appeal, it constitutes an adjudication which concludes the claimant from any further participation in matters connected with the estate, and from questioning any further action of the court therein.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Proceedings in the matter of the estate of Thomas H. Blythe, deceased. From an order denying the Blythe Company a new trial, it appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. W. Towle, Jr., for appellant. W. H. H. Hunt, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal by the Blythe Company from the order denying it a new trial in the matter of the application of Florence Blythe Hinckley for a decree of partial distribution of the estate of Thomas H. Blythe, deceased. The said company was a party to the proceedings instituted under section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and appealed from the judgment and decree of the court rendered therein, and also from the order of the court denying it a new trial. Both of these appeals were here determined adversely to appellant's contention. Blythe v. Ayres, 102 Cal. 254, 36 Pac. 522.

The stress of appellant's argument in this case is an attack upon the former decisions of this court rendered in the matter of said estate, and it is here contended that this court, in those decisions, has given an unwarrantable construction and interpretation to section 1387 of the Civil Code, and has denied to the cases of In re Sanford's Estate, 4 Cal. 12, and Pina v. Peck, 31 Cal. 359, the weight which is due them as authority. The question thus presented was fully and elaborately argued before the court upon the former Blythe appeals, and the conclusions reached and expressed in Blythe v. Ayres, 96 Cal. 532, 31 Pac. 915, and 102 Cal. 262, 36 Pac. 522, were arrived at only after most painstaking and careful consideration by the court, and were concurred in by all the justices then qualified to act. If, after such consideration and determination, we were inclined to consider the question anew, there is an insurmountable objection to doing so in this appeal. The Blythe Company, as has been said, was one of the parties to the original proceeding, wherein, by the finding and decree of the court, it was adjudged that the predecessors of appellant company were not of kin to Blythe. The company having attacked the soundness of this finding upon direct appeal, and the judgment and decree made against it by the trial court having been here affirmed, it would seem that in all proceedings subsequent thereto the Blythe Company would stand as a stranger in interest to the estate of the deceased, and would not, therefore, be entitled to oppose or contest any proceedings had therein. But to this appellant answers that the duty and power of the court, under section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure, were limited to adjudicating kinship to the deceased, where such kinship, if it existed, would make the claimant an heir, and that the court, therefore, had no right or power to decide and declare that other claimants were not of kin, or that other claimants were of kin, but not of such kin as to entitle them to succession. But this is entirely too narrow a construction to be put upon the section. The section declares that the court, after indicated proceedings, acquires jurisdiction to ascertain and determine the heirship, ownership, and interest of all parties in and to the property of the deceased, and that, upon the trial of the issues, the court shall determine the heirship to said deceased, the ownership of his estate, and the interest of each respective claimant thereto and therein. By this section a claimant is not entitled to be heard at all unless he claims to be of such kin as would entitle him to succession. The court acquires jurisdiction to determine, and it is made its duty to determine, not alone the heirship to said deceased, but the interest of each respective claimant to his estate. That this may and should properly be done by a decree establishing the degrees of kinship or relation in which the separate claimants stood to the deceased does not admit of debate; and, where a claimant is found to bear no kinship whatsoever to the deceased, a finding and judgment to that effect is properly within the jurisdiction of the court, and within the issues to be determined. The section declares that the final determination of the court shall be final and conclusive in the distribution of said estate, and in regard to the title to all the property of the estate. To the proceedings which terminated in the original decree, this plaintiff was a party. It endeavored unsuccessfully, upon direct appeal, to overcome and destroy that judgment. It failed in that attempt, and, so far as further proceedings in this estate are concerned, it is concluded by it. The order appealed from is affirmed.

AH TONG v. EARL FRUIT CO. (Sac. 2.)

Assumpsit—Instructions—Opinion Evidence—Relevancy—Custom—Books of Account—Witness—Impeachment—Joinder of Parties.

1. In an action to recover for fruit sold under guaranty, where the quantity shipped to defendant was in issue, and it appeared that defendant had packed the fruit in what were called "40-pound boxes," the testimony of witnesses engaged in packing fruit was properly admitted to show that such boxes, if well packed, would hold more than 40 pounds.

2. It was not prejudicial error for the court, in charging the jury, to refer to the testimony showing the capacity of the boxes to be more than 40 pounds in more positive terms than to the testimony showing the capacity to be less.

3. Plaintiff having delivered the fruit in bulk, and having had nothing to do with the packing, it was not error to refuse to charge the jury that, if the fruit was received and sold by the box, plaintiff should be credited only at the rate of 40 pounds per box.

4. In an action to recover for fruit sold on guaranty as to price, a former employé of defendant testified as to declarations of defendant's manager regarding a guaranty he had made to plaintiff. Defendant moved to strike out the testimony as irrelevant, on the ground that it referred to another transaction. The witness could not fix the date, but thought he could from certain memoranda which he did not then have with him. Held, that the court had a right to assume that the relevancy would be shown upon the recall of the witness, and defendant having failed to recall the witness for cross-examination, he cannot assign the refusal to strike out as error.

5. The contract under which plaintiff claimed having been express, testimony on the part of defendant as to a custom relating to the subject-matter thereof was inadmissible.

6. It was not competent for the defendant to attempt to impeach the memory of a witness by the testimony of others to the effect that he was a person of weak memory.

7. In an action to recover for fruit sold under a guaranty as to price, clear of expenses, where the defendant pleaded as a counterclaim certain expenses he had paid, an instruction that, if the jury found that the contract of guaranty had been made as alleged, they would find for the plaintiff, and, if they found no such guaranty, they should find for defendant, allowing him for his expenses incurred in marketing the fruit, was a fair statement of the issue.

8. It was error to allow the cashier of a bank to testify that the books of the bank showed that, on a certain date, the bank had cashed a check drawn by defendant in favor of plaintiff, witness having no independent recollection of the fact; but as there was no dispute as to the fact that the check was delivered to plaintiff on or before that date, the time of payment was immaterial, and the error without prejudice.

9. An objection that the plaintiff had a partner interested in the demand sued upon who was not joined in the action, since it was not raised in the pleadings, cannot be raised for the first time on appeal.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by Ah Tong against the Earl Fruit Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank H. Short, for appellant. H. Welch, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Plaintiff, a Chinese, early in August, 1893, delivered a quantity of pears to defendant, a corporation, to be sold upon commission. He alleged, in his complaint, that defendant, as part of its contract with him, guarantied to him a net return of $15 per ton for the pears; that he delivered 134,190 pounds of the fruit to defendant, and was entitled to receive therefor, at the rate guarantied, the sum of $1,006.44; that defendant paid only the sum of $550, leaving a balance due of $456.44, for which he sues. Defendant denied the guaranty, and set up, as a counterclaim, that the $550 paid by it to plaintiff was merely an advance on his fruit; that the net proceeds of sale were less than that sum; that plaintiff is indebted to it for the excess advanced to him, as well as for expense of packing the fruit, freights on same, etc., to the amount of $1,257.53, for which it demanded judgment. An issue was also made on the quantity of fruit delivered by plaintiff. Plaintiff obtained a verdict and judgment for $389.33.

Defendant packed the pears in boxes, called "40-pound boxes," and shipped them by rail to the east for sale,—six car loads in all, of 497 boxes each. Several witnesses, who had been engaged more or less in the business of packing fruit, testified their opinion that the boxes, if well packed, held about 40 pounds each. Appellant attacks this evidence at almost every conceivable point; but the chief objection seems to be that the issue did not admit of such proof, and that the witnesses were not shown to be sufficiently skilled to justify the reception of their opinions. The question was as to the number of tons within the alleged guaranty. The number of boxes was known, but there had been no actual weighing nor agreement that the fruit should be measured by the nominal capacity of the boxes. Such capacity was, therefore, fairly a subject for estimation. Frey v. Lowden, 70 Cal. 550, 11 Pac. 838; Water Co. v. Standart, 97 Cal. 476, 32 Pac. 532. It appears that defendant made no objection at the trial to the competency of the witnesses to estimate the weight of fruit in the boxes, and it cannot be urged for the first time on appeal. Brumley v. Flint, 87 Cal. 471, 25 Pac. 683. It is said that plaintiff did not prove the boxes to be well packed. This fact, however, was fully established by the testimony of witnesses produced by defendant.

Among the instructions of the court to the jury was this: "As to the weight of those boxes, gentlemen, you are to determine. Some of the witnesses swore,—one swore from 42 to 45 pounds; that was Mr. Oluffs; Mr. Romain about 45; Mr. Clark about 42; Mr. Hodge, I think he said about 40 pounds." Hodge was a witness for defendant. It is argued, now, that such instruction was erroneous, in that the court spoke less positively of the testimony of Hodge than that of Oluffs, Clark, and Romain, who were called by plaintiff; that Hodge had better opportunity for judging of the weight of the pears, by reason of actual observation while the packing and shipping of the same was going forward, and that his testimony should not have been classed with that of the other witnesses, who gave estimates only of the contents of similar boxes; that the witnesses for plaintiff had not testified at all to the weight of "these boxes,"—the boxes which actually contained plaintiff's pears,—but only as to the weight of such boxes well packed; that Romain's estimate was 44, and not 45, pounds, as stated in the instruction; that certain qualifications of the testimony were not stated; and that the court omitted to state the evidence upon this subject of some other witnesses for defendant. Other objections are taken which we need not specify. This criticism is rather more fastidious than just. There is no doubt on the evidence that the boxes concerning which plaintiff's witnesses gave their opinions were of the same kind and size as those in which the pears were shipped. The qualifications of the testimony which the court did not state related chiefly to the packing weight of large and small pears; there being evidence that the pears of plaintiff were of large size, and most, if not all, of the witnesses being of opinion that the boxes would contain a less weight of such pears as compared with smaller. The testimony of other witnesses for defendant, not stated by the court, was that of witness Pfluger, that the net weight of the boxes was about 40 pounds, and that of witness Gifford, that the average net weight of fruit in such boxes is from 40 to 45 pounds. While we see nothing in the instruction which could have aided the jury in their deliberation, we also fail to see how the jury could have been influenced to defendant's prejudice by either its contents or its omissions. Obviously, the court was not attempting a summary of the evidence on the point in contemplation, but rather to illustrate the diversity of opinion among the witnesses which rendered necessary the exercise of discretion by the jury. If defendant desired greater fullness, it might have requested the statement of additional particulars.

Defendant requested an instruction to the effect that, if the pears were received and sold by the box, "and if such boxes were such as are customarily bought and sold as 40-pound boxes, and were so received and sold by defendant, plaintiff is not entitled to be credited for any more than 40 pounds per box." This instruction was properly refused. Had its bearing been restricted to the counterclaim set up by defendant, it would, perhaps, have been unobjectionable. Not being so restricted, its tendency was to mislead. Plaintiff delivered the pears in bulk, and he had nothing to do with the boxing. If there was a guaranty at all it was of a certain sum per ton, and there is no evidence that it had reference to any conventional ton of more or less than 2,000 pounds.

One Polkinghorne, formerly an employé of defendant, called as a witness for plaintiff, gave testimony of the declarations of Pfluger, defendant's managing agent, about a guaranty of $15 per ton on fruit he (Pfluger) had made to "the Chinaman" at Los Palmas,—the place where plaintiff's pears were,—in the month of August, 1893. Defendant claimed that the declarations really had reference to an outright purchase of fruit, which it made of plaintiff about August 29, 1893, and moved the court to strike out the evidence as irrelevant. It seems to have been the opinion of the court that its relevancy was to be determined by the time when Polkinghorne began work for defendant, whether about August 1st or later in the month, and as to this his testimony was confused. The court declined to pass on the motion then, the witness thinking he might discover such date by going home. At the same time defendant was informed that it would have opportunity to further cross-examine him. In fact, Polkinghorne was not recalled, and no ruling was made on the motion. If it appeared that defendant's motion was well grounded when Polkinghorne left the witness stand, the failure of the court to rule on the same before the submission of the case was error; but, from a careful reading of all the testimony of Polkinghorne, we are satisfied that the court could not justly assume that it was irrelevant to the issue on trial, however mistaken he may have been as shown by other evidence. Further cross-examination might have shown the motion to be proper; but, if defendant desired this, it should have demanded the recall of the witness.

The testimony of Pfluger, testifying as plaintiff's witness, to the effect that he bought fruit from plaintiff about August 29th, and paid for the same, and that he took no fruit from plaintiff, to sell on commission, except that in controversy, was properly admitted as tending in some degree to show that the declarations mentioned by Polkinghorne referred to the guaranty alleged by plaintiff. That the "fruit" referred to by Polkinghorne and Pfluger was pears, and that plaintiff was "the Chinaman" they had in mind, sufficiently appears from Pfluger's statement, on cross-examination, that the pears of which he spoke to Polkinghorne were those he bought and paid plaintiff for on August 29th.

Defendant sought in various ways to introduce evidence of its habits of business, and that it was usual for growers to pay the expense of getting their fruit to its packing house at Fresno, etc.; but, as the contract between the parties was express, and did not rest in implication or presumption, and it was not shown that they dealt with reference to such customs, the evidence was properly excluded. Burns v. Sennett, 99 Cal. 371, 33 Pac. 916.

One Davis testified for plaintiff. Defendant endeavored to prove by another witness that Davis was a person of weak memory. The court rightly rejected the evidence. The memory of a witness not affected by mental derangement is not to be impeached by other witnesses in order to disparage his testimony. It must be done by cross-examination. Goodwyn v. Goodwyn, 20 Ga. 600; Bell v. Rinner, 16 Ohio St. 45; 1 Whart. Ev. 567a.

Defendant asked the witness Pfluger, testifying in its behalf, whether the expenses of getting pears from the orchard at Los Palmas to Fresno were paid by plaintiff or defendant. An objection by plaintiff to the question was sustained; but the witness afterwards testified fully to the effect that defendant paid the same, and the error, if any, was cured. Defendant argues that the court, by its instructions, took these charges from the consideration of the jury. The record hardly bears out the contention. Plaintiff alleged, in his complaint, a guaranty by defendant of $15 net per ton for the fruit, defendant to bear all expenses. The court told the jury, in effect, that, if they found that such a contract had been made by defendant, then they would find for plaintiff the price of the pears at that date, deducting only the sum of $550 already received by him; but it also told them that, if they found no such guaranty, then their verdict should be in defendant's favor "for the costs and expenses incurred by defendant in shipping and marketing said pears, and the moneys advanced by defendant to plaintiff, after deducting all sums received by defendant from the sale of said pears."

The cashier of a certain bank was permitted to state that the books of the bank showed that, on August 7, 1893, it cashed a check of $150 drawn by defendant in favor of plaintiff,—he having no independent recollection on the subject, and defendant objecting to the evidence as hearsay, incompetent, and immaterial. The witness did not profess to have had at any time personal knowledge of the matters recorded in the books, and we think the court erred in admitting the evidence; but we also think the error could have worked no injury to defendant. There is no dispute that the check was drawn on or about August 4th, and delivered to plaintiff on or before August 7th, and we perceive no consequence in the exact time of payment.

It is claimed that plaintiff should not recover because the evidence shows he had a partner who was interested with him in the demand sued upon, and who is not joined as a party to the action. Conceding that such was the evidence, yet, as the objection was not raised by the pleadings, it was waived. Williams v. Railroad Co. (Cal.) 42 Pac. 974.

Defendant had rendered a statement of account to plaintiff showing a considerable balance due from him as the result of the shipment and sale of the pears. Defendant requested an instruction based upon this as an account stated between the parties, qualified by the proposition that the jury should find that plaintiff made no objection to the correctness of the items in the statement. The court refused. There was no evidence on which to found the instruction. The testimony of Mr. Pfluger shows that plaintiff did object to the account rendered on the ground that a sum certain had been guarantied to him.

Certain instructions were asked by defendant, in order, we are informed by its brief, "to prevent the jury from being misled by statements of counsel for plaintiff in their closing arguments." They were refused by the court. The statements of counsel which may have made such instructions proper are not contained in the record, and it does not appear that for any other reason they were necessary. We therefore see no error in refusing them.

Some other points are made by appellant, but they need not be specially noticed. We have inquisitively examined them all, and find no legal ground for reversal. We recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

CRAIG v. HESPERIA LAND & WATER CO. (L. A. 2.)

CORPORATIONS—ASSESSMENTS—SUBSEQUENT TRANSFERS—COLLECTION OF LIEN.

1. A certificate of shares of stock in a corporation is merely evidence of the ownership of the shares, and the corporation's power to collect a delinquent assessment against such shares is not affected by the issuance of a new certificate and a transfer of the shares, but the new owner takes subject to the lien.

2. An owner's right to have his stock transferred, and a new certificate issued to the purchaser, is not defeated by the fact that there is an unpaid assessment against the shares.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by John W. Craig against the Hesperia Land & Water Company. From a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Geo. B. Cole and H. A. Barclay, for appellant. Graves, O'Melveny & Shankland, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Action for the conversion of stock in a corporation. Defendant is a corporation, organized under the laws of this state. On November 18, 1893, plaintiff was the owner of 50 shares of stock in the defendant corporation, represented by certificates Nos. 72 and 79, each for 25 shares. These certificates were in defendant's possession. On the day above mentioned, plaintiff, having agreed to sell 40 of said shares to one Kaelin, offered to indorse and deliver said certificates to the corporation, and demanded that 40 shares thereof be transferred to said Kaelin, and new certificates issued,—one to Kaelin for 40 shares, and one to himself for the remainder. This demand was refused, for reasons about which there was some controversy, though it is reasonably clear that the only reason given for not complying with the demand was that the stock was "in litigation." On November 20th, two days after the demand, this action was brought. The defense to the action is based upon the claim that the stock in question is liable for certain unpaid assessments. The court refused all the instructions requested by the plaintiff, and instructed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant. This appeal is from the judgment and an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

A chronological statement of the assessments made and of the holdings of the shares in question will simplify the facts and the questions made. In 1890 an informal or voluntary call was made of $7 per share, and all the stockholders paid except Samuel Merrill, who then owned 50 shares, represented by certificate No. 26. On December 9, 1892, assessment No. 4 was made of $10 per share. This assessment was made to cover and include the voluntary assessment of $7 per share, Samuel Merrill not having paid his proportion, amounting to $350; the intention being to credit all the others with the voluntary payment, and requiring them to pay $3 per share in addition, and the Merrill stock to pay $10 per share. Prior to that assessment, on November 23, 1892, Samuel Merrill sold and transferred 25 shares of his stock to the plaintiff, John W. Craig, and 25 shares to J. H. Merrill, and certificate No. 71 was issued to Craig and certificate No. 72 was issued to J. H. Merrill. After that assessment became delinquent, Craig and Merrill brought an action to cancel said assessment No. 4, and obtained a restraining order to prevent the sale. Afterwards a nonsuit was granted in that action, and plaintiff's motion for a new trial thereof was denied on November 17, 1893. On September 20, 1893, at a delinquent sale under assessment No. 5, Merrill not having paid the assessment, Craig bought his stock, and a new certificate, numbered 79, was issued to plaintiff. On October 19, 1893, assessment No. 6 of $1 per share was ordered, to become delinquent November 17th, and the day of sale was fixed for December 6, 1893. This assessment was not paid by the plaintiff, and became delinquent the day before plaintiff's demand for the transfer of his stock was made, though it appears that plaintiff had no knowledge of that assessment until after this suit was commenced, when he received notice of the delinquency. He was not informed of it by the company when his demand was made, and the refusal to transfer the stock was then based upon the statement that the stock was "in litigation," referring to the suit of Craig and Merrill against the corporation to enjoin assessment No. 4. Assessment No. 4 upon certificates 71 and 72 remained unpaid at the commencement of this action, but, under a subsequent assessment, which was paid by 71, No. 72 was sold, and plaintiff became the purchaser, and a new certificate, No. 79, was issued to him; and it is conceded by the respondent that, as to the shares represented by that certificate, they were discharged as to assessment No. 4, so that that assessment now affects only 25 shares, while the last assessment, No. 6, affects the whole 50 shares. The record is silent as to any provision in the by-laws of the corporation affecting the question, nor is there any express provision of the statute permitting or prohibiting the transfer of certificates of stock upon the books of the corporation during delinquency; and the question to be determined is whether the corporation, by a transfer of plaintiff's shares after an assessment thereon became delinquent, affected its right to enforce its assessment against the shares so transferred?

Respondent contends, "that, after an assessment, and before delinquent sale, the assessment not having been paid, a transfer of delinquent shares to a stranger would entirely defeat the power or the authority of the corporation to collect its dues in the manner provided for in the Civil Code." In support of this contention counsel argue that "the corporation had a lien (or the equivalent of a lien, so far as holding appellant to his status as a book owner of the shares), which appellant could not defeat by diverting the shares into a new channel of ownership beyond the reach of the corporation." The lien, however, is upon the shares, and not upon the certificate. The certificate is merely evidence of ownership of the shares. When an old certificate is surrendered, and a new certificate is issued, the new certificate represents the same shares; but the shares themselves remain subject to any lien the corporation may have upon them, and the new owner takes subject to such lien. The identity of the stock is not affected by the transfer. Hawley v. Brumagim, 33 Cal. 394; Atkins v. Gamble, 42 Cal., at pages 99, 100. The keeping of a stock book, in which the original issue and all subsequent transfers must be entered, enables the holder or purchaser to trace his shares back to the original issue by the numbers of the different certificates, and thus identify the shares upon which any assessment has been made, and enables him to ascertain with certainty, in connection with the other records of the corporation relating to assessments and delinquent sales, whether his shares are free from liens or liability in favor of the corporation, and in the same manner enables the corporation to enforce its delinquent assessment upon the shares liable therefor, no matter how many transfers have been made subsequent to the assessment; each transferee taking the legal title, but subject to the assessment, just as the grantee of the legal title to land takes it subject to all valid recorded liens.

If respondent's contention is sound, it must follow that transfers upon the books must cease, when the assessment is made, for any or all of the shares assessed may become delinquent; and it would also follow that, if an assessment were made which stockholders generally regarded as illegal, and they should contest the same in the courts, they would be obliged, pending the litigation, however protracted it might be, either to hold their stock subject to all the liabilities of a "bookholder" until the end of the litigation, or pay an unjust or illegal assessment. Such ruling would improperly and unjustly interfere with the disposition of property by the owner, and would not add to the security of the corporation in the collection of delinquent assessments. A certificate of stock is not a negotiable instrument. Barstow v. Mining Co., 64 Cal. 388, 1 Pac. 349; Graves v. Mining Co., 81 Cal. 304, 22 Pac. 665; Swim v. Wilson, 90 Cal. 129, 27 Pac. 33. In analogy to other nonnegotiable instruments, a purchaser would take subject to all equities in favor of the corporation; but whether a transferee upon the books would take his stock discharged of any lien undisclosed by the corporation at the time of the transfer and the issuance of a new certificate, need not now be determined, nor do I think it was determined in the case of Craig v. Water Co., 107 Cal. 675, 40 Pac. 1057 (the pleadings in which case are set out in the record in this case), inasmuch as it may have been held in that case that the voluntary payment of $7 per share was regarded as an indebtedness of the corporation to the contributors, and that assessment No. 4 was made to meet that and other liabilities. If, then, the transfer of plaintiff's shares upon the books of the corporation, and the issuance of new certificates, would not have affected the power of the corporation to collect the delinquent assessment on such shares by a sale thereof, such delinquency did not justify the refusal to make the transfer, and plaintiff's objection to evidence of those facts set up in the answer, if offered as a full defense to the action, should have been sustained, though proof of the unpaid delinquent assessment would have been admissible as affecting the value of the stock; and it also follows that the court erred in instructing the jury to find for the defendant.

Water Co. v. Herberger, 82 Cal. 603, 23 Pac. 134, cited by respondent, sustains the views we have expressed. I can discover no difference between the right of a corporation to collect a valid assessment, and its right to collect a stipulated part of subscription to stock, nor how the nonpossession of the certificate affects that right in either case. In Mandlebaum v. Mining Co., 4 Mich. 465, cited by respondent, the question arose between a stockholder who had lost his certificate, to which was attached a blank power of attorney for its transfer signed by the original holder, of whom the loser purchased it, and the vendee of the finder, who had purchased it in good faith, and to whom the company issued a certificate after notice of the loss by the true owner. It was there held that the holder of a certificate so indorsed and transferred is entitled to the same rights respecting it, as against third parties, which the law confers upon the holder of commercial paper. It is obvious that a broad distinction exists between that case and this. The corporation there might well be estopped to deny the title of one to whom it transferred the stock after notice of the loss, but that does not touch the question of its right to enforce a delinquent assessment notwithstanding the transfer. In this state neither the finder of an indorsed certificate nor his vendee would acquire any right to the stock. Sherwood v. Mining Co., 50 Cal. 412.

The fact that plaintiff did not know of the assessment at the time he demanded the transfer, nor at the time suit was commenced, does not affect the validity of the assessment, nor the liability of the stock therefor; but it is evident that, if respondent's contention is sound, the holder of stock may not only be deprived of the benefit of an advantageous sale, which he would desire to make under any circumstances, but he would be denied the right to dispose of his stock to avoid personal liability for debts about to be incurred which he did not approve, and which, in his judgment, would be ruinous, not only to the corporation but to himself as a stockholder. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; BELCHER, C.

PELTON v. SAN JACINTO LUMBER CO. et al. (L. A. 77.)

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—MATERIAL ALTERATION—RELEASE OF SURETIES—CORPORATION MAKER.

1. Where a note is made in California, without designating a place of payment, and is indorsed by sureties, the subsequent insertion of "at Ilion National Bank, Ilion, N. Y.," written by the maker before delivery, is a material alteration, which releases the sureties; since without the alteration the note would have been payable only in California, under Civ. Code, §§ 1489, 3100.

2. The fact that the maker of a note was a corporation, and the indorsers stockholders therein, did not affect the liability of the latter as sureties.

3. The alteration of a note of a corporation by the president, who was authorized to negotiate a loan for the corporation, and secure the same by the note, with indorsers, was not available to the corporation as a defense.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by J. Rand Pelton against the San Jacinto Lumber Company and others on a note. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, certain defendants appeal. Reversed in part, and in part affirmed.

Wilson & Bulla, for appellants. Anderson & Anderson, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. This appeal is from a judgment on a promissory note made by the San Jacinto Lumber Company to the plaintiff, and alleged to have been indorsed by the other appellants, and by M. T. Winton and D. M. McDonald, who are also defend ants. The defense pleaded by appellants is that the note was materially altered without their knowledge or consent, after it was signed by the corporation and indorsed by the other appellants, but before delivery to plaintiff. The appeal is upon the judgment roll without a bill of exceptions, and the only matter in controversy is whether or not the findings of fact by the court warrant the judgment against appellants.

The pertinent facts found are substantially as follows: On May 21, 1890, the corporation defendant was about to obtain a loan of $2,100 from the plaintiff, who then resided in the state of New York, and, to secure the payment of such loan, was to make its promissory note, with indorsers. The note was drawn and signed at Los Angeles, Cal., May 1, 1890, by the corporation, through the agency of its president, M. T. Winton, and its secretary, F. M. Caswell, and immediately thereafter was indorsed by the appellants Caswell and Fuller, and left with the president, Winton, for the purpose of procuring additional indorsers. As thus signed by the corporation, and indorsed by Caswell and Fuller, the note was payable six months after date, but no place of payment was designated therein. Afterwards, in the absence of Caswell and Fuller, and without their knowledge or consent, Winton altered the note so as to make it payable "at the Ilion National Bank, Ilion, N. Y."; and, after being so altered, the note was indorsed by Winton and D. M. McDonald, and by them sent to plaintiff in New York, who thereupon loaned to the defendant said sum of $2,100, without notice of said alteration of the note. The note contained a clause requiring the payment of attorney's fees in case of suit thereon. All the indorsers of the note were stockholders in the corporation defendant, before and at the time each indorsed the note, but it does not appear how much stock either of them owned. At the maturity of the note, it was presented for payment at the Ilion bank, N. Y., and payment demanded, but was not paid, and thereupon was duly protested for nonpayment, of all which due notice was given to the indorsers. When the case came on to be tried, it was dismissed as against Winton, but for what reason does not appear; but a joint judgment was rendered against all the other defendants for the full amount of principal and interest of the note. The defendant McDonald has not appealed.

That the alteration of the note was material, and such as would discharge sureties, whether indorsers or guarantors, is unquestionable. Before the alteration, and as indorsed by Caswell and Fuller, the note, whether negotiable or not, was payable only in this state (Civ. Code, §§ 1489, 3100); but, after the alteration, it was payable only at a designated bank in the state of New York, unless the payee elected to accept payment elsewhere. Woodworth v. Bank, 19 Johns. 391, and notes to same case, 10 Am. Dec. 267; Pahlman v. Taylor, 75 Ill. 629; Morehead v. Bank, 5 W. Va. 74; Tied. Com. Paper, § 394; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 565; Brandt, Sur. §§ 381–390. These propositions, as general rules, are not controverted by counsel for respondent; but they contend that by reason of the circumstance that Caswell and Fuller were stockholders of the corporation defendant, and, by virtue of that relation, would be indirectly and incidentally benefited by the loan, they are not entitled to the favor accorded by law to uninterested sureties. But to this point they have cited no authority, and I have found none. Conceding that Caswell and Fuller were indirectly benefited, the benefit could have been only in proportion to the stock owned by them at the time of the loan, and to that extent they were made personally liable by force of section 322 of the Civil Code, independently of any contract. But they are not sued on their statutory liability. The pleadings do not show even that they were stockholders; and the mere finding that they were so is of no consequence in this action, since a judgment in their favor in this action cannot affect their statutory liability. They are sued on an alleged contract, which, according to the findings of fact, they never executed. The proposed contract indorsed by them was never completely executed for want of delivery to plaintiff. Brandt, Sur. § 388. It follows, I think, that the findings of fact do not warrant the judgment against either Caswell or Fuller.

But, as I read the findings, the president of the corporation was authorized to negotiate the loan, and to secure it by the corporation note, with indorsers; that, accordingly, he drew the note, and delivered it to the plaintiff in the form described in the complaint, that being an ordinary form; that the plaintiff accepted the note, and loaned the money to the corporation thereon in good faith;, and that the alteration complained of by the first indorsers was made by the agent of the corporation before delivery of the note to plaintiff. Upon this state of the facts, I think the alteration of the note is not available to the corporation as a defense to the action. I think the judgment against the San Jacinto Lumber Company should be affirmed, but, as against the defendants Caswell and Fuller, that it should be reversed; and that the court below should be instructed to modify the judgment accordingly.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment against the San Jacinto Lumber Company is affirmed, but as against the defendants Caswell and Fuller it is reversed; and the court below is instructed to modify the judgment accordingly.

McCARTHY v. BROWN. (S. F. 262.)

TRIAL BY THE COURT — FINDINGS OF LAW AND FACT—EJECTMENT—DEFENSES.

1. In ejectment, a finding that defendant "ousted the plaintiff" is sufficient, since the probative facts need not be stated.

2. A finding that, on a certain date, "defendant did oust and eject plaintiff from the possession of said lot, * * * and has ever since wrongfully and unlawfully withheld possession from plaintiff," is a sufficient finding of the fact of ouster, though placed under the heading "Conclusions of Law"; the use of the words "wrongfully and unlawfully," in describing the withholding, being harmless surplusage.

3. A tenant at will cannot defend an action of ejectment by his landlord on the ground that he had no notice to quit, where the answer expressly denies plaintiff's title, and sets up ownership in defendant.

4. Where the findings in ejectment show title in plaintiff, the right of present possession is presumed, as a matter of law.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Mariposa county; John M. Corcoran, Judge.

Ejectment by Caroline E. McCarthy against J. L. Brown. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. Trabucco and Jos. F. Peck, for appellant. J. H. Rogers and F. H. Gould, for respondent.

VAN CLIEF, C. Ejectment. Judgment for plaintiff. Appeal from judgment, on judgment roll. Appellant claims that the findings do not support the judgment, because: First. The finding (No. 16) that defendant "ousted the plaintiff" is a conclusion of law, in that it does not find the facts constituting the ouster. Second. That there is no finding "that plaintiff, at the time of commencing the suit, was entitled to the possession" of the demanded premises.

1. In the case of Smith v. Mohn, 87 Cal. 497, 25 Pac. 696, it was said: "They [findings] should be statements of the ultimate facts, and not of the probative facts. Mathews v. Kinsell, 41 Cal. 512." In Hihn v. Peck, 30 Cal. 286, the court said: "It has been uniformly held that it is not necessary for the court, in its findings, to present the results of last analysis; but, on the contrary, that it would be sufficient if the court found the facts entering as terms into the legal proposition upon which the prevailing party based his right of recovery. The 'facts' which the court is to find, and the 'facts' which a pleader is to state, lie, according to the decisions in this state, in the same plane; that is, in both connections, facts are to be stated according to their legal effect." In Murdock v. Clarke, 90 Cal. 435, 27 Pac. 275, the court said: "A finding which follows the pleading is sufficient. In this, as in other cases, it is sufficient to find the ultimate facts." Therefore, to determine the sufficiency of a finding of fact, it is only necessary to ascertain what statement of that fact is required in the pleading. In Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 243, the court said: "Now, what facts must be proved to recover in ejectment? These only: That the plaintiff is seised of the premises, or of some estate therein in fee, or for life, or for years, and that the defendant was in their possession at the commencement of the action. * * * It is the ultimate facts,—which could not be struck out of a pleading without leaving it insufficient,—and not the evidence of these facts, which must be stated." In Garrison v. Sampson, 15 Cal. 95, proof of holding over of premises by defendant was objected to by defendant, on the ground that such proof was inadmissible under the general allegation of the complaint, and could only be admitted under specific averment of the facts. The court, on appeal, said: "We do not think this point well taken. * * * A holding over by the defendant is, in effect, an ouster, and may be so charged." In Boles v. Cohen, 15 Cal. 151, the court said: "The complaint * * * distinctly alleges prior possession in the plaintiffs, and an entry and ouster by the defendants, and that the defendants are still in possession of the property. There can be no doubt of the sufficiency of these allegations." See, also, Boles v. Weifenback, Id. 144. While I think the ultimate fact of ouster is sufficiently expressed in finding No. 16, under the heading of "Facts," there can be no doubt that it is so in finding No. 6, under the heading of "Conclusions of Law," as follows: "That on December 11, 1890, defendant did oust and eject plaintiff from the possession of said lot 5, block 3, and has ever since wrongfully and unlawfully withheld said possession from plaintiff." Here the fact of ouster is distinctly expressed; and, as to the withholding of possession, the qualifying words "wrongfully and unlawfully" are harmless surplusage. The force of this finding, as a fact, is not impaired by its having been placed under the heading of "Conclusions of Law." Jones v. Clark, 42 Cal. 180; Burton v. Burton, 79 Cal. 490, 21 Pac. 847; Edwards v. Bank, 59 Cal. 149; Bath v. Valdez, 70 Cal. 355, 11 Pac. 724; Spargur v. Heard, 90 Cal. 228, 27 Pac. 198; Millard v. Supreme Council, 81 Cal. 343, 22 Pac. 864.

The court found, in effect, that the occupancy of the demanded premises by the defendant, up to August, 1890, was under and with the consent of the plaintiff. Appellant contends that this is a finding that defendant was a tenant at will, and that since there is no finding of service of notice in writing to remove from the premises, according to section 789 of the Civil Code, the tenancy was not terminated before the commencement of the action, and consequently plaintiff had no right to the possession. While it is the general rule that in actions between landlords and tenants at will, in order to give the former a right of action, notice to quit is necessary, yet in the case at bar the allegations of the complaint of the seisin and right of possession of the plaintiff are denied in the answer, and a distinct claim of ownership by the defendant is there alleged. In Smith v. Ogg Shaw, 16 Cal. 90, the court said: "The tenant, having disclaimed the title of the landlord and his own relation of tenant, cannot invoke the protection and advantages of that relation. The defendant's answer expressly makes this denial of title and holding the possession as tenant, or that plaintiff was entitled to the possession. * * * The effect of this denial was to make the defendant a trespasser. He was not entitled to notice to quit. Whenever he assumed to hold in defiance of the plaintiff's title, the plaintiff was authorized to maintain his action for the recovery of the premises, and he could not set up the denial of the title, and then claim the benefit of holding in subordination to it. Tayl. Landl. & Ten. 309; Jackson v. Wheeler, 6 Johns. 272; Jackson v. Deyo, 3 Johns. 422." The decision in Smith v. Ogg Shaw was affirmed in Bolton v. Landers, 27 Cal. 104, and Simpson v. Applegate, 75 Cal. 345, 17 Pac. 237.

2. As to plaintiff's right to the possession of the demanded premises, findings 1, 2, 3, and 4, I think, are amply sufficient. They show the paramount source of title in one Murry (antedating any claim of defendant or her grantors), and mesne conveyances from Murry down to plaintiff; the conveyance to the latter having been executed and delivered to her some nine months before the commencement of the action. These disclose title in the plaintiff, carrying with it the right to possession. In Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 243, the court, by Justice Field, said: "The right to the possession follows as a conclusion of law from the seisin, and need not be alleged. * * * The right of possession accompanies the ownership, and from the allegation of the fact of ownership—which is the allegation of seisin in 'ordinary language'—the right of present possession is presumed, as a matter of law. * * * The withholding of the possession from one who is seised of the premises is presumptively adverse to his right, and wrongful." See, also, Haight v. Green, 19 Cal. 118; Salmon v. Symonds, 24 Cal. 266; Depuy v. Williams, 26 Cal. 314. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

DICKEY v. GIBSON et al. (Sac. 105.)[1]

HOMESTEAD—MORTGAGE BY HUSBAND—JUDGMENT—AMENDMENT WITHOUT NOTICE.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 1265, as amended in 1880, providing that on the death of either spouse a homestead declared upon community property vests absolutely in the survivor, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1474, providing that when the homestead is selected from the separate property of the husband, who joined in its selection, on the death of the wife it goes absolutely to the surviving husband, a husband, after his second marriage, may give a valid mortgage on a homestead selected from his separate property during the first marriage.

2. In an action on a note, the court found as facts that there were due plaintiff certain amounts, separately, as principal, interest, counsel fees, and costs, and that they aggregated a sum stated. As conclusions of law, it found that there were due the same items, and aggregate amount, except that the right-hand cipher was omitted from the amount due as principal. Held, that the court could correct the error after judgment, without notice.

3. Where the decree in foreclosure, by inadvertence or mistake, omits a fractional quarter of the land described in the mortgage and the findings, the court may amend the decree without notice, after its entry, by including such land.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; Wm. O. Minor, Judge.

Action by Lafayette Dickey against Crecencia Gibson, executrix of the estate of Samuel Gibson, deceased, and others, to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment for plaintiff, the executrix appeals. Affirmed.

C. W. Eastin, for appellant. L. J. Maddux, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage. Plaintiff had judgment of foreclosure, and Crecencia Gibson, as executrix, appeals. The contention of the appellant is that a portion of the mortgaged premises were and are the homestead of said appellant and of Samuel Gibson, her testator, and that as to such homestead the mortgage of the plaintiff and respondent herein never was, and is not now, a lien thereon. The following facts will serve to illustrate the contention: In April, 1875, Samuel Gibson was the owner of all the land described in the mortgage herein, and resided thereon with his then wife, Guadalupe Gibson, and their two minor children. The land was the separate property of said Samuel Gibson, acquired by him before marriage. On the 16th day of April, 1875, and while so residing thereon, the said Gibson and his said wife made, executed, acknowledged, and filed for record, in due form, in the county of Stanislaus, where said land is situate, their declaration of homestead upon all of said land, the value of which was and is less than $5,000. Subsequently, and during the life of said wife, said Samuel Gibson and Guadalupe Gibson, his wife, sold and conveyed a portion of said homestead. In 1879 the said wife, Guadalupe Gibson, died. On or about February 18, 1882, Samuel Gibson intermarried with Crecencia Gibson, the appellant herein, and they have since resided upon the premises in question with the two minor children of the first marriage, and with six minor children, the fruit of the second marriage. Subsequent to the second marriage, probably, Samuel Gibson re-purchased the land so sold by him and his first wife, Guadalupe. On the 2d day of December, 1889, the plaintiff and respondent herein loaned to said Samuel Gibson $5,700, and the latter made to said plaintiff his promissory note therefor, payable one year after date, with interest at 8½ per cent. per annum, compounded annually, etc., and, to secure the payment of said promissory note, said Gibson executed his mortgage to plaintiff on all the land referred to herein, including that sold and reconveyed to said Gibson, as well as the homestead premises. The mortgage was recorded. On the 28th day of May, 1894, at the county of Stanislaus, state of California, said Samuel Gibson departed this life, leaving a last will, under which Crecencia Gibson was nominated as executrix, and such proceedings were thereafter had that the said last will was duly admitted to probate, and said Crecencia Gibson duly appointed executrix thereof, and she duly qualified as such executrix, and still is acting as such. Crecencia Gibson, the appellant here, did not execute the mortgage, or receive any portion of the consideration of the note which it was given to secure. Respondent presented his claim to the executrix for allowance, and then brought this action to foreclose; waiving in his complaint all recourse against any other property of the estate, except the mortgaged premises. By the decree the court ordered a sale of the property, other than the alleged homestead, to be first made, and then the homestead premises, if necessary to satisfy the demand of plaintiff. Section 1265 of the Civil Code, as amended in 1880, provides as follows in reference to homesteads: "From and after the time the declaration is filed for record, the premises therein described constitute a homestead. If the selection was made by a married person from the community property, the land, on the death of either of the spouses, vests in the survivor, subject to no other liability than such as exists or has been created under the provisions of this title [title 5, pt. 4, div. 2, Civ. Code]; in other cases, upon the death of the person whose property was selected as a homestead, it shall go to his heirs or devisees, subject to the power of the superior court to assign the same for a limited period to the family of the decedent; but in no case shall it be held liable for the debts of the owner, except as provided in this title." As will be observed from the foregoing section, upon the death of either spouse, a homestead declared upon community property vests absolutely in the survivor. In the hands of such survivor, it is protected against enforced sale, precisely as before it had been protected to the community by its homestead character. Sanders v. Russell, 86 Cal. 119, 24 Pac. 852; In re Burdick's Estate, 76 Cal. 639, 18 Pac. 805; Sheehy v. Miles, 93 Cal. 288, 28 Pac. 1046; Tyrrell v. Baldwin, 78 Cal. 470, 21 Pac. 116.

[1] Rehearing denied.

Prior to the amendment of 1880, and under the law of 1862, the homestead in such cases went to the survivor, subject to forced sale for debts accruing after the death of the other spouse. Watson v. His Creditors, 58 Cal. 556. When, as in this case, the homestead is selected from the separate property of the husband, who joined in its selection as a homestead, then, upon the death of the wife, it goes absolutely to the surviving husband. In re Croghan's Estate, 92 Cal. 370, 28 Pac. 570; Code Civ. Proc. § 1474. The title to the homestead property then vested absolutely in Samuel Gibson at the death of his first wife, Guadalupe Gibson, in 1879, which was some 10 years prior to the making of the note and execution of the mortgage herein. Could he then execute a valid mortgage on the homestead premises? We think this question must be answered in the affirmative. By the death of the first wife, the homestead property vested absolutely in the surviving husband, Samuel Gibson. As far as the legal title is concerned, it vested in him as fully and perfectly as though no homestead had ever been carved out of it. The limitations and immunities which accompanied the enjoyment of the property under such title modified, not the title, but its enjoyment, and were only such as the statute imposed. Save as to these limitations and immunities, the homestead ceased to exist. It was, also, under section 1474, exempt from the payment of any debt or liability contracted by, or existing against, either the husband or wife, or either of them, previous to or at the death of such husband or wife, except as provided in the Civil Code. Code Civ. Proc. § 1474. The Civil Code provides the manner by which the homestead may be sold, abandoned, or incumbered. Sections 1240–1244. The legislature evidently contemplated that cases would arise in which third persons would succeed by purchase to the rights and title of successors to homesteads, for it is provided by section 1485, Code Civ. Proc., that such purchasers "shall have all the rights and benefits conferred by law on the persons whose interests and rights they acquire." Herrold v. Reen, 58 Cal. 443, was a case in which a homestead was declared by husband and wife upon community property under the act of 1860. In 1862 the statute was so amended that it provided, as at present, that upon the death of the husband or wife the property, as at present, vested in the survivor. The husband died subsequently to this amendment. Under the act of 1862, as at present, in order to constitute a valid mortgage on the homestead it was necessary for the spouses to cooperate. After the death of the husband, the wife executed a mortgage upon the homestead property, and it was held valid and binding, although the mortgaged premises had been set apart by the probate court as a homestead for the mortgagor and her children. When the Civil Code (section 1242) provided that the homestead of a married person could only be conveyed or incumbered by the execution and acknowledgment of an instrument by both husband and wife, it was dealing with the condition which it had established by the same title, in reference to homesteads, and for the protection of the spouses in their status as husband and wife, and with no view to the altered conditions existing after the death of one of the spouses, when there was no marital relation to protect, and when, by the same law, it was provided that the title to the homestead property, which during coverture was held jointly, should vest in the survivor.

It would require a more emphatic declaration than is to be found in our statute to authorize a construction which would forever deny to the homestead survivor the right of alienation of property, the title to which is vested in him "absolutely." We must not be understood as holding that in the hands of Samuel Gibson the former homestead was liable to sale on a money judgment against the latter. That question was determined in Tyrrell v. Baldwin, 78 Cal. 470, 21 Pac. 116, against such contention. That case did not hold, however, that the survivor could not mortgage the property, but indicated, without deciding, that he could do so. The following language was used: "It does not follow that, because the survivor can mortgage the property after the title vests in him, it is subject to sale under execution; or that, because the title vests absolutely in the survivor, the homestead is subject to forced sale. Such title is entirely consistent with the law of exemptions;" citing In re Headen's Estate, 52 Cal. 294. Waples, in discussing this question, says: "By the provision 'the homestead property selected by the husband and wife, or either of them, * * * shall, upon the death of the husband or wife, vest absolutely in the survivor,' after the demise of either, the power to mortgage is in the widow or widower, as the case may be." Wap. Homest. p. 601. The title to the homestead property, having vested in Gibson at the death of his first wife, was not affected by his second marriage to the appellant herein. As was said in Graham v. Stewart, 68 Cal. 379, 9 Pac. 555: "The marriage changed her social status, but did not change her right to the property. In its title and use it remained vested in her as the true owner, usable by her for her exclusive benefit, and disposable by her, without the consent of her husband, in the manner provided by law,—i. e., by a conveyance of the property," etc. The facts of that case are on all fours with this, except that there the husband had died, and the widow had again married, and thereafter executed a mortgage on the former homestead, while here it was the husband who survived and executed the mortgage. We are of opinion that, upon both principle and authority, the mortgage executed by Samuel Gibson to the respondent was valid, and created a lien upon the property in question.

The portions of the complaint which appellant moved to strike out were proper as a predicate for the injunction which plaintiff sought, and as a foundation for the appointment of a receiver. The temporary injunction was dissolved, and no receiver was ever, so far as appears, appointed.

The following mistakes occurred in the proceedings, and were amended by the court without notice to appellant, and these amendments are urged as error: (1) The court found there was due to plaintiff, as principal upon the note in suit, $5,700, and as interest $1,957.21, as a counsel fee $200, and costs $20.25,—aggregating $7,877.46. As conclusions of law from the foregoing findings of fact, the court found that there was due plaintiff on the promissory note in the findings set out the principal sum of $570, thus omitting a cipher, to make it $5,700, as in the facts. The conclusion as to interest, counsel fees, and costs, together with the aggregate of $7,877.46, for which judgment was ordered, was precisely as in the finding of facts. This was, as abundantly appeared by the record, a mere clerical misprision, which the court could, on its own motion, amend, with or without notice. (2) In entering the decree, by inadvertence and mistake, the fractional S. E. ¼ of S. W. ¼ of section 36, township 2 S., range 7 E., Mt. D. B. & M., was omitted, although contained in the mortgage and findings. The court amended the decree, one month after its entry, by including therein this fraction. What we have said of the former amendment applies to this also. Bostwick v. McEvoy, 62 Cal. 496; Beatty v. Dixon, 56 Cal. 624; Fallon v. Brittan, 84 Cal. 514, 24 Pac. 381; Egan v. Egan, 90 Cal. 21, 27 Pac. 22; 1 Freem. Judgm. (4th Ed.) § 72a.

We recommend that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

WIGGINS v. MUSCUPIABE LAND & WATER CO. (No. 19,432.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 5, 1896.)

IRRIGATION—RIGHTS OF RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS—APPORTIONMENT OF WATER—IRRIGABLE LANDS.

1. In determining the rights of riparian proprietors to the waters of a stream, for irrigation, it is within the power of a court of equity to apportion the flow by periods of time, rather than by division of the quantity, when such apportionment would best secure the rights of the parties; and such apportionment may be extended to the use of the water for domestic purposes, when necessary.

2. In determining the rights of riparian proprietors to the waters of a stream for irrigation, it is the amount of irrigable lands each proprietor owns that is the controlling element, and not the amount actually under cultivation at the time.

3. It appeared that the stream contained, ordinarily, at the point where it entered defendant's land, 150 inches of water; that, in flowing through defendant's land, 100 inches were lost by absorption and evaporation, so that the flow at plaintiff's line was only 50 inches; that in the dry season the quantity was only 100 inches at the entrance to defendant's land, and no water reached plaintiff's land. Held, that in a decree granting each of the proprietors the use of the full flow of water for specified portions of the time, based on the number of acres of irrigable lands owned by each, it was proper to allow the defendant, upon providing for the delivery to plaintiff, at his line, of the amount of water in excess of 100 inches, to divert 100 inches of the water to his own use.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by W. R. Wiggins against the Muscupiabe Land & Water Company to enjoin defendant from interference with plaintiff's rights to water for irrigation. From a decree denying the injunction, and fixing the rights of the parties, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Harris & Gregg and Byron Waters, for appellant. W. P. Gardiner, E. E. Rowell, and Willis, Cole & Craig, for appellee.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff is the owner of a rectangular tract of land, having an area of 1,000 acres, lying to the south and west of a larger tract belonging to the defendant, the Muscupiabe Land & Water Company, and through both of these tracts of land there flows a stream of water known by the name of "Devil Canyon Creek." This stream has its source in the mountains north of the defendant's tract, and flows through the canyon in a southerly direction, and thence southerly and southeasterly, through the defendant's tract of land, to the north line of the plaintiff's tract, which it crosses in a southeasterly direction, and again enters the defendant's tract. The length of its course through the defendant's land before it reaches the plaintiff's land is 15,570 feet, and its course southeasterly across the plaintiff's land is 3,200 feet in length, when it again enters the land of the defendant, through which it flows for 13,450 feet. Of the lands of the plaintiff, only the northerly 245 acres are within the watershed of this stream, and riparian thereto. With irrigation this land can be made productive, but without irrigation it is dry and practically useless. The land of the defendant, which lies to the north of the plaintiff's land, adjacent to and bordering upon the stream, is rough, rocky, sandy, and worthless, and for the first 4,000 feet south of the place where the stream enters this land is not susceptible of cultivation. Below this point, and at a short distance to the eastward of the stream, a portion of the defendant's land—about 1,200 acres in extent, lying north of a prolongation of the north line of the plaintiff's tract—is within the watershed of the stream, and, if irrigated from the stream, may be made productive. In July, 1891, the defendant diverted upon this land all the waters of the stream above the plaintiff's tract, and thereupon the plaintiff commenced the present action for the damages sustained thereby, and to enjoin the defendant from any further interference with the flow of the stream. The cause was tried by the court, which found, in addition to the foregoing facts, the following: "(22) The most valuable use to which the water of said stream can be put is that of irrigation. The portion thereof that would be required for domestic and culinary purposes and for watering stock would not perceptibly diminish the volume of water flowing in the stream, when there is sufficient therein to be available for irrigation. (23) The bed of said stream is sandy and porous, and the air in that locality is, during the irrigating season, dry and hot. The quantity of water usually flowing in the stream varies greatly in different years, and in different seasons of the same year, and considerably in different portions of the day, there being more flowing at night than in the daytime. The usual irrigating season lasts from June 1st to October 1st. During the winter season, and when the water is not wanted for irrigation, there is more water flowing therein than is needed, or can be used, by the riparian owners. After the water enters the lands of the Muscupiabe Land & Water Company, a large portion thereof is lost by evaporation and by absorption, before it reaches the one thousand acre tract of said Wiggins. The flow of the stream also greatly diminishes from the end of the rainy season until about August 15th of each year (24) In a season of average rainfall, when there is no diversion of the water of said stream, the usual flow of the water therein at the point where it enters the land of said Muscupiabe Land & Water Company, and at the point where it enters the land of Wiggins, computed in miners' inches, measured under a four-inch pressure, is as follows: 'From July 1st to July 15th: At the north line of said company's land, one hundred and fifty inches; at the north line of Wiggins' place, fifty inches. From July 15th to September 10th: At the north line of said company's land, one hundred inches; at the north line of Wiggins' place, none. From September 10th to October 1st: At the north line of said company's land, one hundred and fifty inches; at the north line of Wiggins' place, fifty inches. When there is no more than one hundred inches at the point where said stream enters the land of said company, the same is all taken up by evaporation and absorption, so that none of it reaches the one thousand acre tract of said Wiggins.' (25) The said Muscupiabe Land & Water Company has constructed and now maintains a dam across the said stream, and a ditch leading therefrom onto the land of the company aforesaid sufficient in size to carry all the waters of said stream. When, during the irrigating season, the water of said stream is all diverted in said ditch until the bed thereof below the said dam becomes dry, and the water is afterwards turned again down and allowed to flow in said stream uninterrupted, it requires two days' flow before any of it will reach the one thousand acre tract of Wiggins, owing to the absorption of water by the creek bed, and the evaporation by the heat and dryness of the air, and the said stream does not attain its full flow at the north line of Wiggins' tract until about five days after it is so returned to said stream. (26) If the said stream were divided by quantity at the dam of said company, and the proper proportion in quantity which would be due to each of said riparian owners for his reasonable use thereof was allowed to flow in separate streams to each, the amount allowed to said Wiggins would be so small that none of it would ever reach his land. (27) The amount of water required to irrigate such of the lands of the said company and of said Wiggins as is properly susceptible of irrigation is the equivalent of a constant flow of one miner's inch, measured under a four-inch pressure, to each five acres of said land. (28) Under all the circumstances and facts in this case, a reasonable and equitable division of said water between the said Muscupiabe Land & Water Company and the said Wiggins would be to allow to the said Wiggins the full flow of the stream, uninterrupted and continuous, for eight days out of each forty days, beginning April 1st of each year, upon said one thousand acre tract, and to allow to the said Muscupiabe Land & Water Company the full flow of the stream during the remaining portion of each period of forty days: provided that, when there are no more than one hundred miners' inches of water, measured under a four-inch pressure, flowing in said stream at the point where it enters the land of the said Muscupiabe Land & Water Company, the said company should be allowed to divert all the water of said stream, and to continue so to divert the same until there are more than one hundred inches aforesaid flowing at said point." The conclusions of law, and the judgment thereon, follow substantially the twenty-eighth finding, and by the judgment the plaintiff is enjoined from diverting the water of the stream for use upon any portion of his 1,000-acre tract, except the northerly 245 acres thereof, and the defendant is enjoined from diverting the waters of the stream for use anywhere, except upon its land lying to the north of a line drawn in prolongation of the north boundary of the plaintiff's tract. From the judgment thus rendered the plaintiff has appealed, bringing the appeal here upon the judgment roll alone, without any bill of exceptions, and urges in support of his appeal that the findings of fact are insufficient to sustain or justify the judgment.

One of the grounds for a reversal urged by the appellant is that the judgment fails to provide for his right to use the waters of the stream for culinary or domestic purposes. The claim that this right is denied by the judgment is not sustained by the record. The judgment makes no limitation upon the use to which the water shall be applied by either of the parties, except that it shall not be used upon land which is not riparian to the stream. The principle contended for by the appellant is that the court had no authority to render a judgment by which he would be prevented from a continual flow of the stream for these purposes, and, although he has cited expressions from some opinions in support of this contention, an examination of the cases in which they occur fails to sustain the principle invoked by him. The opinion of Mr. Justice Thornton in Stanford v. Felt, 71 Cal. 253, 16 Pac. 900, was not concurred in by any of the other justices; and in Water Co. v. Hancock, 85 Cal. 219, 24 Pac. 645, it was held that the plaintiff had no interest in the waters of the stream, and consequently the use to which the water might be applied by either party was not before the court for consideration. By the common law a distinction was recognized between the right of a riparian owner to the ordinary use of the water for supplying his natural wants for domestic uses and for cattle, and the right to its use for his artificial wants, such as pleasure grounds, manufacturing, etc.; and although, in the exercise of this right, the superior proprietor might make any reasonable use of the flow of the stream for all domestic purposes, irrespective of any diminution caused thereby to the injury of an inferior proprietor, he could not exercise the right for any extraordinary use that would interfere with the rights of the inferior proprietors, or interrupt the regular flow of the stream, if thereby he interfered with its lawful use by them. Miner v. Gilmour, 12 Moore, P. C. 156; Wadsworth v. Tillotson, 15 Conn. 366.

The power of a court of equity to apportion the flow of water in a stream to the respective riparian owners by periods of time, rather than by a division of its quantity, so that each may have the full flow of the stream during such designated periods, instead of a portion of the flow during all the time, when the circumstances are such that a division in this manner would better conserve the rights of all the riparian owners, was fully considered and established in Harris v. Harrison, 93 Cal. 676, 29 Cal. 325. It was said in that case: "According to the common-law doctrine of riparian ownership, as generally declared in England and in most American states, upon the facts in the case at bar plaintiffs would be entitled to have the waters of Harrison canyon continue to flow to and upon their land as they were naturally accustomed to flow, without any substantial deterioration in quality or diminution in quantity; but in some of the Western and Southwestern states and territories, where the year is divided into one wet and one dry season, and irrigation is necessary to successful cultivation of the soil, the doctrine of riparian ownership has by judicial decision been modified, or rather enlarged, so as to include the reasonable use of natural water for irrigating the riparian land, although such use may appreciably diminish the flow down to the lower riparian proprietor, and this must be taken to be the established rule in California,—at least, where irrigation is thus necessary." In an arid country, water for irrigation may become a natural want of man, as exigent as when needed for domestic purposes, since without it vegetation would cease, and the sources of life be indirectly destroyed. See Evans v. Merriweather, 3 Scam. 496. When, as in the present case, a stream, instead of increasing as it goes towards the sea, constantly diminishes, until it finally disappears, or ceases to have any appreciable volume, it is very evident that its beneficial use can be regulated better by periods of time, rather than by a division of its quantity. A perpetual use of the water by all of the proprietors would be impracticable, for the reason that a perpetual use by the upper proprietor would, during a large portion of the year, entirely deprive the lower proprietor of any flow, and a just protection of the rights of both is best effected by its division in periods of time. In Harris v. Harrison the plaintiff claimed in his complaint the right to divert the waters of the stream for domestic uses as well as irrigation, but the power of the court to apportion the water for purposes of irrigation was the point chiefly presented and considered in the opinion of the court. The same principles, however, which authorize an apportionment of the flow by periods of time, for purposes of irrigation, justify such apportionment for domestic uses. The use to which different proprietors may apply the waters of the stream which flows through their lands is not the foundation of their right to the flow of the stream, nor is the owner's right to the flow of the stream governed by the uses to which the water may be applied, but it is a right annexed to the land, and a part thereof, and is an inherent element of the property which he has in the land itself. This right in each proprietor is, however, relative to the rights of the other riparian proprietors, and is to be exercised with proper regard to those rights.

The evidence before the superior court has not been brought before us, and we must assume, not only that the findings of fact made by that court were sustained by the evidence, but also that the findings which were made contain all the facts which the evidence before the court authorized it to make. As the appellant must show that the court below has committed error, it was incumbent upon him, if he would controvert the correctness of its judgment by reason of its failure to make suitable provision for his domestic needs, to show that he offered evidence upon this issue, and that the court failed to give due consideration to this evidence. By invoking the aid of a court of equity to protect him in his rights, he binds himself to recognize and observe the rights which the court may determine are held by others in the same subject-matter; and, if he would question the judgment of the court upon these relative rights, he must show that he presented to the court evidence of the rights which he claims the court has failed to protect. Not only does the record fail to disclose that any evidence was offered by the appellant tending to show that he requires any water for domestic uses, but the finding of the court that his tract of land, without irrigation, is dry and practically useless, tends to destroy his claim for such uses. In the absence of the evidence, we must hold that, in its allotment of the amount of water to be given to each party, the court took into consideration all of the uses for which it was shown that the water was available,—domestic uses as well as irrigation; that it considered the rights of the respective claimants, as well in view of the purposes for which the water was required, as of the amount of water available for such purposes. The finding of the court that the only way to provide for a reasonable use of the water is to divide its flow by periods of time, as well as its finding of the specific periods which, "under all the circumstances and facts in this case," would be a reasonable and equitable division of the water, must be held to be justified by the evidence, and to provide for all the uses to which either proprietor is entitled to apply the water. It cannot be said, as a matter of law, that the inferior proprietor has a necessity for a continuous flow for domestic purposes, any more than for purposes of irrigation. In either case he is entitled to only a reasonable use, and what is a reasonable use is a question of fact, depending upon all the circumstances appearing in each case. If neither of the proprietors has any use for the water other than for domestic purposes, a court would naturally fix the length of the periods during which each should be entitled to the flow, as well as the frequency of their recurrence, different from what it would if the waters of the stream were used for irrigation; but, whenever it should appear from the circumstances of the case that the only method by which either proprietor could have a reasonable use of the stream would be to allow to each its full flow for a reasonable time, the only equitable adjustment of their rights would be to thus apportion the flow. Whether this apportionment should be for alternate weeks, or alternate days, or for a specific portion of each day, must be determined by the facts of each case, and in the absence of the evidence of these facts the action of the trial court must be held to be correct.

The record does not disclose the amount of water flowing in the stream at any other dates than between the 1st of July and the 1st of October, or that there is at any time a flow of more than 150 inches at the point where it enters the land of the defendant; and, although it may be assumed that the loss by absorption and evaporation is greater during the summer than in the winter, the only finding upon this point is that, when there is no more than 100 inches at the point where the stream enters the land of the defendant, the same is all taken up by evaporation and absorption, so that none of it reaches the 1,000-acre tract of the plaintiff, and that in a season of average rainfall this is the actual loss between July 1st and October 1st. The loss by absorption and evaporation is so great that, without any consumption by the defendant for any purposes, only 50 inches would reach the land of the plaintiff at any portion of this period. How much of this 50 inches is consumed or required by the defendant for domestic purposes or natural wants is not shown, but it is consistent with the findings of the court to assume that it appeared from the evidence before it that the necessities of the superior proprietor for domestic uses were such that, by giving him the right to a continuous flow, none of the water would reach the land of the plaintiff during the irrigating season. It is very evident from the record that the cause was tried with reference to the rights of the respective parties to the water for purposes of irrigation, and that the right to the water for domestic purposes was not considered an issue in the case, or made a subject of controversy at the trial. Although, in his complaint, the plaintiff alleged, in general terms, his right to the waters of the stream "for the irrigation of said land, and for culinary and domestic purposes," his specific allegations that during the irrigating season "no more water reaches his land than is required for irrigating the cultivated portion thereof," and that he has no other source of irrigating the cultivated portion of his tract than from the waters of the stream, and the further allegation that the damage which would be sustained by him in consequence of a diversion of the waters by the defendant, and for which he sought the aid of the court, was the destruction of the fruit trees and vines and alfalfa growing on the land, justify the conclusion that the right to divert the waters for irrigation was the only issue presented to the court. The finding of the court that the most valuable uses to which the water of the stream can be put is that of irrigation, and its further finding that when there is sufficient water in the stream to be available for irrigation the portion that would be required for domestic and culinary purposes would not perceptibly diminish its value, corroborate this conclusion.

It is further contended by the appellant that, inasmuch as the court finds that he has cultivated 85 acres of his irrigable land, and that the respondent has cultivated only 13 acres of its irrigable land, and, as it does not appear that the respondent intends in the future to irrigate or cultivate any greater area, the judgment should not have given the defendant the use of the greater portion of the water. The right of a riparian owner to the use of the water is not, however, measured by the amount which he actually uses, and it is not to be assumed that the same amount of land will be cultivated in every succeeding year. The amount of irrigable land belonging to each party, rather than the amount of land already under cultivation, would be properly made a controlling element in adjusting their respective rights to the flow of the stream; otherwise a readjustment would be necessary whenever either party should cultivate a greater or less area. The finding of the court that "the only method by which the plaintiff can be given the reasonable use of said stream is to divide the flow of the stream by time, and allow him the full flow of the stream during such time as may be reasonable," furnishes the principle upon which this portion of the judgment rests; and the further finding that "the amount of water required to irrigate such lands of the defendant and of the plaintiff as are properly susceptible of irrigation is the equivalent of a constant flow of one miner's inch, measured under a four-inch pressure, to each five acres of said land," gives the basis for the application of the principle in behalf of the respective parties. The judgment protects the plaintiff against any waste or unnecessary diversion by the defendant in case it shall not cultivate its land, or only a small portion thereof, by the provision that, when it shall not actually use all or any portion of said waters upon its irrigable land, the plaintiff shall be entitled to use the same.

The appellant also objects to that portion of the judgment which provides that the defendant may provide means for carrying to the north line of the plaintiff's land, without diminution, all of the waters of the stream in excess of 100 inches which shall at any time be flowing at the point where the stream enters the land of the defendant, and that, if it shall elect to do so, it shall have the right, at any of the times during which the plaintiff is by the judgment entitled to the use of the waters of the stream, to deliver said excess to the plaintiff at the northerly line of his tract, and that, if it shall so deliver said excess to the plaintiff during the time it shall make such delivery, it shall have the right to appropriate to its own use the said 100 inches. This provision in the judgment is based upon the finding that 100 inches of the water of the stream is lost by absorption and evaporation between the time that the stream enters the land of the defendant, and before it reaches that of the plaintiff, and accords with the simplest principles of equity in the adjustment of the respective rights to the waters of the stream. The plaintiff could under no circumstances be entitled to the use of more water than would reach his land by the natural flow of the stream, and, if he receives this flow upon his land, it is immaterial to him whether it is received by means of the natural course of the stream, or by artificial means. On the other hand, if the defendant is enabled by artificial means to give to the plaintiff all of the water he is entitled to receive, no reason can be assigned why it should not be permitted to divert from the stream, where it enters its land, and preserve and utilize, the 100 inches, which would otherwise be lost by absorption and evaporation. The judgment is affirmed.

KIRSCH v. KIRSCH. (No. 15,702.)

Divorce—Rights of Parties in Community Estate — Judgment — Res Judicata — Adverse Possession — Writ of Assistance — Jurisdiction.

1. In an action for divorce the judgment determined certain land to have been community property, and vested the same in the husband absolutely, and ordered that he should pay to the wife a certain sum upon her delivery of a quitclaim to the premises, and said judgment was affirmed on appeal. Shortly before the entry of said judgment said husband conveyed to another, who subsequently brought ejectment against both husband and wife. In the ejectment suit said wife demurred to the husband's cross complaint, and the demurrer was sustained (upon what ground did not appear), and a judgment for costs was entered in favor of the wife upon the husband's failure to amend. Held, that the absoluteness of the husband's title was not made to depend upon the payment of the money to said wife, and that said last-mentioned judgment did not preclude him from petitioning for a writ of assistance to recover possession of the property under the judgment in the divorce action.

2. As limitations did not run during the pendency of the appeal, the assertion of plaintiff that since the rendition of the judgment in the divorce action she had acquired title by adverse possession was groundless where less than three years elapsed from the time the judgment was affirmed to the commencement of proceedings to recover possession.

3. The court in an action for divorce has jurisdiction to issue a writ of assistance to put a party in possession of land which the judgment vested absolutely in him.

McFarland, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth A. Kirsch against C. F. Emil Kirsch. From an order granting defendant a writ of assistance to recover possession of certain premises, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fisher Ames, for appellant. H. B. Mayo and T. A. McGowan, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Appeal from an order made November 2, 1893, granting respondent a writ of assistance to recover possession of certain real property. Appellant and respondent had been wife and husband. Appellant sued her husband in divorce, claiming a piece of real property, title to which stood in her name as her separate property. The husband answered and cross complained, charging his wife with adultery, and declaring the land in question to be the property of the community. He was granted a divorce by judgment and decree entered March 18, 1887. It was also decreed that the property in question was community property, and in making disposition thereof the court awarded it to the husband, "the same to belong to him absolutely, and to be his sole and separate property, free from any claim by or of the plaintiff." The judgment proceeds: "And it is further ordered that the defendant pay to plaintiff herein, or to her attorney, within sixty days from the date of the entry of this decree, the sum of five hundred dollars in cash, in United States gold coin, provided, nevertheless, that the said plaintiff shall and does, within that time, execute and deliver to the defendant or his attorney a full and sufficient quitclaim conveyance of all her pretended right, title, and interest (as the same appears of record) in and to said real estate and property, and in case of her failure to execute and deliver such quitclaim conveyance within said time said defendant shall be, and he hereby is relieved from the payment of said sum of five hundred dollars." From this judgment an appeal was taken to this court, by which it was affirmed in May, 1890. Kirsch v. Kirsch, 83 Cal. 633, 23 Pac. 1083. The day before the entry of the judgment and decree in the superior court the husband made a deed of grant of the land to Charles Green, which deed was acknowledged and duly recorded a few days thereafter. In the year following—1888—Green began an action in ejectment against Mr. and Mrs. Kirsch to recover possession of the land. Mr. Kirsch answered, denying Green's title, and denying that he was in possession of the land. By cross complaint he pleaded that the deed to Green was a mortgage, and that Green and Mrs. Kirsch, ever since March 17, 1887, had been in possession, receiving the rents and profits of the property, which exceed the amount of the mortgage debt. He prayed judgment that the deed be declared a mortgage, that an accounting be had, and that the premises be restored to him under reconveyance from Green.

Mrs. Kirsch filed a general and special demurrer to this cross complaint, which was sustained (upon what ground does not appear), with leave to amend. Kirsch not having availed himself of this permission, judgment for her costs was thereupon entered in favor of Mrs. Kirsch. The action of Green v. Kirsch is yet pending and untried. Thereafter, in 1893, respondent herein served notice upon appellant that he would apply to the court for the order here appealed from. The order was granted upon the papers, files, and records of the divorce case, the Green ejectment case, and such affidavits as were introduced by the respective parties.

We regard the controversy, whether the deed to Green was or was not a mortgage, and the matters touching the Green ejectment suit, as presenting questions immaterial to this consideration. Green was not a party to the proceedings which terminated in the order for the writ. His rights are in no way affected by that order. His action in which he pleads ouster and the possession of Mr. and Mrs. Kirsch is pending, and its merits will not be affected by a determination as to which of defendants between themselves is entitled to possession. The only consideration in this regard meriting notice is the effect of the judgment in favor of Mrs. Kirsch upon Mr. Kirsch's cross complaint. Her demurrer raised a number of legal objections: (1) Insufficient facts to constitute a cause of action; (2) improper joinder of several causes of action; (3) ambiguity, unintelligibility, and uncertainty. Leave was given by the court to amend. It does not appear that the merits of the cause of action were involved in the order sustaining the demurrer. The judgment was for costs. It cannot be said that any bar or estoppel against respondent is raised by such a judgment. Terry v. Hammonds, 47 Cal. 32; Hardenbergh v. Bacon, 33 Cal. 356; City of Los Angeles v. Mellus, 59 Cal. 444; Morrell v. Morgan, 65 Cal. 575, 4 Pac. 580. The rights of appellant and respondent to the property in question, excepting so far as either may have since acquired new and independent rights thereto, are to be measured by the language of the judgment in divorce, which was affirmed upon appeal. The property was community property. It was awarded absolutely to the husband. He in turn was to give the wife $500, but only upon the execution by her of a quitclaim deed. The absoluteness of his title was not made to depend upon the payment of the money. On the contrary, the wife's right to the money was made to depend upon condition precedent that she execute the deed. If she did this, she had a claim upon him for that amount. If she did not, she had no claim. In either or any event the property was his, and her claim was not made a lien upon it. It was in the nature of a money demand, the collection of which could be enforced by appropriate process. It appears that the wife remained in possession, and neither executed the deed nor received the money. She says she offered to make the deed, but the husband refused payment, saying he had sold, and had no further interest in the property. As might be expected, there is a denial of this by the husband, who says he is, and always has been, ready to pay the $500, but that Mrs. Kirsch would not execute the deed. The court seems to have believed Mr. Kirsch.

Appellant contends, however, that she has acquired a new title to the property by adverse possession, and that this title cannot be litigated in this manner and in this proceeding; that it should be tested either in ejectment or in an action to quiet title, when she would be entitled to a jury trial, and the right to cross-examine hostile witnesses. Reserving for the moment the consideration whether a writ of assistance may issue at all in an action such as this, we are well satisfied that, where a new and independent right to property has been acquired, or where a prima facie showing of the acquirement of such a right is made, the writ should not issue, and cannot operate to affect such new and independent right. The writ relates back to and operates upon those rights only which have been determined by the judgment. The reason for the issuance of the writ is to give effect to rights awarded by the judgment. It should not and cannot operate to establish in the one party or to destroy in the other any rights to the property independent of those determined by the judgment. So it would follow if appellant in this case had made even a prima facie showing of a new title by adverse possession, the issuance of the writ which would have passed judgment upon that title would have been improvident and irregular. But, while appellant claims a new title by adverse possession, the bald assertion of an unsupported claim is not a sufficient warrant for asking the court to withhold its process. If appellant, six months after the entry of the decree, should resist the issuance of the writ upon the claim that she had since the entry of the decree acquired title by adverse possession, the groundlessness of the contention would entitle it to no consideration. The claim, in short, must be reasonable, and supported by a reasonable showing. This claim, however, is not. The judgment entered in March, 1888, was appealed from by Mrs. Kirsch. In 1890, less than three years before the application for the order here appealed from, that judgment became final by affirmance in this court. The action was then pending until June, 1890 (Code Civ. Proc. § 1049), and while it was pending she could not acquire title by adverse possession, since during the pendency of the appeal all rights under the judgment were suspended. As Kirsch, while the appeal was pending, could enforce no rights under the judgment per contra the possession of the wife during that period could not be held to be adverse to her husband.

There is left for consideration the question whether a writ of assistance is the proper process in such a case. Our statutory action of divorce in its nature pertains to equity. The court, in fixing the status of the litigants, has the unquestioned power to dispose of the property of the community, dividing it between the spouses in such proportions as seem just. It has also jurisdiction to determine whether or not a given piece of property is or is not community property. Having these ample powers to adjudge and to award, it would be anomalous, indeed, if under our simplified procedure it were obliged to send either of the parties into another forum to prosecute another action to obtain possession of that which it had the power to give. Discussing the powers of a court of equity this court said in Montgomery v. Tutt, 11 Cal. 190: "The power of the court to issue the judicial writ, or to make the order and enforce the same by writ of assistance, rests upon the obvious principle that the power of the court to afford a remedy must be co-extensive with its jurisdiction over the subject-matter." Says Chancellor Kent in Kershaw v. Thompson, 4 Johns. Ch. 609: "When the court has obtained lawful jurisdiction of the case, and has investigated and decided upon its merits, it is not sufficient for the ends of justice merely to declare the right without affording the remedy." We think the issuance of the writ in such a case as this is permissible upon principle and conformable to the letter and spirit of section 187 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The order appealed from is affirmed.

LUDY v. COLUSA COUNTY. (No. 18,403.)[1]

CLAIM AGAINST COUNTY—REPAIR OF HIGHWAY.

In an action against a county, by a road overseer, to recover for services and money expended in the repair of county roads, testimony of the road commissioner that he had spoken to plaintiff in regard to working on the public roads, and had always directed him not to run in debt in excess of the funds appropriated for such work, and that he did not know anything about plaintiff's doing the work on which his claim was based until the bills therefor came in, is insufficient to show that the work in question was authorized by the commissioner, so as to authorize plaintiff to recover therefor. Garoutte, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Colusa county; E. A. Bridgford, Judge.

Action by one Ludy against the county of Colusa. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

M. J. Keys, for appellant. Ernest Weyand, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff was the road overseer of road district No. 6, of the county of Colusa, from January 1, 1891, until May 12, 1891. Between March 31st and May 12th of that year, as such overseer, he performed work and expended moneys upon the roads in that district, and others, at his instance and request as such overseer, also performed work and furnished materials for the benefit of the roads in the district. Claims on behalf of the plaintiff and the others who had been employed by him were presented to the board of supervisors of the county, and upon their rejection the others assigned their claims to the plaintiff, and the present action was brought by him for the recovery of the whole amount of said claims. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and the court found that "there was no direction of the board of supervisors of Colusa county, nor of any member thereof, or of the road commissioner of said district No. 6, nor of any road commissioner, to the said plaintiff, W. W. Ludy, road overseer of said road district No. 6, nor to any one else, to do the work alleged in the complaint to have been done, or any part thereof, or to furnish material as in said complaint alleged, or any part thereof." Judgment was thereupon rendered in favor of the defendant, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the plaintiff has appealed.

[1] Rehearing denied.

The following provisions of the Political Code were in force at this time:

"Sec. 2641. Each supervisor shall be ex officio road commissioner of the several road districts in his supervisor district, and shall see that all orders of the board of supervisors pertaining to the roads in his district are properly executed.

"Sec. 2642. The road overseer shall, under the direction of the road commissioner of his district, perform the duties in this chapter hereinafter specified.

"Sec. 2643. The boards of supervisors of the several counties of this state shall have general supervision over the roads within their respective counties. They must by proper ordinance: * * * (7) Order and direct overseers, specially in regard to work to be done on particular roads in their districts."

Each of the several county government acts that the legislature has passed has also, in subdivision 4 of section 25 in the several acts, given to the board of supervisors of their respective counties jurisdiction and power to lay out, maintain, control, and manage public roads, turnpikes, ferries, and bridges within the county. Section 2645 of the Political Code, as it was amended March 19, 1889 (St. 1889, p. 339), provided as follows: "Road overseers, under the direction and supervision of the road commissioners, and pursuant to orders of the board of supervisors, must: (1) Take charge of the highways within their respective districts, and shall employ all men, teams, watering carts, and all help necessary to do the work in their respective districts." And, as thus amended, it was in harmony with the provisions of section 25, subd. 4, of an amendment to the county government act, which was passed three days earlier at the same session of the legislature (St. 1889, p. 232), by which road overseers, in their respective districts, were authorized "to employ all labor required, and direct the conduct of work of any kind done upon any and all public roads." At the next session of the legislature, however, a new county government act was passed, March 31, 1891 (St. 1891, p. 295), which took effect immediately, in which, by section 25, subd. 4, this power was taken away from the road overseers, and it was provided that "the road commissioners in their respective districts shall employ all labor required, and direct the conduct of work of any kind done upon any and all public roads." On the same day section 2642 of the Political Code was amended (St. 1891, p. 474) by providing that the office of road overseer should be abolished, and that "whenever in this Code the words road overseer occur, they shall be taken and construed so as to read road commissioner." The provisions of this act did not take effect, however, until January, 1893, so that the office of road overseer was continued until that time, with its duties modified by the above provision of the county government act. The road overseer was still required to take charge of the highways, and perform certain duties, under the direction of the road commissioner, but he was not authorized to employ any labor therefor. The complaint in the present action alleges that all of the labor performed by the plaintiff and by the others, as well as the moneys expended by the plaintiff, for which this action is brought, was performed and expended after the 31st of March, 1891; and not only is there no averment that the labor, either of the plaintiff or of the others, was employed by the road commissioner, but it is expressly alleged that it was all done at the special instance and request of the plaintiff, and the court finds that there was no direction of the road commissioner to do the work, or to furnish the material.

At the trial the supervisor who was the road commissioner for the district embracing road district No. 6 testified that he had spoken with the plaintiff in relation to working on the public roads in that district, and had always told the road master not to run in debt. On cross-examination he was asked: "If you ever did speak to Mr. Ludy on the subject of doing work, you not only told him not to do work in excess to the amount of money apportioned for the payment of the indebtedness,—not to run the district in debt in excess of the funds of the district?" to which he replied: "Yes, sir; that was the understanding with all the road masters." The plaintiff contends that from this testimony the court should have found that he was properly directed to do the work, and that the above finding of the court was contrary to the evidence. The witness, however, testified that he did not know anything about the plaintiff's doing the work, and did not know anything about the work, until the bills came in Under these statements of the witness, we cannot say that the decision of the court was not justified by the evidence. There was no evidence that the road commissioner ever employed the plaintiff to do any work, or authorized him to employ other labor. As the statute did not confer upon the plaintiff any authority to employ labor for the improvement of the roads, and thereby create a charge against the county, the plaintiff not only did not state a cause of action in his complaint, but he failed at the trial to establish any claim against the county, either on behalf of himself, or either of his assignors. The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; TEMPLE, J.; HENSHAW, J.

GAROUTTE, J. I dissent. This is an action brought against the county of Colusa by one Ludy, road overseer of a certain road district in that county. He brought the action for labor performed by himself upon the public roads, and also as assignee of the claims of some 15 others for labor performed upon these roads, and material furnished which was used thereon. There is no claim of any kind made that the services were not performed and the materials furnished, nor any claim that the prices charged were excessive, but, upon the contrary, the record shows plaintiff attempting to recover an honest debt of Colusa county, and it should be paid. Two questions only are presented by the record upon this appeal: First, as to the sufficiency of the allegations of the complaint to support a judgment; and, second, as to the sufficiency of the evidence. It is conceded that if plaintiff, as road overseer, was authorized to do this work by the road commissioner of the district, such authority would be sufficient; but it is now insisted that there is no allegation in the complaint to that effect, and that, therefore, a cause of action is not stated. Under the facts disclosed by the record, a recovery by plaintiff should not be defeated upon any such grounds. Those facts are these: (1) A general demurrer to the sufficiency of the complaint was overruled by the trial court; (2) the complaint contains a general allegation of indebtedness from defendant to plaintiff of the amounts set out therein; (3) evidence was introduced at the trial as to the plaintiff's authority from the road commissioner to do the work; (4) the court made a finding of fact upon such evidence; (5) the court treated the allegation of indebtedness stated in the complaint as a material and sufficient allegation of the fact, and made a finding upon the issue created by the answer in that respect. For these reasons, in common justice, we are bound to hold that now the complaint should be deemed sufficient to support the judgment. To hold otherwise, a party would be wronged of a most substantial right by invoking a very technical rule of law. The court made a finding of fact that plaintiff was not authorized by the road commissioner to do the work. We are clear that this finding is directly opposed to the evidence. The only testimony offered upon this point was that of Mr. Herd, the road commissioner, who testified as follows: "Q. Did you ever speak to Mr. Ludy [road overseer] with relation to working upon the public roads of that district, in the spring of '90 and '91? A. Oh, yes; we always talked about the roads. Q. Did you tell Mr. Ludy at any time that he was running in debt, and was doing more work than was required? A. No; I don't know anything about him doing that work, in fact. Q. You say you don't know whether you spoke to Mr. Ludy concerning doing work, or not doing work? A. I am not positive about it. I presume I did, though. Q. You presume you did? A. Yes, sir. Q. If you ever did speak to Mr. Ludy on the subject of doing work, you only told him not to do work in excess of the amount of money apportioned for the payment of the indebtedness,—not to run the district in debt in excess of the funds of the district? A. Yes, sir; that was the understanding with all the road masters." There is but one construction to be put upon this evidence, and that is that the road overseer had general authority from Mr. Herd to do the necessary work in repairing the roads of his district, to the extent of the money on hand in the road funds of that district, and there is no pretension here that such instructions were violated. Conceding that the commissioner did not know plaintiff was doing the particular work upon which a recovery is here sought, that fact is immaterial; for the work was done under a general authority, which, we have seen, was plainly conferred.

IRRIGATION—APPROPRIATION OF WATER BY ALIENS—PRESCRIPTION—LIMITATION AS TO USE.

1. An appropriation of water in 1865 by defendant, an alien, was valid, giving him rights therein superior to the rights acquired in the same stream by a subsequent appropriation.

2. In an action to quiet title to certain water rights, where plaintiff claimed under an appropriation made in 1867, it appeared that defendant appropriated water from the creek in 1865, and had used it continuously for 27 years; that since 1872 he had limited his use to 50 inches of water, one day in the week, for irrigation purposes, and one-half inch of water, constant flow, for domestic purposes. Held, that defendant was entitled to a judgment confirming his rights in the water to the extent of his use since 1872.

3. It was error to limit defendant's use to a half inch of water to the place where his house was located, the water being available for use on any portion of defendant's lands.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county.

Action by the Santa Paula Waterworks and others against Julio Peralta to quiet title to certain water rights. From a judgment determining the rights of the parties, both plaintiffs and defendant appeal. Modified.

W. H. Wilde and Orestes Orr, for plaintiffs. Daly & Toland, Shepherd & Eastin, and R. F. Del Valle, for defendant.

BRITT, C. In this action the court below adjudged that the plaintiffs, as tenants in common, have the right to divert and use the water of the Santa Paula creek, in Ventura county, to the extent of 600 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure, subject, however, to the superior right of defendant to divert and use 50 inches of the water, measured as aforesaid, during "one day of twenty-four hours in each week, from Saturday afternoon to Sunday afternoon," and subject to the further right of defendant to take one-half an inch of water in constant flow, to be used only within a specified section of land. All parties have appealed from the judgment. Plaintiffs claim that on the findings made by the court they should have been awarded 600 inches of water absolutely, and that the judgment should be modified accordingly; while defendant contends that he is aggrieved in several particulars, and that the judgment should be reversed in order that a new trial may be had. The court found, among other matters, that in the year 1865 the defendant diverted by means of a ditch then constructed by him, having capacity to carry 120 inches of water, a part of the flow of said creek (the course of which lay mainly through public lands of the general government), and applied the same to the irrigation of certain land which he held by mere occupancy, and to other purposes. He was then an alien, and had not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States. On December 11, 1867, he declared such intention pursuant to the naturalization laws. In 1869 he established his residence on public land in a certain section 34, upon which, in 1881, he filed a pre-emption claim. He continued to live in said section until 1886, when he removed therefrom. Prior to 1869 he extended his ditch, and conducted the water previously diverted by him to the vicinity of his house in said section 34, where he used the same for irrigation. domestic purposes, and the watering of live stock as before. It sufficiently appears that he utilized the water by means of his ditch for the purposes stated, with only occasional interruptions. during the space of 27 years beginning in 1865. It was his custom to turn on the water for irrigation one day in the week,—Saturday afternoon to Sunday afternoon,—and then to return it into the stream, excepting such quantity as was necessary for watering his stock and for domestic purposes; and the court found that he had ceased any use of the water except as above stated. It was further found that since the year 1872, when the quantity of water in the creek was less than 600 inches, the defendant has used for irrigation no more than 50 inches. Among the "conclusions of law" appears the following: "The defendant is also the owner of the right to use one-half an inch of water, measured under a four-inch pressure constant flow, at the place where his house was located on section 34, * * * and to secure such flow is entitled to divert sufficient water to produce that amount through his ditch to the place of use."

The first step towards acquiring the interest in the water of the creek now held by plaintiffs was a notice of the appropriation thereof, to the extent of 700 inches, posted by certain persons with whom plaintiffs are in privity, in the month of August, 1867. This was followed forthwith by the construction of a system of ditches having capacity to carry 600 inches, into which some water was turned in the year 1868. The use of the water drawn through such system of ditches for various beneficial purposes has continued ever since, being increased from time to time; and since 1874 such use has amounted to 600 inches when that quantity was obtainable, though in the dry season the flow in the stream has frequently—perhaps commonly—been less than 300 inches. Upon the facts thus outlined the plaintiffs insist that their claim to 600 inches of water is superior to any interest of the defendant, for the reason that at the time of his appropriation, in 1865, he was an alien, and hence, they say, was not competent to appropriate the water. They found their argument on those provisions of the federal statutes restricting the acquisition of preemption and other rights in the public lands to citizens of the United States and those who have declared their intention to become such. The inference they seek to enforce seems to be that as Peralta, prior to December, 1867, could not, by reason of alienage, initiate title to government land, so he was incompetent to obtain by appropriation right to water flowing on such land. We cannot accede to this proposition. The silent acquiescence with which the government, prior to the act of congress of July 26, 1866, regarded the appropriation of water on its lands, as well as the express recognition extended by that statute to rights so acquired, did not discriminate between Trojan and Tyrian,—citizens or aliens. Married women and minors were, in general, not competent to pre-empt land, but we have never heard that they might not make a valid appropriation of water. The tests of such appropriation were priority of possession and beneficial use (Maeris v. Bicknell, 7 Cal. 261; Davis v. Gale, 32 Cal. 26; De Necochea v. Curtis, 80 Cal. 397, 20 Pac. 563, and 22 Pac. 198); and title, or the right to acquire title, in the place of intended use, has never been a necessary element in the ownership of appropriated water. Besides, since the prior appropriation of water is a mode of acquiring a right in real property by purchase (Hill v. Newman, 5 Cal. 445), the alienage of the defendant was a matter between him and the government, and, if it were admitted that, as against the government, he could have no valid right in the water, yet until "office found" it is conceived that private individuals were not at liberty to treat his appropriation as void of effect, or the water itself as still open to another taker. Norris v. Hoyt, 18 Cal. 217; Racouillat v. Sansevain, 32 Cal. 376; Lobdell v. Hall, 3 Nev. 516. The defendant's appropriation was, therefore, prior to that of the plaintiffs, and, as no facts are found to show that they have acquired by prescription a right to more water than the judgment allows to them, it follows that their appeal is unavailing. In support of defendant's appeal the principal grounds urged are that the court erred in not finding the quantity of water originally appropriated by him, in restricting his use for irrigation to 24 hours on Saturday and Sunday of each week, in not finding as a fact the quantity he may use for domestic purposes, and in restraining such use to certain limits,—the said section 34. Although the court nowhere found the extent of defendant's original appropriation, yet, as it did find that after 1872 he used no more than 50 inches for irrigation, and made such use only at certain times of the week, the omission was immaterial. All the water which he did not use was subject to the appropriation of plaintiffs. And this consideration disposes also of the objection to the action of the court in limiting defendant's use of the water for irrigation to 24 hours of each week commencing on the afternoon of Saturday. He having ceased to use the water at other times, the plaintiffs might lawfully take it at those times. Smith v. O'Hara, 43 Cal. 371. The statement contained in that part of the court's decision which is headed "Conclusions of Law," to the effect that defendant owns the right to divert through his ditch half an inch of water, constant flow, for use at the place where his house was situated in said section 34, read in connection with the other findings, is a sufficient ascertainment of his interest in the water for domestic purposes. It is to be treated as a finding of fact, though it is certainly misplaced. Spargur v. Heard, 90 Cal. 221, 27 Pac. 198. See the discussion and cases cited in Society v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 538, 39 Pac. 922. But there is no warrant in the record for that clause of the judgment restricting the place where defendant may use said half inch of water. If he had the right to use it "at the place where his house was located on section 34," then, in the absence of some other fact qualifying the right, the legal conclusion is that he may use it elsewhere; may change the place of use at will (Davis v. Gale, 32 Cal. 26); though, of course, he could not by such a change increase the quantity of flow to which he is entitled. The judgment should be modified by striking therefrom the portion limiting the place where defendant may use said half-inch of water, viz. the following words: "To be used only on section 34, township 4 north, of range 21 west, S. B. M." and, as so modified, it should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is modified by striking therefrom the portion limiting the place where defendant may use one-half inch of water in constant flow, viz. the following words: "To be used only on section 34, township 4 north, range 21 west, S. B. M.," and as so modified is affirmed.

DAVEY v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (No. 15,999.)[1]

RAILROADS — INJURIES TO LICENSEE ON RIGHT OF WAY — ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE — REVERSIBLE ERROR.

A complaint for injuries sustained by falling into an excavation between the tracks of defendant's road alleged that the right of way was an easement in a public highway. On trial, plaintiff admitted that the fee of the right of way was in defendant. Without any amendment, and without objection from defendant for variance, the trial proceeded on the theory that plaintiff could recover as a licensee, and that the excavation was in a path in general use by the public, to the knowledge and acquiescence of the defendant. Held, reversible error to exclude exidence that the path had been used constantly by the public, without objection from defendant, on an objection that it was "immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent," since the objection was insufficient to raise the point of variance.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Rosalie Davey against the Southern Pacific Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Gordon & Young, for appellant. Maxwell, Dorsey & Soto and Maxwell & McEnerney, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The action was for damages for personal injuries. At the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence, defendant moved for and was granted a nonsuit. Plaintiff pleaded that defendant operated its railroad upon a public highway in Alameda county, known as "Stanford Street." She averred that there was a culvert or drain crossing Stanford street, and extending under the tracks of defendant, which drain was securely and safely covered with planking and earth. Defendant opened this culvert, and left it "open and unprotected and in a dangerous condition for the whole length across said Stanford street, and under the track" of defendant. Upon the night of the accident, plaintiff "proceeded to cross said railroad track on said street," and was precipitated down through and between the rails of said track into the excavation. By this fall, and in this manner, she suffered the injuries complained of. It will be noticed that the complaint charges that the defendant corporation maintained its road upon a public highway. It clearly appears to have been the intent of the pleader to charge defendant with negligence in having laid open and left unguarded a drain or culvert upon a highway over which it had merely an easement in common with the general public. The complaint will bear no other construction. In such a case it is well settled that a railroad, having only an easement over a public street, possesses no rights therein superior to those of the public, saving such as the nature of its occupancy and use necessitate. A traveler upon that public highway may cross and recross the tracks of the railroad at his pleasure, and may expect to find that portion of the street covered by the roadbed of the railroad in a reasonably safe condition for public use and travel. Entirely different, however, is the rule and right of such a corporation operating its road over a right of way, upon land which it owns in fee. Here it not only enjoys all the incidents of private ownership; but from the well-known character of its use, and the necessity for swift and uninterrupted locomotion over its land, one who obtrudes upon the right of way is a trespasser, guilty of gross negligence, and the railroad generally owes him no duty further than to guard against his wanton injury. But though plaintiff, in effect, pleaded that defendant's right of way was an easement over a public highway, upon the trial she abandoned this position. She admitted that the right of way is on land owned by defendant in fee, and undertook, without change or amendment of the complaint, to establish that for many years a footpath led to and crossed the track at the point of the accident, and that this footpath was openly, constantly, and continuously used by the neighborhood without let or hindrance from defendant. It was claimed that the nature of the use shown would, inferentially, establish knowledge upon the part of defendant, and that plaintiff, in crossing the track upon this path and under these circumstances, was not a mere trespasser, but did so under acquiescence, and as a licensee of the defendant company. This evidence was all excluded under objection by defendant's attorney that it was "immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent." The court, in ruling, said: "If you can show the railroad company knew this, and made no objection to it, I will allow it." This evidence was clearly inadmissible under proper objection. It did not tend to establish any issue joined by the pleadings. There was a manifest variance between the complaint which charged a dangerous excavation made upon a public highway and evidence which sought to show an excavation made upon the private property of defendant along the line of a footpath over which plaintiff was licensed to pass. The difficulty which arises comes from the fact that no proper objection was made. The question of variance was never presented for consideration to the trial judge, or to opposing counsel, and is here made for the first time. The objection made in the trial court is insufficient to present the point. Dikeman v. Norrie, 36 Cal. 94; McKay v. Riley, 65 Cal. 623, 4 Pac. 667; Howland v. Railway Co. (Cal.) 42 Pac. 983. The case seems to have been tried upon the theory that the evidence was admissible under the pleadings, but that the plaintiff must establish knowledge by defendant of the use of its land for a footpath. But the evidence which the court refused to admit was directed to the proof by inference of the knowledge of defendant, as well as to the existence and use of the path. As in Hansen v. Southern Pac. Co., 105 Cal. 379, 38 Pac. 957, plaintiff sought to show a use which would carry with it the inference of knowledge, since, as to its own property rights, defendant would be presumed to know what was generally known. Railroad Co. v. Troutman, 11 Wkly. Notes Cas. 453; Davis v. Railway Co., 58 Wis. 646, 17 N. W. 406; Isabel v. Railroad Co., 60 Mo. 475; Griffiths v. Railway Co., 14 Law T. (N. S.) 797. The evidence, therefore, would have been admissible under a proper pleading. Whether it would have proved sufficient to establish a license in plaintiff, and knowledge and acquiescence in defendant, were matters which, under proper instructions, were for the jury to decide. Noyes v. Railroad Co., 92 Cal. 285, 28 Pac. 288; Hansen v. Southern Pac. Co., 105 Cal. 379, 38 Pac. 957; Troy v. Railroad Co., 99 N. C. 298, 6 S. E. 77; Barry v. Railroad Co., 92 N. Y. 289; Byrne v. Railroad Co., 104 N. Y. 362, 10 N. E. 539; Townley v. Railroad Co., 53 Wis. 626, 11 N. W. 55; Taylor v. Canal Co., 113 Pa. St. 162, 8 Atl. 43; Davis v. Railway Co. (Wis.) 17 N. W. 406.

[1] Rehearing granted.

The motion for a nonsuit was made upon the ground that the evidence showed that plaintiff was a trespasser, to whom defendant owed no duty. Such, indeed, was the showing of the evidence, since all that plaintiff offered to establish that she was at the place of injury under permission was rejected. While, therefore, the nonsuit was properly granted under the admitted evidence, for the error in rejecting plaintiff's offered evidence the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

GALVIN et al. v. PALMER. (S. F. 22.)[1]

EQUITY—JURY—EVIDENCE—PART OF DOCUMENT—AUTHENTICATION OF COPY—ERROR WITHOUT PREJUDICE.

1. In equity, where a jury is impaneled merely as a body advisory to the court, to assist it in determining disputed facts, the court may direct a verdict, though the evidence is conflicting.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1923, which provides for certified copies of an original, or parts thereof, for the purposes of evidence, part of a map of a United States reservation, duly certified by the legal custodian thereof, as required by section 1918, subd. 9, is admissible to show that certain lands are within the boundaries of the reservation.

3. Where a certificate to a copy of a document recites the official character of the officer as the legal custodian of it, his authority to certify a copy of it is proved, prima facie, by the certificate itself.

4. Possible error in the admission of evidence is without prejudice, where there is independent and uncontradicted evidence enough to establish the issue.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by E. M. Galvin and J. E. Galvin, by their guardian, against E. H. Palmer, for possession of lands. From an order granting plaintiffs a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Thos. G. Huxley, for appellant. M. G. Cobb and Henry C. Dibble, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiffs, who, at the date of the commencement of this action, were minors, averred their ownership and possession of a piece of land situated at the corner of Beach and Hyde streets, in the city and county of San Francisco. They further averred that defendant asserted title to the land, and that this title was based upon a deed obtained by defendant's grantor from the city and county of San Francisco by fraud. After the United States had granted the land to the city and county of San Francisco, upon trust to convey to those in bona fide possession at the date of the passage of said act (July 1, 1870), defendant's grantor falsely and fraudulently represented himself to hold such possession of said land, and thereby procured a deed to the same from the city. At the date of the passage of the act defendant's grantor was not, but plaintiff's grantors were, in such actual possession, all of which was well known to the defendant at the time he took his deed. The prayer was for a decree declaring defendant to hold his title in trust for plaintiffs, and compelling him to convey the same to them. For answer the defendant made denial, pleaded the statute of limitations, and by cross complaint set up his title, and asked a decree establishing it as good and valid. Though the action was in equity, the court impaneled a jury, whose verdict, being advisory merely, it was in no wise bound to accept. At the conclusion of the evidence the jury was instructed to render a verdict for defendant, which it did, and judgment was entered in accordance therewith. Thereafter plaintiffs moved for and obtained a new trial, from the order granting which this appeal is taken.

The grounds urged for the new trial were newly-discovered evidence, insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and errors of law occurring at the trial. The court, in granting the motion, based its order upon the single ground that it had erred to the prejudice of plaintiffs by admitting in evidence a portion of a map, which ruling will hereafter come under review. This order of the court relieves from consideration the question of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the evidence. Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 277, 29 Pac. 481. While it is true that, in actions at law, where a trial by jury is a matter of right to either party, it is error for the court to instruct the jury to render its verdict for one or the other when the evidence is conflicting, the rule does not obtain where, in equity, a jury is impaneled merely as a body advisory to the court, to assist it in determining disputed facts. In such cases the court may, even under conflicting evidence, reject the verdicts, general or special, of the jury, and enter a decree in accordance with its own determination, or, what is an equivalent, it may direct a particular verdict upon the facts as being in accord with its own conclusions. There was no error, therefore, in the court's instruction, even if it be conceded that the evidence was conflicting. But, in truth, the evidence was not conflicting, or, even if, by a most liberal concession, a conflict be acknowledged, it was upon matters which, by reason of other considerations, could not have advantaged the plaintiffs if the disputed points had been determined in their favor.

To make this apparent, a review of the facts here becomes necessary. In 1850 the president of the United States, by proclamation, reserved for public purposes certain lands upon the peninsula of San Francisco at Point José or Point San José, now commonly designated "Black Point." By latter proclamation, in 1851, the boundaries of this reservation were reduced and made to embrace the following tract: "The promontory of Point José within boundaries of not less than eight hundred yards from its northern extremity." By all the evidence in the case, uncontradicted, it appears that the lot in question was within the boundaries both of the original and of the reduced reservation. By act of congress of 1870 (16 Stat. c. 197, § 1), in which the United States relinquished certain of these reserved lands to the city and county of San Francisco, one of the trusts declared was "to grant and convey the remainder of said land to the parties severally, who are, at the date of the passage of this act, in the actual bona fide possession thereof by themselves or their tenants, and in such parcels as the same are so held and possessed by them; or who, if they have not such possession, were deprived thereof by the United States military authorities when they went into the occupancy of said military reservation, or were deprived thereof by intruders or trespassers, against whom possession may be recovered by legal process." Defendant's predecessor in interest made proof of his right to a deed to the land in question under this act, and through this source title vested in defendant, by deed of the city, December 24, 1870. Plaintiffs introduced a deed of the land from the commissioners of the funded debt to J. W. Bowman, acknowledged in November, 1852; a deed of an undivided one-half thereof from Bowman to S. Hopkins, acknowledged in January, 1853; a deed from Bowman to plaintiffs of his remaining interest, acknowledged in July, 1881; and a deed from Hopkins to plaintiffs of his interest, acknowledged in April, 1880. Their title from this source depends for its validity upon the soundness of the claim, which they urge, that the land originally belonged to the city of San Francisco. This claim, however, is untenable. Upon the conquest of California title to the lands of the pueblo which had not passed into private ownership vested in the United States. Grisar v. McDowell, 6 Wall. 364; Trenouth v. San Francisco, 100 U. S. 253; Association v. Knight, 85 Cal. 470, 24 Pac. 818; Thompson v. Doaksum, 68 Cal. 596, 10 Pac. 199; People v. Holladay, 68 Cal. 443, 9 Pac. 655. It is not claimed that these lands were held in private ownership prior to the commissioners' deed. And, as it has been decided that the reservation of the Presidio was a valid executive act, which excluded these lands from acquisition by private individuals (Grisar v. McDowell, supra), it follows, necessarily, that the commissioners' deed was ineffectual and worthless as a conveyance of title. Plaintiffs next sought to establish a title by adverse possession; but, as they were unable to prove payment of taxes for the requisite number of years, their claim failed so completely and admittedly that it is not even argued in their briefs. Plaintiffs' final effort was directed to showing that defendant's predecessor was not in the bona fide possession of the land at the date of the act of relinquishment, and that defendant's deed was, consequently, procured by fraud. But neither of the plaintiffs, who are minors, was born at the date of the passage of this act. They themselves cannot claim, therefore, as beneficiaries under the act. They must rely, as was admitted, upon the strength of their grantors' rights. In this regard, then, they occupy the same, and no better, position than would these grantors. As to them, the fraud, if fraud there be, was committed in 1870, and they were chargeable with knowledge of it, since not only were the proceedings public, but they culminated in a recorded deed to the property which they claimed. This cause of action, then, was long barred, as to the grantors of plaintiffs, and, consequently, to plaintiffs themselves. Love v. Watkins, 40 Cal. 561; Groghan v. Spence, 71 Cal. 125, 12 Pac. 719; Hecht v. Slaney, 72 Cal. 366, 14 Pac. 88; Ohm v. City and County of San Francisco, 92 Cal. 445, 28 Pac. 580.

[1] Rehearing denied.

Moreover, the deed to defendant, like a patent, is prima facie evidence that the officers performed their duty in issuing it; and so that it was issued to the rightful claimants. These presumptions can be attacked only by him who connects himself with the title, and not by a stranger, or one in hostility to it. Low v. Lewis, 46 Cal. 549; McCreery v. Sawyer, 52 Cal. 257; Latham v. City of Los Angeles, 87 Cal. 514, 25 Pac. 673; Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 220; Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 295; Churchill v. Anderson, 56 Cal. 55; O'Connor v. Frasher, 56 Cal. 499; Leroy v. Cunningham, 44 Cal. 599; Naglee v. Palmer, 50 Cal. 641; Palmer v. Galvin, 72 Cal. 183, 13 Pac. 476; Chapman v. Quinn, 56 Cal. 266; Peabody v. Prince, 78 Cal. 511, 21 Pac. 123. It was incumbent on plaintiffs, therefore, first to prove that they or their grantors were in the actual bona fide possession at the date when the act went into operation, and this, as the court says, and the evidence shows, they signally failed to do. The utmost which their evidence can be claimed to establish is that no one held such possession; but such a showing leaves plaintiffs strangers to the title, and against them, on this ground, the deed of the city to defendant becomes conclusive, since they cannot be permitted to attack it. In proof that the land was within the limits of the military reservation, there was admitted in evidence, over plaintiffs' objection, a portion of a map of the reservation showing the location of the land with relation to the boundary of the government tract. The judge granted the motion for a new trial upon the sole ground that he believed he had committed error in admitting this evidence, and, as it was evidence which greatly influenced him in his determination that the land was a part of the Presidio reservation, he deemed the ruling to be prejudicial to the interests of plaintiffs. We think the learned judge, in his conscientious efforts to avoid injustice, here, and not upon the trial, fell into error. The drawing, which was a portion of a map, was offered with the following certificate: "I, Charles S. Stewart, colonel of the United States corps of engineers, do hereby certify that I am the legal custodian of a map of the Point San José U. S. military reservation, as located within boundaries of not less than eight hundred yards from said point, and that said map was prepared by and is part of the records of the United States war department, and that this map is a true and correct copy of so much of the original map in my custody as embraces the tract of land located in the city and county of San Francisco, within the former boundaries of said reservation, and bounded northerly by high-water mark of the bay of San Francisco, easterly by the former eastern boundary of said reservation as originally located, southerly by North Point street, and westerly by Larkin street. In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and private seal (having no official seal), this sixteenth day of April, 1883. C. Seaforth Stewart, Col. of Engineers, U. S. A. [Seal.]" This certification is in strict accord with the provisions of section 1918, subd. 9, and section 1923 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The objections made by plaintiffs to the introduction were two: First, that the whole map should be introduced, and not a part; and, second, that there is no law making Col. Stewart a certifying officer of a copy of the map. As to the first of these objections it is sufficient to say that section 1923, Code Civ. Proc., contemplates and provides for the introduction in evidence of a part of a map or document. The object of the evidence was to establish that the land in question was within the boundaries which the United States government had set to the reservation, and that portion of the map was offered which showed the land and the inclosing boundary. The whole map would have shown no more, or, if it would, it became the duty of plaintiffs' attorney, who had himself, under direction of the court, inspected the original instrument, to point out the precise particular in which the offered portion worked an injury by its incompleteness, or failed fully to express the truth of the matter sought to be proved. He did not do this. If the whole map would have shed no more light upon the question, the offered portion was material and admissible, and the remainder immaterial and unnecessary. The second ground of objection, which was that "there is no law making Col. Stewart a certifying officer of a copy of the map," is no better founded than was the first. The objection is tantamount to an admission that the map is a record of the war department, and that Col. Stewart is the legal custodian thereof, as he well might be under the customs, rules, or orders of the department. The certificate also recites these facts. Assuming them as true, the law authorizing him to make the certificate is found in section 1918, subd. 9, Code Civ. Proc. Moreover, the official character of the officer as the legal custodian of the document, and therefore authorized to certify a copy of it, is proved, prima facie, by the certificate itself. Mott v. Smith, 16 Cal. 533, 552. And, finally, an error in admitting the map could not have been prejudicial to plaintiffs, because there was sufficient independent and uncontradicted evidence to show the location of the land; second, by presumption the deed from the city to defendant, which deed plaintiffs introduced in evidence as part of their case, showed the land to be within the reservation (Collins v. Bartlett, 44 Cal. 383); third, plaintiffs pleaded that the land was granted by the United States to the city and county of San Francisco in trust, and failed to connect themselves with this government title.

As to the alleged newly-discovered evidence, it was either cumulative upon the proposition that no one was in the actual bona fide possession of the land at the time the act of congress became operative, or it sought to show that, though the land was taken by the United States authorities, and was within the boundaries which they laid out, still these boundaries were incorrect. Even if this latter evidence were admissible, no diligence is shown, and no reason why it was not procured upon the trial. At the same time it clearly appears, by counter affidavits, that plaintiffs' guardian, by reason of former litigation between the parties over the same land, must have been fully advised as to its materiality and bearing upon the present case. The order is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to deny the motion for a new trial.

GLUGERMOVICH v. ZICOVICH. (S. F. 13.)[1]

ACTION ON NOTE — GARNISHMENT AS DEFENSE — COSTS.

1. The maker of a note who, at the time of its maturity, has been garnished in attachment, then pending against the payee, cannot set up such garnishment as a defense to the action, nor to the recovery of costs and the attorney's fee provided for in the note.

2. His proper course is to move for a stay pending such garnishment proceeding.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Action by V. Glugermovich against A. Zicovich. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. P. Veuve, for appellant. H. V. Morehouse, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Action on a promissory note for the sum of $473, made by defendant to plaintiff, and which fell due June 14, 1894. One of its provisions was that, in case of suit, a reasonable counsel fee should be allowed. On said June 14th Zicovich, the maker, was garnished in respect of his indebtedness on the note in an action brought by one Coschina in a justice's court against the plaintiff here, said Glugermovich. Such attachment was in force when this action was begun,—June 15, 1894,—and the defendant, Zicovich, pleaded the fact thereof in his answer. The suit of Coschina v. Glugermovich was yet pending and undetermined at the time of trial of the present case. Upon such trial plaintiff recovered judgment for said sum of $473, together with further allowance for counsel fees and costs of suit.

[1] Rehearing denied.

A proper mode of procedure for the garnishee under such circumstances was long ago pointed out by the decisions of this court. He may, by affidavit or other appropriate means, bring to the attention of the court where he is sued by his own creditor the facts of the garnishment, and apply for a stay of proceedings until the action of the attaching creditor can be disposed of. McKeon v. McDermott, 22 Cal. 667; McFadden v. O'Donnell, 18 Cal. 160. Doubtless, also, cases may arise where the court would find it expedient, for the purposes of justice, to allow the cause to proceed to judgment, but staying execution upon the whole, or enough thereof, to provide for the satisfaction of the demand for which the debtor is garnished; the end sought being to enforce payment from him once, and only once, and that to the person whose claim against him turns out to be legally superior. Drake, Attachm. §§ 699–701; Jones v. Wood, 30 Vt. 268; Creed v. Creed, 161 Mass. 107, 36 N. E. 749. In this instance the defendant applied for neither a suspension of the action nor any stay of execution, and since, as the authorities cited show, the matter pleaded by him constituted no defense, the court was justified in rendering judgment absolute for the sum due on the note.

Nor do we see that the costs and attorneys' fees are on a different footing. The defendant promised to pay attorney's fees in case of suit. The garnishment was no bar to the right to sue. Hence, the recovery of attorney's fees seems, under the circumstances, necessarily to accompany any recovery at all. And so of the costs which are incidental to the judgment. What should have been the effect, on the matter of attorney's fees and costs, if, before final judgment here, the liability of Glugermovich, and the consequent force of the garnishment, had been established in the action brought by Coschina, is not now for decision, though we incline to think that, in such a case, the defendant ought not to suffer prejudice from plaintiff's failure to pay his own debt, and that the right of the latter to recover attorney's fees or costs should be made contingent on his successful resistance of the action in which the debt due to him was attached. See Shealy v. Toole, 56 Ga. 210; Oriental Bank v. Tremont Ins. Co., 4 Metc. (Mass.) 1.

The judgment should be affirmed, but, upon the going down of the remittitur, the court should permit the defendant, on proper notice, to show what, if any, payment he has made, or is compellable to make, on account of the attachment of Coschina, and direct the satisfaction of the judgment to that extent.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PEOPLE v. HICKMAN. (Cr. 115.)

JURY—SPECIAL VENIRE—CHALLENGE—CRIMINAL LAW—CONFESSIONS—WHAT CONSTITUTES—WITNESS—IMPEACHMENT—OBJECTIONS TO EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

1. Disallowing a challenge to the panel returned under a special venire because that venire was rendered necessary on account of the depletion of the regular venire, due to the liberality on the part of the judge in allowing excuses to those summoned, is not ground for reversal, in the absence of a showing that the judge abused his discretion in the matter of allowing the excuses.

2. A statement by defendant, in answer to the remark of the constable who arrested him that his possession of the stolen article looked suspicious, "Well, damned if it don't," is not a confession, so as to render it inadmissible without proof that it was voluntarily made.

3. A statement by defendant, in reply to the remark of a constable that he wished he had stopped a wagon which passed him the night of the theft, driving rapidly, that it was best for him that he did not, or otherwise he might not have stopped any more, is not a confession, so as to render it inadmissible without proof that it was voluntarily made.

4. Where accused testifies in his own behalf, to discredit him, testimony as to his general reputation in the community for "truth, honesty, and integrity" is admissible.

5. Where, to discredit accused's testimony, a witness is asked as to defendant's "reputation" for truth, etc., instead of his "general reputation," a general objection to such question, without calling the attention of the court to the particular vice in the form of the question, is insufficient.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; W. A. Gray, Judge.

Jerome Hickman was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals from the judgment and an order denying him a new trial. Affirmed.

Theo. S. Shaw and E. C. Reichard, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

VAN FLEET, J. Defendant was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals from the judgment and an order denying him a new trial. He assigns numerous errors.

1. The exceptions taken in the impanelment of the jury are without merit. The course pursued by the trial judge as to the time and manner of requiring peremptory challenges to be exercised has been the established rule in criminal cases in this state for upwards of 25 years. People v. Scoggins, 37 Cal. 679. The challenge for cause interposed by the prosecution to the juror Fulkreth was properly allowed. The challenge was sufficiently specific, and the juror, in having formed an opinion based upon hearing the sworn evidence taken on a former trial of the same case, was clearly disqualified. Nor was there any error in disallowing the defendant's challenge to the panel returned under the special venire. The necessity for the issuance of that venire arose from the want of a sufficient number of jurors remaining on the regular list to form a panel. The fact that the depletion of the regular panel may have arisen from too great a liberality on the part of the judge in allowing excuses to those summoned thereon cannot affect the regularity of the special venire, the matter of excuses being one of wide discretion, and nothing being made to appear to show its abuse. The special venire was regularly issued and returned. Code Civ. Proc. § 227.

2. The constable who arrested the defendant was permitted, against the defendant's objections, to testify to certain statements or declarations made by defendant in a conversation between them after the arrest, and this ruling is assigned as error. The subject of the larceny was a calf, which was taken from the pasture of its owner, near the town of Porterville. In the evening before the theft the owner having been informed that there was a calf tied down in his pasture, got a friend and the constable, and drove out to the field. On the way out they met a two-horse wagon being driven rapidly towards town, but the night was too dark to enable them to identify the driver or the team. When they reached the pasture the calf was gone, but evidence of where it had been tied was found, and wagon tracks led from near the place to the premises of the defendant. The next morning a search of defendant's premises was made by the constable, and in a shed on the place was found a quarter of beef or veal, the hide and the head and entrails on the floor. Upon this discovery, the constable remarked to defendant, "Jerome, this looks kind of suspicious," and defendant answered, "Well, damned if it don't." Subsequently, in talking with defendant on the way to the jail, the constable referred to the incident of meeting the wagon on the evening before, and, to quote his language as given in his testimony: "I remarked to him [defendant] that I had a notion to stop that wagon when we met it, or that afterwards I wished that I had stopped it; and he said that it was probably the best thing for me that I didn't try to stop it; that, if I had attempted to stop it, I probably would not have stopped any more,—something to that effect. I don't remember exactly the language he used." Defendant objected to this conversation, and asked that it be stricken out, on the grounds that it was irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial, and constituted a confession made under duress of arrest and imprisonment, and was for that reason inadmissible. Aside from the fact that the constable had testified that nothing was said or done by him to induce the defendant to talk, or any promise of clemency, or threats made to defendant, there was no error in the admission of the conversation in evidence. The statements or declarations of the defendant were in no sense a confession or admission of guilt, and did not require preliminary proof of their voluntary character. "A confession is a person's declaration of his agency or participation in a crime. The term is restricted to acknowledgements of guilt." People v. Le Roy, 65 Cal. 613, 4 Pac. 649, and cases there cited. The fact that these statements of the defendant, when considered with the other facts in the case, had a tendency to prove guilt, did not constitute them confessions, or subject them to the rule applicable to the latter. "An admission of a fact, not in itself involving criminal intent, is not to be rejected as evidence (without the preliminary proof) merely because it may, when connected with other facts, tend to establish guilt." People v. Parton, 49 Cal. 637. In this case, as in those above cited, the defendant did not admit his guilt, but denied it from first to last. The evidence was, therefore, clearly within the rule of admissibility.

3. The defendant took the witness stand in his own behalf, and gave testimony tending to exculpate him from the charge. In rebuttal the prosecution introduced a number of witnesses who testified that the general reputation of defendant in the community for truth, honesty, and integrity was bad. This evidence was objected to by the defendant upon the grounds that it was irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent, and that its introduction was an unwarranted attack on the character of defendant, which was not in issue, and constituted misconduct of the district attorney in offering it. This objection was overruled, and the admission of the evidence is now urged as error. The evidence was properly admitted. The moment the defendant submitted himself as a witness, his character, as such witness, for truth, honesty, and integrity, was involved, and he became subject to the same rules for testing his credibility before the jury by impeachment or otherwise, as any other witness. People v. Beck, 58 Cal. 212; People v. Bentley, 77 Cal. 7, 18 Pac. 799. The course of the prosecution was one of the recognized methods for attacking the character of a witness, and its application in the present instance was a proper one. Code Civ. Proc. § 2051.

A further objection is made in this connection. There were some six or seven impeaching witnesses in all put on by the prosecution. To all of them, except in two instances, the form of the questions calling for their knowledge was unobjectionable; the witnesses being asked, in the usual formula, if they knew "the general reputation of the defendant for truth, honesty, and integrity," etc. In two instances, however, the word "general" was, whether by inadvertence or otherwise, omitted in putting the question. The objection interposed by defendant in each of the instances, including the two last, was the same as above stated, and no specific suggestion or objection as to the mere form of the question was in any instance made to the court or opposite counsel. Defendant now insists that in the two instances indicated his objection was clearly good, and should have been sustained. In the first place, while it is true that the inquiry is to be confined to the general reputation of the witness, it is not necessarily true that this object can only be accomplished by using in all instances one stereotyped form of question. As, for example, in the case before us, in each of the two instances where the term "general" was omitted in putting the question, the whole manner of the inquiry and the character of the questions asked evinced as clearly to the witness on the stand and the jury that it was the general reputation of the impeached witness that was being sought as though that fact had been expressed in exact terms. This is all that is required. But, in the next place, if defendant wished to avail himself of the objection now made, he should have directed the attention of the judge by specifically calling his attention to the vice in the form of the question now complained of. He cannot be heard to urge or point out here for the first time an objection of any more specific character than that made in the court below. People v. Bush, 68 Cal. 629, 10 Pac. 169; Howland v. Railway Co. (Cal.) 42 Pac. 983; People v. Frigerio, 107 Cal. 151, 40 Pac. 107.

There are no other points requiring special notice. We find nothing reprehensible in the conduct of the district attorney or his assistant, either in the method of examination of witnesses or their argument to the jury. The case would seem to have been conducted throughout with a due regard for the rights of the defendant. We have examined the other assignments, and find that they involve no error. The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

BARRERE v. SOMPS. (S. F. 127.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. June 4, 1896.)

PLEADING—INSUFFICIENCY OF ANSWER—ACTION ON CONTRACT—LIABILITY OF BAILEE.

1. Under a complaint for money deposited with defendant for plaintiff's use, alleging a promise to repay it to plaintiff on demand, testimony showing that the money was deposited with defendant to secure the return of certain property loaned to plaintiff under a contract of employment was inadmissible.

2. Where the answer denied specifically the allegations of the complaint, it was sufficient to raise the question of variance between the complaint and the proof.

3. Plaintiff contracted to sell goods manufactured by defendant under a guaranty as to profits, defendant furnishing a horse and wagon necessary to the business, to secure the return of which in good condition plaintiff deposited money with defendant. Held, that plaintiff, in order to recover the amount so deposited, must allege and show a fulfillment of the condition to return the property loaned.

4. The exercise of ordinary care to prevent loss or injury to a horse and wagon will not relieve plaintiff from liability for failure to return the property, unless such loss or injury was due to the defective appliances furnished by defendant.

5. On a recovery by plaintiff, he is entitled to interest only from the date of his demand for payment, and not from the date of the deposit.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Jean Barrere against P. G. Somps to recover money deposited with the defendant for the use of plaintiff. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Gordon & Young, for appellant. Naphtaly, Friedervirch & Ackerman, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. The allegations of the complaint in this action are as follows: "That the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of five hundred dollars, United States gold coin, heretofore deposited by plaintiff with the defendant, to and for the use of this plaintiff, and which said sum the defendant promised to repay to plaintiff on demand; that, although thereto requested, defendant has neglected and refused, and still neglects and refuses, to pay over the said sum of five hundred dollars to this plaintiff." The prayer was for judgment for said sum, with interest and costs. A general demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and the defendant answered, and (1) specifically denied the several averments of the complaint; (2) alleged the deposit of said sum under an agreement in writing executed by the parties to the action, a copy of which is attached to the answer, and which is as follows: "Exhibit A. This agreement, made this 28th day of September, 1890, between P. G. Somps, of San Francisco, the party of the first part, and Jean Barrere, of the same place, the party of the second part, witnesseth: Said party of the second part does hereby agree to purchase soda water from said party of the first part at the rate of seventy-five cents per dozen, and to resell the same; and said party of the first part does hereby guaranty to said party of the second part at least twenty dollars per week profit on such resales made by him, provided said party of the second part devotes his whole time to this business. And in consideration of said party of the second part purchasing from said party of the first part exclusively all soda water to be resold by him, said party of the first part does hereby hire unto said party of the second part horses and wagon and necessary syphon bottles for facilitating the sale of soda water. The party of the first part shall have the right to terminate this contract at any time, but said party of the second part cannot terminate it except on thirty (30) days' notice; and, at such termination, said party of the second part does hereby agree to make a full disclosure of the names and addresses of all his customers to said party of the first part. And as security for the faithful performance of his part of this contract, and to save and hold harmless said party of the first part from all damages arising by or through the acts of said party of the second part, and to secure the return of all property hired by said party of the second part, as aforesaid, in good order and condition, said party of the second part does hereby deposit with said party of the first part the sum of five hundred dollars. In witness whereof, the parties hereto have hereunto set their hands and seals this —— day of September, 1890. P. G. Somps. Jean Barrere. Witness: T. Carrolot." The second defense, after alleging the substance of the contract, alleged that plaintiff received from the defendant under said agreement one horse of the value of $125, one wagon, and 160 bottles of the value of $1 each; that plaintiff failed to return said horse and said bottles, and damaged said wagon while in his possession to the extent of $97.50; and on the termination of said contract failed and neglected to disclose to defendant the names and addresses of his customers, whereby said customers were lost to defendant, to his damage in the further sum of $500; and stated the aggregate of his damages at $882.50. The same facts were also alleged by way of counterclaim. A jury trial was had, and a verdict returned for the plaintiff for said sum of $500, with interest from September 28, 1890, the date of said agreement, and defendant appeals from the judgment entered thereon, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The plaintiff was called and examined as a witness in his own behalf, and during his examination in chief he testified that when he entered defendant's employment he paid him $500. His counsel then asked him, "What was the understanding with reference to that?" Counsel for defendant objected, on the ground that the contract under which the payment was made is in writing, and speaks for itself. It was then admitted that the copy of the contract attached to the answer was correct, and it was read in evidence by the plaintiff, his counsel contending, however, that it was a nullity, and "was never lived up to by the parties." After testifying to the route or district in which he was to sell soda water, and that he was paid $20 per week without regard to the quantity sold, he said, "I deposited $500 with him." His counsel then asked the following question: "You left this money there as security, did you?" Defendant objected to the question upon the ground that it was irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent under the pleadings; that if the plaintiff could sustain his action at all it must be upon the claim that he gave Mr. Somps $500, and that it had not been returned; that if plaintiff seeks to recover by reason of his compliance with the provisions of a contract, he has failed to bring any such action." Defendant's objection was overruled, and he excepted. The same question was again made by the defendant by motion for a nonsuit, the plaintiff having rested at the conclusion of his examination. In his motion for a nonsuit counsel for defendant contended that there was a variance between the pleadings and proofs; that plaintiff should have pleaded the contract, and the modifications of it. This motion was denied, and defendant excepted. While the common counts are in some cases sufficient under the Code, it is safe to say they are insufficient in those cases where they were insufficient under the old system of pleading. "Where a special contract is still open, and has not been rescinded by mutual consent, it is necessary to declare specially." 1 Chit. Pl. 368. This is not a case where a promise to repay upon demand is implied from the mere fact of a deposit. Here the money was deposited under a special contract, as security for its performance by the plaintiff, and is, therefore, a pledge. "A depositary is not bound to deliver a thing deposited without demand, even where the deposit is made for a specified time" (Civ. Code, § 1823); and "a depositary must deliver the thing to the person for whose benefit it was deposited on demand, * * * unless he has a lien on the thing deposited. * * *" (Id. § 1822). Something more than a demand was, therefore, necessary. The question whether the plaintiff had returned all the property in good order and condition, and whether he had made full disclosure of the names and addresses of his customers, and had faithfully performed his contract, were matters which, by the terms of the contract, were to precede its termination; and until these matters were settled or adjusted the contract remained, though as to the sale of the soda water it had ended. The very purpose of the deposit remained open and unadjusted, and the respective liabilities of the parties disputed and unsettled. Therefore, under the common-law system of pleading, the common count was not sustained by the evidence offered by the plaintiff, and much less has he complied with the code system, which requires him to allege every material fact which it is necessary for him to prove upon the trial. Under either system his allegations and proofs must agree, and it is not sufficient that his evidence discloses a cause of action against the defendant unless it be the cause of action he has alleged in his complaint. The first defense pleaded by the defendant denied specifically each material allegation of the complaint, and that defense was certainly as efficient to raise the question of variance as the denial under the old system that the defendant "did not promise in manner and form as in the declaration is alleged," which put in issue not only the promise, but all the facts alleged. Conceding, for the purposes of this opinion, that the common count is a sufficient complaint for the recovery of an ordinary deposit or bailment,—not upon condition,—and upon which an implied promise arises to repay upon demand, the evidence introduced by plaintiff showed an entirely different transaction, whatever may be the true construction of the contract between the parties. The contention of plaintiff that the contract created only the relation of employer and employé and not that of vendor and vendee as to the soda water, and that he was not a hirer of the horses, wagons, and syphon bottles, is immaterial so far as the questions above considered are concerned, as the security provided for in the contract was applicable to whatever relation was in fact created by it, and covered every injury the defendant may have suffered from the failure of the plaintiff to perform it. The conclusion we have reached renders a reversal necessary, and relieves us from the necessity of considering other questions made by appellant except so far as they may arise upon a new trial.

1. Interest on the deposit is not recoverable from the date of the deposit. The deposit was a condition upon which the contract was entered into, and, in the absence of a special provision in the agreement that defendant should pay interest, the profits or compensation plaintiff was to receive under the contract covered and included any incidental benefit the defendant may have received from its use until it became payable to plaintiff; but the plaintiff is entitled to interest upon the amount he may be entitled to recover from the date of his demand for repayment.

2. Whether the terms of the agreement and the conduct of the parties thereunder constituted the relation of vendor and purchaser of the soda water, or that of employer and employé, is of little importance, as there appears to be no controversy between the parties as to profit or compensation; and, as to plaintiff's liability for the loss of the horse and bottles and injury to the wagon, we think it must depend upon the construction of that provision of the contract relating to the return of the property in good order and condition, and the subsequent conduct of the parties thereunder; for, independently of the contract as to the return of the property, whether plaintiff was a hirer of the property or an employé for reward, he was bound to exercise ordinary care in its use. Civ. Code, §§ 1852, 1978; Wood, Mast. & S. § 325. The court below instructed the jury, in effect, that the written contract was nothing more than an agreement between master and servant, and that it was the duty of the plaintiff as an employé to use reasonable and ordinary care in the preservation of his master's property intrusted to him. The construction thus given is that which would have been required if the following clause had been omitted from the contract, viz.: "And to secure the return of all property hired by said party of the second part, as aforesaid, in good order and condition, said party of the second part does hereby deposit with said party of the first part the sum of five hundred dollars;" and, therefore, unless this language increases plaintiff's liability beyond that which the law attaches to a bailment for hire, or the responsibility of an employé for the want of ordinary care, its insertion in the contract was idle and meaningless. This cannot be presumed. It was intended to have some effect, and we see nothing in the contract itself, or in the circumstances surrounding the parties at the time it was made, to change the natural meaning of the clause in question. It is not an answer to defendant's contention to say that it is a hardship upon the plaintiff to be compelled to pay for losses not attributable to his want of ordinary care. As was said in Transportation Co. v. O'Neil, 98 Cal. 5, 32 Pac. 705: "Where a party has expressly undertaken, without qualification, to do anything not naturally or necessarily impossible under all circumstances, and he does not do it, he must make compensation in damages, though the performance was rendered impracticable, or even impossible, by some unforeseen cause over which he had no control, but against which he might have provided in his contract; * * * and the only qualification or limitation of this obligation by the law is that it would not bind the defendant in case the loss had been caused by the culpable negligence or other wrongful act of the plaintiff." See, also, Dermott v. Jones, 2 Wall. 6, where it was said: "No matter how harsh and apparently unjust in its operation the rule may occasionally be, it cannot be denied that it has its foundation in good sense and inflexible honesty. He that agrees to do an act should do it, unless absolutely impossible. He should provide against contingencies in his contract." The qualification laid down in Transportation Co. v. O'Neil, supra, must not be lost sight of, however, as the subsequent conduct of the defendant may have been such as to relieve the plaintiff from this clause of the contract. If the defendant furnished to the plaintiff, to be used by him in the performance of the contract, a horse of peculiar habits, which rendered his use unsafe, or required unusual care on the part of the driver, and these peculiarities were known to the defendant and unknown to the plaintiff, or if the horse was used by the plaintiff in the manner directed by the defendant, or if the plaintiff used the only means provided by the defendant to prevent it from running away, the plaintiff would not be liable for the damages caused by its running away. The defendant was to furnish all the appliances necessary or proper for the business to be done by the plaintiff, and if he provided a hook attached to the seat of the wagon for the purpose of fastening the lines when the driver left the wagon, and furnished no other means of securing the horses, it was equivalent to a direction to secure them in that way. This mode of securing the team, we may reasonably suppose, was intended by the defendant to economize the time of the plaintiff, and to thus enable him to visit more customers, and sell more soda water, and thus promote the business interests of the plaintiff. Whether the acts or directions of the plaintiff were of the character above outlined, and whether the injury to the horse and wagon and the destruction of the bottles were caused thereby, are questions of fact about which no opinion is expressed. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, with leave to both parties to amend their pleadings.

We concur: BRITT, C.; BELCHER, C.

PEOPLE v. CURTIS. (Cr. 120.)

CRIMINAL LAW—ORDER TO DISMISS—ERRONEOUS ENTRY—CORRECTION OF MINUTES.

1. Defendant and others, as county supervisors, were indicted separately for having, corruptly and in violation of official duty, voted for the payment of a claim against the county. Other indictments were also returned charging illegal voting for the appointment and payment of certain officials. Defendant was acquitted on the latter charge, and, when the case of another supervisor on this charge was called, the district attorney moved to dismiss all such cases. No list of the cases included in the motion was made, and, after the order was granted, the clerk, at the suggestion of the attorney for the defendant, entered in his rough minutes a memorandum of dismissal as to the cases in the first class as well as those in the second class. Held that, on the discovery of the mistake before entry of the order in the regular minutes, it was within the power of the court to correct the order to make it conform to the intent of the motion, and to vacate so much thereof as applied to the cases not intended to be included.

2. The preliminary minutes of dismissal acquired no force by the subsequent filing of a formal order, attested by the clerk, as filed on the date of the original order; it appearing that the docket was prepared by the procurement of the attorney for the defendant after the vacating order, and with full knowledge thereof.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; A. P. Catlin, Judge.

William Curtis was indicted for having, while holding the office of county supervisor, corruptly and in violation of his official duty, voted for the payment of a claim against the county. An order dismissing the indictment having been erroneously entered, the court made a second order vacating the order of dismissal, from which defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Robert T. Devlin and C. T. Jones, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

HARRISON, J. The grand jury of the county of Sacramento presented this accusation against the defendant for having, while holding the office of supervisor of that county, corruptly and in violation of his official duty, voted for the payment of a claim against the county. Other accusations were at the same time presented against him for illegally voting for the appointment and payment of certain deputy assessors; and similar accusations against other supervisors were also presented by the grand jury. While these accusations were pending in the superior court of Sacramento county, the trial of one of them against the defendant, for illegally voting for the appointment and payment of a deputy assessor, was had, and resulted in an acquittal. On the next day, October 3d, one of the accusations (People v. Morrison, No. 1,403) was on the calendar of the court for trial; and the district attorney stated to the court that the testimony in the case would be the same, and the question the same, as in the case of People v. Curtis, which had just been tried; that there were a considerable number of such cases, and it would, under the facts and the law as ruled by the court on the trial of People v. Curtis, be impossible to convict the defendants. Upon this statement, and the motion of the district attorney therefor, the court directed the dismissal of all such cases. It does not appear that there was presented to the court any list or statement of the cases to which the order of dismissal was directed, but, after the order had been made, the clerk, at the request of the attorney for the defendant herein, entered in pencil, in his rough minutes, in 23 cases, including the present one, the following order: "The above-entitled action coming on regularly this day for trial, District Attorney F. D. Ryan and S. Solon Holl appearing in court as counsel for the people, and Robt. T. Devlin and Chas. T. Jones appearing for the defendant, upon motion of the district attorney it is ordered that the above-entitled action be, and the same is hereby, dismissed." On the 8th of October, and before the clerk had entered any of these orders in the regular minutes, the court made an order vacating the aforesaid order of dismissal so far as it related to the present case (and also five others), upon the ground that it was made through inadvertence and mistake. From this order the present appeal has been taken.

It is recited in the bill of exceptions that, in making the order for dismissal, the court understood from the statement of the district attorney "that the cases which he moved to dismiss were those only in which the defendants were accused of misconduct in having illegally voted for the payment of the salary of sundry deputy officials; that an examination of the accusations in six of the cases (including the present) shows that said cases are of a different character altogether from that of People v. Curtis, tried on the 1st and 2d of October; that the nature and character of such cases were not brought to the attention of the court, nor the clerk thereof, by the district attorney or any other attorney, and the court did not intend to dismiss, and did not dismiss, any of the last-mentioned cases; that the clerk, in making the entries in his rough minutes of the order of the court, received his instructions as to the particular cases from the attorneys for the defendants in those cases."

Under the facts here stated, the action of the court in vacating the order of dismissal must be affirmed. The power of a court to cause its records to correctly set forth the orders which it has actually made, as well as to set aside an order which it has made through inadvertence or mistake, is too well established to require argument (Hall v. Polack, 42 Cal. 218; Wiggin v. Superior Court, 68 Cal. 398, 9 Pac. 646; Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 478, 26 Pac. 1074; Kaufman v. Shain (Cal.) 43 Pac. 393; and, if the question of mistake or inadvertence is disputed, the decision of the judge upon any controverted fact is not open to review. In the present case the statement in the bill of exceptions that the motion to dismiss was based upon the ground that the other cases involved only the same questions as those presented in the case just tried is not controverted; and it follows, not only that the statement of the court that it did not intend to dismiss any other cases must be accepted as conclusive, but also that the entry by the clerk dismissing any other cases was made under a mistake on his part in failing to comprehend the scope of the order. When these facts were brought to the notice of the court, it became its duty, either at the instance of the district attorney or upon its own motion, without any suggestion from either party, to vacate and set aside the entry that had been made by the clerk.

The pencil order of dismissal which was originally made did not acquire any force by reason of the subsequent filing of a formal order attested by the hand and seal of the clerk, and indorsed by him as "filed October 3, 1895." It was found by the court that this document was prepared by the procurement of the attorney for the defendant, without the knowledge or authority of the court, and after the attorney knew of the order of October 8th vacating the entry of dismissal that had been made by the clerk October 3d, and that it was not made or filed until after October 8th. The order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BROWN. (Cr. 109.)

CRIMINAL LAW—JUDGMENT OF CONVICTION—FINE—IMPRISONMENT—LIEN—EXECUTION.

1. Pen. Code, § 1205, which provides that "a judgment that the defendant pay a fine, may also direct that he be imprisoned until the fine be satisfied, specifying the extent of imprisonment, which must not exceed one day for every dollar of the fine," applies only where there is no direct judgment of imprisonment coupled with the judgment of fine.

2. Under Pen. Code, § 1206, which provides that "a judgment that the defendant pay a fine constitutes a lien in like manner as a judgment for money rendered in a civil action," the judgment is a lien, if it be for a fine without the alternative of imprisonment, whether it be one of imprisonment and fine, or one simply of fine, not coupled with a judgment of imprisonment.

3. Under Pen. Code, § 1214, which provides that, "if the judgment is for a fine alone, execution may be issued thereon as on a judgment in a civil case," execution may issue, if there is a fine without the alternative of imprisonment, whether it be a judgment of fine coupled with a judgment of imprisonment, or one simply of fine without a judgment of imprisonment.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; Stanton L. Carter, Judge.

Charles Brown was convicted of an assault with a deadly weapon. From an order denying his motion to recall and quash an execution issued to collect a fine imposed by the court as a part of its judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

S. J. Hinds, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal from an order of the lower court denying defendant's motion to recall and quash the execution issued upon a judgment pronounced upon the verdict of the jury finding the defendant guilty of an assault with a deadly weapon; said execution having been issued with the intention of collecting the sum of $750, a fine imposed by the court as part of its judgment. Said judgment was to the effect that the defendant be punished by imprisonment in the county jail of the county of Fresno, state of California, for a period of one year, and that he pay a fine of $750, and, in default of the payment of the fine, that he be imprisoned in the said jail until said fine was paid, at the rate of one day for each two dollars of the fine. That portion of this judgment which provides that in default of the payment of the fine the defendant should be imprisoned until the fine be paid, at the rate of one day for each two dollars of the fine, is void. This court has repeatedly held that where a judgment of imprisonment has been rendered, and also a judgment of fine, there can be no imprisonment to satisfy the fine. Ex parte Rosenheim, 83 Cal. 388, 23 Pac. 372; People v. Hamberg, 84 Cal. 475, 24 Pac. 298; Lowrey v. Hogue, 85 Cal. 602, 24 Pac. 995. There is nothing to be found in Ex parte Green, 94 Cal. 387, 29 Pac. 783, which in any way militates against the principle declared by the foregoing authorities, as is contended by the attorney general. A case then presents itself where a judgment of both imprisonment and fine stands against the defendant, and in such a case may the fine be collected by forced sale and execution? The statute expressly authorizes a judgment of both imprisonment and fine, and, if in such a case the fine may not be collected by levy of execution and sale, it cannot be collected at all, for it is not probable that a defendant will voluntarily pay a fine in the absence of any penalty for its nonpayment; and, the law being that it is nonenforceable by imprisonment, it is a nullity, as far as practical results are concerned, unless it may be collected by a forced sale. And we will not give such a construction to the law, if it is reasonably susceptible of any other. We are then brought to an examination of the provisions of the Penal Code bearing upon the question at hand. Those sections read:

"Sec. 1205. A judgment that the defendant pay a fine may also direct that he be imprisoned until the fine be satisfied, specifying the extent of imprisonment, which must not exceed one day for every dollar of the fine.

"Sec. 1206. A judgment that the defendant pay a fine constitutes a lien in like manner as a judgment for money rendered in a civil action."

"Sec. 1214. If the judgment is for a fine alone, execution may be issued thereon as on a judgment in a civil action."

It will be seen, by the authorities previously quoted, that section 1205 only applies where there is no direct and express judgment of imprisonment; that is, if there is a judgment of imprisonment coupled with a judgment of fine, then the fine is not enforceable by imprisonment. A fair construction of section 1206 is that if the judgment be for a fine, without the alternative of imprisonment, it constitutes a lien upon defendant's realty; and we think this construction equally sound whether the judgment be one of imprisonment and fine, or one simply of fine not coupled with a judgment of imprisonment. We likewise conclude the true meaning of section 1214 to be that, if there is a fine alone,—that is, a fine without the alternative of imprisonment,—then an execution may issue as in civil actions; and, as in section 1206, we think this is equally true whether the judgment be one of fine coupled with a judgment of imprisonment, or whether it be simply a judgment of fine without a judgment of imprisonment. By this construction the words, "if the judgment is for a fine alone," refer to a case where there is no alternative imprisonment to enforce the fine, and not to a case where there is a judgment of imprisonment coupled with the fine. By adopting this construction the sections all become a harmonious whole, and for every contingency contemplated by the legislative mind provision is made. For the foregoing reasons the order is affirmed.

GRAND LARCENY—ATTEMPT TO COMMIT—EVIDENCE.

Evidence that defendant, learning that the prosecuting witness had $4,000 deposited in his wife's name, gained his confidence, and took him into a lottery shop, where, after being induced by defendant to try his luck, he was allowed to draw a prize of $4,000, but was told, when he demanded it, that he must first show an equal amount of money; that defendant went with him to get the money, and after his wife, in whose name it was deposited, had drawn it, returned with them to the lottery shop at the time agreed on, where they found another man in charge, who said that the man in charge when the prize was drawn had gone to get the money; that this new man and also defendant told the wife that she must give the money to her husband, and go out of the shop, as women were not allowed in it; that witness and his wife, suspecting a trick, went away with their money,—is sufficient to support a conviction of attempt to commit grand larceny.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

William Mason was convicted of an attempt to commit grand larceny, and appeals from the judgment, and an order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

Reel B. Terry, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald and William S. Barnes, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant was convicted of the offense of "an attempt to commit grand larceny." It is now insisted that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict of the jury, and this brings us to a consideration of the sole question involved in the case, and that is as to the amount and character of evidence necessary to constitute the offense of attempt to commit grand larceny. It is practically admitted that, if the defendant had finally been successful in securing the money of the prosecuting witness, Manino, the offense would have been grand larceny. But his hopes and plans in that direction were never consummated; hence a larceny was not committed. And it is now insisted by defendant that his schemes, artifices, and acts looking towards his possession of Manino's money had not progressed to that point of constituting the offense of attempt to commit grand larceny when the prospective victim became alarmed, and defendant's labors went for naught.

The facts are interesting, though the tale has often been told in courts of justice before. Manino had $4,000 in bank, and was desirous of investing in the saloon business. The defendant, a stranger, casually met him, and suggested that he also would like to go into the saloon business, and proposed a partnership. A friendly acquaintance arose between them. Manino was compelled to leave the city for a few days. Upon his return, defendant immediately called upon him, and suggested the purchase of another place, upon better terms than the one they had previously had in view. They went to a distant portion of the city, and viewed the proposed purchase; and upon their return, when opposite 125 O'Farrell street, the following occurred, as shown by the testimony of the witness Manino: "He stopped and said: 'I have some tickets in a lottery, and I will go in and see if I have won anything.' We went in. There was a man behind a counter. The defendant produced some lottery tickets, and the man behind the counter, after looking at a printed list of numbers, said, 'You have won $110,' and handed the money to defendant. Defendant said, 'Give me $10 worth of tickets,' and then asked me to try my luck. I pulled out some cards or tickets from a pack handed me, and the man behind the counter said: 'You are very lucky. You have won $4,000, —$2,000 for you, and $2,000 for your friend.' I was very much excited, and said: 'Give me the money.' He said: 'It is a rule of this house not to give money to irresponsible people. You must show that you have an equal amount of money before you can get it.' I said: 'I will get the money. When will I come back?' He said: 'One o'clock.' I said: 'I am afraid that I can't be back by that time. Make it half past one.' I said: 'Come on, Miller [defendant], can you get your $2,000?' He said, 'That is all right; I have plenty of money,' and showed me some checks. We went as fast as we could to my home, and I told my wife to hurry up and come to the Hibernia Bank, and get the money, as I had won $4,000, and had to show that much. She changed her dress, and she, Miller, and I, and the old man John Ciaco started for the bank. Miller did not go into the bank with us. He waited outside. My wife drew the money, $4,000, and the cashier put it in a bag, and handed it to me, and I handed it to my wife. We started for O'Farrell street. My wife handed the money to the old man to carry. We hurried up and got to the place. The man who had been there in the morning was not there. There was another man there. I asked him where the man who was there in the morning was. He replied that he had gone to the bank to get the money, and would not be back until three o'clock. I asked him for a receipt to show that I had got back before one o'clock. He wrote a receipt that I was back before one. I again asked for the money. He told me to wait. My wife asked for a drink of water. He told her it was against the rules to have women in the house. He told her to give me the money, and go. Miller, the defendant, also told her. She said, 'I think there is some trick here, and I am going,' and told me to come on. Defendant, my wife, myself, and the old man went outside. I said: 'Miller, I think this is a trick, and, if it is, I will prosecute you.' He said: 'Oh, no; I know these people, and they treated us nicely this morning.'"

This recital of the facts makes it plain to a certainty that defendant was doing his best to defraud Manino of his money. Defendant was playing a confidence game, and "bunco" is its name. See definition of "bunco" in Century Dictionary. That Manino was not buncoed out of his money is attributable to his good wife, rather than to his good sense. If defendant had secured the possession of this money to the loss of Manino, it would have been grand larceny. Did he so attempt to secure the possession of it? If so, he is guilty as charged. That the acts he did in pursuance of a preconceived plan constituted an attempt we have no doubt. An "attempt" is defined as an effort or endeavor; an act tending towards the accomplishment of a purpose which exceeds a mere intent or design, and falls short of an execution of it. Am. & Eng. Enc. Law. Justice Blackburn said in Reg. v. Cheeseman, Leigh & C. 140: "There is, no doubt, a difference between the preparation incident to the offense and the actual attempt; but, if the actual transaction has commenced which would have ended the crime if not interrupted, there is clearly an attempt to commit the crime." In People v. Stites, 75 Cal. 570, 17 Pac. 693, the question as to what in law was sufficient to constitute an attempt was learnedly discussed; and in that case, upon facts which for legal strength are in no degree comparable to those presented by this record, the defendant was held guilty under the evidence of an attempt to commit a felony. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

PERJURY—INDICTMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

An indictment for perjury must state positively that the defendant was sworn, and that the person who administered the oath to him had authority therefor, as required by Pen. Code, § 966.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Martha Dunlap was indicted for perjury. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the indictment, the people appeal. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald and F. A. Dorn, for the People. Wilcoxon & Bouldin and Graves & Graves, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The defendant was indicted for perjury in making a false statement of her property to the county assessor of the county of San Luis Obispo. A demurrer to the indictment was sustained, and the people have appealed from the judgment entered thereon.

Without considering all the objections made to the sufficiency of the indictment, the failure to state therein that the defendant was sworn or took an oath before any person authorized to administer the same was a sufficient ground for sustaining the demurrer. The indictment states that the defendant appeared before Charles O. King, the county assessor, and said King, as such assessor, "then and there exacted and required of said Martha Dunlap a statement under oath" of the property owned by her on the first Monday in March, 1895; that thereupon before said King, who was then the county assessor, and "had authority to administer such oath," the said Martha Dunlap "did then and there willfully, corruptly, falsely, and feloniously testify, declare, depose, swear, and certify" (giving the facts to which she made oath, and negativing their truth). Although it is stated in the indictment that the defendant "well knew that said statement and oath were false, fraudulent, untrue, and was a statement of material matter," and were "in a case in which said oath was by law properly administered," and "after having taken an oath that she would testify truly," she "willfully, falsely, and contrary to such oath corruptly and feloniously swore and testified to said false and material facts, as aforesaid," it is nowhere stated that she was sworn, or that an oath was in fact administered to her, or that she took any oath whatever; and, although it is stated that the assessor exacted from her a "statement under oath," and "had authority to administer an oath," and that her statement was before him "in a case in which said oath was properly administered," it is not stated that the assessor, or any other person, did in fact administer an oath to her. It is requisite to the sufficiency of an indictment that it shall state every fact and circumstance which is essential to constitute the offense charged, and that the statement of every such fact and circumstance be direct and positive. The want of such direct and positive statement cannot be supplied by any intendment or implication, and, if stated merely argumentatively, or by way of recital or inference, it is insufficient. In an indictment for perjury it must appear that the defendant was sworn, and that the person who administered the oath to him had authority therefor. This is apparent from the definition of the offense (Pen. Code, § 118), and also from the provisions in section 966, which direct that there be set forth in an indictment for perjury "in what court and before whom the oath alleged to be false was taken, and that the court or the person before whom it was taken had authority to administer it." Under a similar statute in New Hampshire it was held that an indictment which charged that the defendant "made and subscribed in open court, the said court then and there having competent and sufficient authority to administer an oath to said defendant, falsely, willfully, and knowingly the following false and corrupt oath," setting forth the matter sworn to (Rev. St. c. 217, § 4), was insufficient, for failure to allege that the defendant was sworn. State v. Divoll, 44 N. H. 140. In the opinion in that case reference was made to various authorities in which forms of indictment for perjury are given, all of which contain in some form the allegation that the defendant was sworn. The same ruling was made in U. S. v. McConaughy, 33 Fed. 168. See, also, 2 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 912; Whart. Cr. Law, § 1287. The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CUMMINGS. (Cr. 117.)

CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—QUESTIONS OF FACT.

A statement in an instruction in a criminal trial that evidence has been introduced tending to show certain facts is not in violation of Const. art. 6, § 19, prohibiting courts from instructing with respect to matters of fact. People v. Vasquez, 49 Cal. 560, followed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Riverside county; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

John Cummings was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

W. M. Peck and A. A. Adair, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

HARRISON, J. The defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree, and was thereafter adjudged to suffer the penalty of death. From this judgment he has appealed, bringing the appeal before this court upon the judgment roll alone, without any bill of exceptions. The only error assigned in support of the appeal is that in giving the instructions to the jury the court made the following statement: "Testimony has been introduced before you tending to show that the defendant, John Cummings, and others, were engaged in the robbery of one T. C. Narramore, at the time and place mentioned in the information in this case, and that while so engaged, and in furtherance of the common purpose of defendant, Cummings and his associates did accomplish this robbery; and testimony has been introduced before you tending to show that the deceased, Narramore, was slain by the defendant, or by some of the parties with whom he was then engaged in the robbery." It is objected that the court thereby violated the provision of section 19 of article 6 of the constitution, and instructed the jury with respect to matters of fact. As the appellant has not brought up the evidence, we must assume that it fully sustained the statement by the court of what the evidence tended to show. The above instruction is identical in language with that which was approved in People v. Vasquez, 49 Cal. 560, and the reasons which are now presented against its correctness were then fully considered by the court, and deemed insufficient. The principle of the instruction was afterwards affirmed by the court in People v. Perry, 65 Cal. 568, 4 Pac. 572; Morris v. Lachman, 68 Cal. 109, 8 Pac. 799; and People v. Giancoli, 74 Cal. 642, 16 Pac. 510. We are satisfied that the judicial interpretation then given to this section of the constitution is correct, and upon the authority of those cases the judgment is affirmed.

STITES et al. v. GATER. (S. F. 45.)

EJECTMENT—PLEADING—ANSWER—ADMISSION.

In ejectment for 2.12 acres of land plaintiffs alleged they were owners, and that defendant excluded them from possession. Defendant's answer denied every allegation "except as hereinafter stated," and then admitted defendant was in possession of 1.65 acres, and that he withheld the same from plaintiffs; but denied the possession or withholding of the remainder. Held, that the answer did not admit that plaintiffs owned .47 of an acre of the land.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. Dougherty, Judge.

Ejectment by A. H. Stites and others against J. E. Gater. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Moreland & Norton (Rutledge & Pressley, of counsel), for appellants. Albert G. Burnett and J. R. Leppo, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Ejectment for 2.12 acres of land. The pleadings were unverified. Plaintiffs alleged that they are the owners of the land described in the complaint, and that defendant excludes them from the possession thereof. By his answer defendant denied generally "each and every allegation in said complaint contained except as hereinafter stated." He then expressly admitted himself to be in possession of 1.65 acres of the premises demanded by plaintiffs, and that he withholds the same from them, but denied the possession or withholding of the remainder. The court found that plaintiffs are not the owners of the lands claimed by them, or any part thereof, and rendered judgment in defendant's favor. Plaintiffs claim here that the findings and judgment contravene the pleadings, because, they say, the answer admits that plaintiffs own .47 of an acre of the land. The allegation of ownership in the complaint is put in issue by the general denial of the answer, and the denial is not qualified by the subsequent admissions. Plaintiffs were therefore put to their proofs as to all the land described in their complaint. The appeal is without merit, and the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

HOEFT v. SUPREME LODGE KNIGHTS OF HONOR et al. (S. F. 163.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 2, 1896.)

BENEFIT CERTIFICATES—PROOF OF ISSUANCE—DEFECTS—WAIVER—BENEFICIARIES—INTEREST—SUBSTITUTION PROCURED BY FRAUD—JUDGMENT—PRESUMPTIONS.

1. Where the record fails to show that a demurrer to a pleading was disposed of, it will be presumed, in favor of the judgment, that it was disposed of, especially if the demurrer is without merit.

2. In an action against a benefit association on its benefit certificate, to which stepchildren of plaintiff, as contestants, are joined as defendants, an admission by the association that the certificate was in fact issued, and payment of the amount thereof into court by it, operate as a waiver by all the defendants of proof of issuance and of any irregularities in the certificate.

3. Children, as beneficiaries in a certificate of membership of their father in a benefit association, acquire no vested interest therein by law till death of their father.

4. Where, by fraud, one procures his substitution as beneficiary in a benefit certificate, an action for the fraud will not lie against him by the original beneficiary.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Catherine Hoeft against the Supreme Lodge Knights of Honor and others on a benefit certificate. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Scrivner & Schell, for appellants. Boyd, Fifield & Hoburg, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Appeal from the judgment given in favor of plaintiff upon the pleadings. Plaintiff, the widow of Henry Hoeft, sued defendant, a benefit association, to recover $2,000 upon a certificate issued in her name, at request of the insured member, Henry Hoeft. The defendant Supreme Lodge, for answer, paid the money into court, and asked that the children of Henry Hoeft be allowed to appear and contest. This was permitted, and the children—defendants and appellants herein—interposed a general demurrer to plaintiff's complaint, and thereafter filed an answer and cross complaint. The court, upon motion, gave plaintiff judgment upon the pleadings, and this appeal followed.

1. The objection that the court had no power to pass judgment until it disposed of the demurrer is sound as a proposition of law, but untenable under this record. It does not appear that the demurrer was not disposed of, and, as error will not be presumed, it will be assumed that it was. Moreover, the demurrer was without merit. Loftus v. Fischer, 106 Cal. 616, 39 Pac. 1064.

2. It is contended that the answer, by its denials, joined issue with plaintiff upon certain of her allegations, and that the issues were material, and required evidence for their determination. The denial that the certificate was issued to plaintiff in accordance with the regulations of the order is disposed of by the admission of the order that the certificate was actually issued, and by its payment into court of the money due thereunder. The regulations of the order are for its own protection, not for the protection of the beneficiaries, and the order has power to waive a strict compliance with them. It is not denied that the certificate to plaintiff was in fact issued. McLaughlin v. McLaughlin, 104 Cal. 171, 37 Pac. 865; Adams v. Grand Lodge, 105 Cal. 321, 38 Pac. 914; Martin v. Stubbings, 126 Ill. 387, 18 N. E. 657; Thomas v. Thomas, 131 N. Y. 205, 30 N. E. 61. The principle enunciated disposes of all of the denials of the defendants which are similar, e. g. that the insured did not sign in the blank space left for his signature, and did not comply with all the requirements and regulations of the order in procuring the issuance of the certificate of plaintiff.

3. The principal question presented is raised by the new matter pleaded by defendants in their cross complaint. They set forth that plaintiff is their stepmother. Originally their father—the insured—procured a certificate to be issued in the name of their mother, his then wife. Upon her death a certificate was issued in their favor. In the course of time he married plaintiff, and thereafter surrendered the certificate in favor of them, and caused the certificate under which plaintiff claims to be issued to her. The last change, it is averred, was accomplished through the fraudulent representations, undue influence, coercion and duress practiced and exercised upon their father by his wife, this plaintiff. The specific averments to support this charge are to the last degree meager and inconclusive; but, passing that, under an assumption of their sufficiency, we come to consider whether a cause of action is stated. If so, the judgment must be reversed; if not, it was properly given.

Defendants do not plead any contract with their deceased father, or any special equities which would deprive him of the right to make a change, but stand upon the ground that they may contest because the change was procured by fraud. But, if it was a fraud, did they have a right to complain? Clearly they had not, unless either by contract or in law they had some vested interest or right in the certificate which had formerly been taken out in their favor. They claim no such vested interest by contract. If it exists at all, then, it exists by operation of law. But such rights are either constitutional or statutory, and we are referred to no law which secures to them a right of action for such a cause. If they had a vested right in the certificate as such, then the insured himself, of his own volition, and without the fraudulent contrivance of a third person, could not substitute a new beneficiary. But this is not and cannot be claimed, for the contract is between the order and the insured. The beneficiary's interest is the mere expectancy of an incompleted gift, which is revocable at the will of the insured, and which does not and cannot become vested as a right until fixed by his death. If it is said that a devisee under a will has, during the life of the testator, a like naked expectancy, it may be freely conceded that it is so; but to the heirs and devisees is confirmed a right of action for fraud, etc., by the provisions of the Code. Otherwise they, too, would come within the scope of the general principle that a right of action for fraud is personal and untransferable. One cannot be defrauded of that in which he has no vested right. A vested right is property, which the law protects, while a mere expectancy is not property, and therefore is not protected. These views will be found supported without conflict by a multitude of authorities from which may be cited: Nibl. Mut. Ben. Soc. (2d Ed.) § 234a; Brown v. Grand Lodge, 80 Iowa, 287, 45 N. W. 884; Schillinger v. Boes, 85 Ky. 357, 3 S. W. 427; Robinson v. Association, 68 Fed. 825; Supreme Conclave v. Cappella, 41 Fed. 1; Lamont v. Grand Lodge, 31 Fed. 177; Knights of Honor v. Watson, 64 N. H. 517, 15 Atl. 125; Beatty's Appeal, 122 Pa. St. 428, 15 Atl. 861; Martin v. Stubbings, 126 Ill. 387, 18 N. E. 657. In our own state the cases of Swift v. Exchange Board, 67 Cal. 567, 8 Pac. 94; Order of Mutual Companions v. Griest, 76 Cal. 494, 18 Pac. 652; Bowman v. Moore, 87 Cal. 306, 25 Pac. 409; and McLaughlin v. McLaughlin, 104 Cal. 171, 37 Pac. 865,—recognize the same general principles.

Jory v. Supreme Council, 105 Cal. 20, 38 Pac. 524, and the cases involving a like consideration, differ radically from the case at bar. There is no conflict in the decisions nor confusion in the principles. In the Jory Case the insured endeavored to change the beneficiary, and did everything possible to that end except to surrender the outstanding certificate. This he was prevented from doing by the fraud and contrivance of the beneficiary named therein, who refused to part with it. As between the two claimants to the fund, namely, the holder of the earlier certificate which the insured had in effect canceled, and the beneficiary last named, equity, not demanding impossibilities, and not permitting one to take advantage of his own wrong, decreed that the latter had the better right. In other words, it gave complete effect to the acts of the insured. In this case appellants ask to have the acts of the insured nullified,—an essentially different demand. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

WARNER v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (Sac. 72.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. June 4, 1896.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—LIABILITY FOR MALICIOUS ACT OF SERVANT—VINDICTIVE DAMAGES.

A railroad company is not liable for vindictive or punitive damages on account of a wanton or malicious act of a conductor of one of its trains towards a passenger in executing the authority given him, unless the malicious act was either authorized or ratified. It is at most only liable for the actual damages sustained.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. R. Webb, Judge.

Action by Willis T. Warner against the Southern Pacific Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. B. Campbell, C. C. Merriam, and R. B. Terry, for appellant. Mark Walser and Frank H. Short, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial. The material averments of the complaint are that, while plaintiff was traveling on a railroad train of defendant from Fresno to Fowler, and after he had given to the conductor a proper ticket, the latter demanded of plaintiff a second fare, and applied to him abusive epithets, and forcibly ejected him from the car in which he was riding onto the platform, and, with other employés of defendant, assaulted and beat him, and threatened to throw him from the moving train, to his damage in the sum of $25,000; and that by reason thereof he was unable to attend to business for six days, and was compelled to employ a physician, to whom he incurred for medical services a bill of $5, and that his loss of time was of the value of $10. All these averments are denied in the answer, and it is also therein averred that plaintiff was intoxicated, boisterous, profane, etc., in the presence of the other passengers, including women and children, and made of himself an absolute nuisance, and that defendant's employés used no more force than was necessary to keep him quiet, and protect themselves and the other passengers. The evidence was conflicting as to some of the main facts. After the train started from Fresno towards Fowler, the plaintiff and some companions, among whom were three men named Griffin, Gray, and Metcalf, were collected around and near the stove in the rear end of the car. The evidence shows beyond doubt that some of this party were boisterous, and more or less intoxicated, and used loud, profane, and obscene language, to the great annoyance of the passengers, some of whom were ladies. Whether or not plaintiff personally was guilty of such conduct is a matter about which the witnesses differed. The plaintiff and Gray testified that plaintiff did not use any bad language prior to a certain personal conflict with the conductor, to be noticed hereafter, but plaintiff admitted that he did use such language after said conflict; while other witnesses—particularly Thompson, Patterson, Willow, and Waggener—testified that he used such language all the time, and kept it up until the train reached Fowler, and drew and flourished a knife. As to the personal conflict above referred to there is a very decided conflict of evidence. The plaintiff's testimony was, in substance, this: He was sitting on the coal box, with some other persons, including Griffin, Gray, and Metcalf, near him, when Gordon, the conductor, came through the car, taking up tickets. Griffin had no ticket, but gave the conductor a dollar, which he put in his pocket. Plaintiff then gave the conductor his ticket, which the former accepted, punched, and put in his pocket, and was about to go out of the door when Griffin asked him for his change. The conductor told Griffin to "keep his shirt on," and went out, but returned "in a minute or two," and gave him his change. He then turned to plaintiff, and said, "You have not paid your fare." Plaintiff, according to his statement, said, "I beg your pardon, I have," whereupon the conductor immediately called him a G——d d——d liar, and said that he would throw him off if he did not pay. Plaintiff said: "I don't wish to be thrown off. If that ain't satisfactory, I am willing to pay you a second time." But the conductor, without waiting to be paid the second time, caught him by the shoulder, and plaintiff, slipping, was drawn by the conductor through the door onto the platform, and there held down and beaten. Such are the main features of plaintiff's testimony, and as to the most important facts stated by him he was corroborated by Gray and Griffin, and to some extent by the witness Treece. The testimony of the conductor as to this personal conflict was radically different from that of plaintiff, and was substantially this: When he reached the end of the car he took tickets from plaintiff and two other men near the stove, Griffin giving him a ticket, and not money, and was about to go out of the door, when an employé of the defendant, who was traveling on the car, told him that he had missed a man behind the stove; and, turning back, he discovered Metcalf, and asked him for a ticket, and Metcalf said that he had given him one. The conductor told him that he had not, and he replied that he would not pay any more, whereupon the conductor informed him that he must pay or get off, and reached over, and took hold of Metcalf, and raised him up. At that moment Griffin grabbed the conductor by the shoulders, and either Griffin or plaintiff said that no d——d conductor could put his friend off the train. The conductor then let go of Metcalf, and a personal conflict occurred between the conductor and Griffin, which ended in both landing on the platform, Griffin being down, and the conductor on top of him; and, the former crying to be let up, the conductor did so, and went back into the car, where he then collected Metcalf's fare without further trouble. He then went out of that car, and did not return to it until after Fowler, where plaintiff got off, had been passed. According to his testimony, he never struck plaintiff, or laid hands on him, or touched him, or had any personal conflict with him whatever. In this testimony he was fully corroborated by Willetts, who was a brakeman following the conductor through the car; by Powers, who was also a brakeman, and was present and witnessed the occurrence; and by the witnesses Willow and Thompson, who had no business relation with the defendant, but happened to be passengers on the car when the difficulty occurred. All of these witnesses testified positively that there was no personal collision between the conductor and plaintiff, and that it was entirely between the former and Griffin. Upon the cross-examination of Griffin he admitted that he had verified a complaint in an action brought by himself against the defendant for damages sustained on this same occasion, which action was afterwards dismissed.

[1] Rehearing denied.

Counsel for appellant strongly argue that the evidence—the outlines and substance of which are above given—is insufficient to sustain the finding of the jury that the conductor ever touched the plaintiff, or injured him in any manner whatever. They argue that the story of plaintiff is so improbable and unnatural that whatever reason there might be for believing it if it stood alone is entirely swept away by the testimony of the witnesses for defendant. And it is, indeed, somewhat difficult to believe that a conductor having any regard for his own interest and safety would refuse to receive an offer to pay fare by a passenger, and immediately commence an unprovoked attack upon him under the circumstances testified to in this case by plaintiff. However, we are not prepared to say that the evidence in favor of plaintiff was so slight as to warrant us in denying the power of the jury to base their verdict upon it. There was a sufficient conflict to put the determination of the issue within their province.

But the amount of damages allowed was grossly beyond all reasonable limit. There is no pretense that plaintiff suffered any serious injury. He complained of a bruised leg, but the testimony of his physician shows only trifling injury. In his complaint he claims only $10 for loss of time and $5 for his doctor's bill. Under the circumstances shown by the evidence, he certainly was not entitled to much for humiliation or injury to his dignity. Under any view as favorable to plaintiff as could be justly taken, the damages awarded should not have exceeded at the utmost limit a few hundred dollars. Yet the verdict was for $5,000. The excessive verdict was no doubt the result, to a great extent, of the erroneous instructions of the court, given in various forms, that the case was one in which punitive or vindictive damages might be awarded against the defendant. It is not to be supposed that the jury really thought that plaintiff had suffered actual damage to the extent awarded by the verdict. Indeed, counsel for plaintiff say that the verdict rests mainly upon "the gross and malicious conduct of the defendant toward" the plaintiff. And yet it is quite clear that "the defendant"—the employer of the conductor—was not guilty of any "gross and malicious conduct." It was a question formerly whether an employer could, under any circumstances, be held liable for even compensatory damages caused by the wanton and malicious acts of his employé. In the recent case of Stephenson v. Southern Pac. Co., 93 Cal. 558, 29 Pac. 234, it was held that the defendant was not liable for damages caused by the wanton and mischievous backing of a locomotive by an engineer with intent to frighten passengers on an approaching street car. Perhaps the rule now is—and we will assume it to be so for the purposes of this case—that the master is liable for actual damage caused by an act of the servant done in the execution of authority given by the master, although it was caused "by a wanton and reckless purpose to accomplish the master's business in an unlawful manner" (93 Cal. 562, 29 Pac. 234); but it is not the law that in such a case the master is liable for more than will compensate the injured person for the damage which he has sustained. The master is not liable in such a case for vindictive damages, or "smart money," unless he had either authorized the malicious act of the servant beforehand, or had ratified it afterwards. There are some authorities the other way, but the preponderance of adjudicated cases, and the entire force of the reasoning upon the subject, establish the law as above stated. The entire basis of the doctrine of vindictive damages is that the person himself who is sued has been guilty of recklessness or wickedness which amounts to a criminality that should be punished for the good of society and as a warning to the individual; but to award such damages against the master for the criminality of the servant is to punish a man for that of which he is not guilty. If the driver of a merchant's delivery wagon should wantonly run over another person, it would be hard enough for the master to be held liable for all actual damage caused by the unlawful act of his servant; but to go beyond that, and allow a jury, in addition to compensating the injured party for his loss, to inflict further damages as a punishment for something which he did not do, would be to allow a gross outrage not sanctioned by any principle of justice.

The decisions outside of this state establishing the principle above declared are innumerable, but it is unnecessary to refer to them here in detail, because the leading cases on the subject are referred to and cited in the comparatively recent case of Railway Co. v. Prentice, 147 U. S. 101, 13 Sup. Ct. 261, in which the supreme court of the United States reviewed the whole subject, and held the law to be as hereinbefore declared. In that case the only question before the court was whether a railroad company could be charged with punitive damages for wrongful treatment of a passenger by a conductor; so that the whole attention of the court was directed to that one point. There a conductor had been guilty of grossly oppressive acts towards the plaintiff, who was a passenger, because the latter had offered tickets which the conductor deemed insufficient, and had subjected him to great humiliation; and counsel for defendant admitted at the trial that plaintiff "was entitled to recover actual damages." But the trial court instructed the jury that: "After agreeing upon the amount which will fairly compensate the plaintiff for his outlay and injured feelings, you may add something by way of punitive damages against the defendant, which is sometimes called 'smart money,' if you are satisfied that the conductor's conduct was illegal (and it was illegal), wanton, and oppressive;" and for giving this instruction, and for this alone, the judgment was reversed. Counsel for defendant in error, in the opening of his brief, said: "But one question arises upon the record, and that is, under the facts, is plaintiff in error liable for punitive damages?" and the court, at the commencement of its opinion, said: "The simple question presented for our decision, therefore, is whether a railroad corporation can be charged with punitive damages for the illegal, wanton, and oppressive conduct of a conductor of one of its trains towards a passenger." Therefore, the opinion in that case was an absolute, definite decision of the point, and not a mere statement of dicta about a question not necessarily involved. The opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Gray is quite long and exhaustive. We will make from it only a few quotations, to show its general character. The court, among other things, say: "Exemplary or punitive damages, being awarded, not by way of compensation to the sufferer, but by way of punishment of the offender, and as a warning to others, can only be awarded against one who has participated in the offense. A principal, therefore, though of course liable to make compensation for injuries done by his agent within the scope of his employment, cannot be held for exemplary or punitive damages, merely by reason of wanton, oppressive, or malicious intent on the part of the agent." Again, the court uses the language employed in Keene v. Lizardi, 8 La. 26, as follows: "It is true, juries sometimes very properly give what is called 'smart money.' They are often warranted in giving vindictive damages as a punishment inflicted for outrageous conduct. But this is only justified in an action against the wrongdoer, and not against persons who, on account of their relation to the offender, are only consequentially liable for his acts, as the principal is responsible for the acts of the factor or agent;" and then cites a large number of cases, including one from California, which are said to be "to the same effect." And again the court say that "the rule has the same application to corporations as to individuals." Again, the court say: "The jury were thus told, in the plainest terms, that the corporation was responsible in punitive damages for wantonness and oppression on the part of the conductor, although not actually participated in by the corporation. This ruling appears to us to be inconsistent with the principles above stated, unsupported by any decision of this court, and opposed to the preponderance of well-considered precedents." Again, the court say: "The law applicable to this case has been found nowhere better stated than by Mr. Justice Brayton, afterwards chief justice of Rhode Island," in Hagan v. Railroad Co., 3 R. I. 88, and numerous quotations are made from the opinion of Justice Brayton, of which we take the following: "If in such cases, or in any case of a civil nature, it is the policy of the law to visit upon the offender such exemplary damages as will operate as punishment, and teach the lesson of caution to prevent a repetition of criminality, yet we do not see how such damages can be allowed where the principal is prosecuted for the tortious act of his servant, unless there is proof in the case to implicate the principal, and make him particeps criminis of his agent's act." A quotation to the same effect is made from the court of appeals of New York; and the court say that: "Similar decisions, denying upon like grounds the liability of railroad companies and other corporations sought to be charged with punitive damages for the wanton or oppressive acts of their agents or servants, not participated in or ratified by the corporation, have been made by the courts of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Michigan, Wisconsin, California, Louisiana, Alabama, Texas and West Virginia." It is clear, therefore, that under the general authorities, including the decision of the highest court in the land, the law is established as heretofore declared.

Turning to our own state, we find that, with the single exception of some expressions in the opinion delivered in one of the departments in Gorman v. Southern Pac. Co., 97 Cal. 1, 31 Pac. 1112, the decisions here have been in harmony with and declaratory of the principle above stated. The first cause involving the point is Wardrobe v. Stage Co., 7 Cal. 119. In that case the plaintiff was injured while on a stage coach of defendant, driven by defendant's servant, and the trial court instructed the jury that, if the stage was driven recklessly at the time of the disaster, "then they should find, not only the actual damages sustained by the plaintiff, but they should give additional damages, such as would be an example thereafter," etc., and the appellate court held such instruction to be erroneous, and for that reason reversed the judgment. In its opinion the court, after alluding to other matters, say: "In the second place, it is shown that the stage at the time of the accident was driven by the servant or agent of the defendant, and the rule in such cases is that the principal is liable only for simple negligence, and that exemplary damages cannot be imposed upon him." The court refers at length to the early leading case upon the subject in 3 Wheat. 546 (The Amiable Nancy), in which the opinion was written by Judge Story. In Turner v. Railroad Co., 34 Cal. 594, the plaintiff was wrongfully ejected from a car of defendant (a railroad corporation) by a conductor; and the trial court instructed the jury that the injury to plaintiff, if committed by the conductor willfully, etc., "entitled her to what is called 'exemplary damages,'" and the court for this reason, although the verdict was for only $750, reversed the judgment. Mr. Justice Crockett, in delivering the opinion of the court, after a full discussion of the principles involved, said: "Tested by these principles, it is obvious that in this case the defendant was not liable for any malicious and wanton conduct of the conductor. If liable at all, its liability must be confined to the actual damage which the plaintiff suffered. To render the defendant liable for punitive damages, it was incumbent on the plaintiff to show that the act complained of was done with the authority, either express or implied, of the defendant, or was subsequently adopted by the company. Hagan v. Railroad Co., 3 R. I. 88." Again, he says: "If her expulsion resulted from the malice of the conductor, or was accompanied by violence and personal indignity, the conductor is alone responsible for such damages as she may be entitled to for this cause beyond the actual damage resulting from the expulsion from the car, unless, as before stated, the company expressly or tacitly participated in the malice and violent conduct of the conductor. In other words, if the act of the conductor was wholly unauthorized [but, of course, done without the general scope of his authority] the company is liable for the actual damage, and the conductor alone for the punitive damages, if any." No other case can be found in the books which more fully and definitely declares the law to be as we have stated it. This case was referred to and approved in Wade v. Thayer, 40 Cal. 586. In Mendelsohn v. Lighter Co., Id. 657, which was an action for damage alleged to have been done to certain lumber of plaintiff, the trial court charged the jury "that, if the damage to the lumber was wantonly and maliciously caused by the defendant, the jury might give punitive damages"; but the judgment was reversed, because there was no evidence that the defendant had done or participated in any wanton and malicious acts; such acts, if done at all, having been committed by defendant's servants. The court said: "But whilst there was evidence tending to show that the damage to the lumber was caused by the malicious and wanton acts of the agents and servants of the defendant, I discover nothing in the record tending to prove that the defendant authorized or consented to the malicious conduct of its agents and servants, or approved it afterwards; and it is well settled that, though the principal is liable for the actual damage caused by the act of his agent done in the usual course of his employment, he is not responsible for wanton and malicious damage done by the agent without the consent, approval, or subsequent ratification of the principal. In the case of Turner v. Railroad Co., 34 Cal. 594, we had occasion carefully to consider this question, and announced the rule to be as above stated, and have reaffirmed it in the case of Wade v. Thayer (decided at the present term) [40 Cal. 578]. I am therefore of opinion that the court erred in giving the fifth instruction requested by the plaintiff, there having been no evidence to support it. As the judgment must be reversed for this cause, I deem it unnecessary to notice the other errors assigned."

The foregoing cases establish the law in this state in harmony with the current of general authority, and they are not to be taken as overruled by what was said in the opinion in Gorman v. Southern Pac. Co., supra. In this latter case it was averred in the complaint that the plaintiff was wrongfully and with force expelled and ejected from defendant's train, and damages were prayed for in the sum of $10,000. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff in the comparatively small sum of $500, and a close examination of the case will show that the only real question before the court was whether this small amount of damages was, independent of any question of punitive damages, so excessive as to warrant the court to set it aside. The trial court did not instruct the jury that they could give punitive damages, and we cannot see how the question of punitive damages was at all involved in the case. All that we know about instructions asked by the defendant and refused is contained in the sentence from the opinion of the commissioner delivered in department: "The instructions refused were asked upon the theory that the plaintiff could in no event recover more than his actual damages, and that such damages could not exceed the cost of a ticket from the point where he was expelled to the point of his destination, together with a reasonable allowance for the loss of time." Of course, these instructions were erroneous, because they involve the proposition that damages must be confined to the price of a ticket and loss of time, leaving out entirely injury to the feelings, humiliation, disgrace, etc. The question of punitive damages was not, therefore, necessarily involved. The whole case was decided in these words of the opinion: "We see nothing in this case to indicate that the jury acted under the influence of passion or prejudice, and, in our opinion, the verdict cannot be disturbed on the ground that the damages were excessive;" and what is said about vindictive damages is dictum. That the department did not intend to overrule or disturb the former decisions of this court upon the subject of punitive damages is apparent from the fact that no allusion was made to them.

There are some other minor questions in the case, but they are not likely to arise upon another trial, and we do not deem it necessary to extend this opinion by discussing them. The judgment must be reversed because the damages found by the jury were excessive, and because the trial court erroneously instructed the jury that the case was a proper one for punitive damages against the defendant. The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed, and the cause remanded.

PEOPLE v. BUSBY. (Cr. 148.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 5, 1896.)

HOMICIDE—APPEAL—REINSTATEMENT.

Where a judgment in a murder case is affirmed, because there was no appearance for appellant, and no brief on file, the appeal will not be reinstated on the ground that his counsel was prevented by sickness from preparing a brief, and appearing in court on the day set for the hearing, unless he shows in his petition error in the record, or plausible claim of error, none appearing on examination thereof.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

One Busby, convicted of murder, appealed, and the judgment and order appealed from were affirmed without an examination of the record. He petitions the court to reinstate the appeal. Petition denied.

J. N. Davidson, L. F. Fisher, and P. E. King, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted of murder and sentenced to be imprisoned for life. His appeal was placed upon the calendar for the May term, but when the case was called there was no appearance in his behalf, and there was no brief on file. The judgment and order appealed from were therefore affirmed without an examination of the record. His counsel now petitions the court to reinstate the appeal, upon the ground that he was prevented by sickness from preparing a brief, or appearing in court on the day set for the hearing. We should feel compelled to accept this excuse as a sufficient ground for reinstating the appeal, if counsel had pointed out in his petition any error in the record, or any plausible claim of error. But no such claim is advanced, and upon an examination of the record the appeal appears to be devoid of merit. Petition denied.

(Sac. 39.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 4, 1896.)

TRESPASS TO DITCH — CROSS COMPLAINT — SUFFICIENCY—RIGHT TO WATER.

1. In an action to enjoin defendant from diverting water from a ditch, and for damages for taking water therefrom and for injuring the banks thereof, a cross complaint alleging that defendant has possession and control of certain lands, and that the stream which flowed into the ditch passed through said land, is not sufficient to constitute a cause of action in the absence of an allegation that defendant had possession and control by right.

2. Nor is a paragraph sufficient in which it is alleged that defendant has a large amount of land which it is necessary to irrigate, and that the only waters available for that purpose are the waters of said stream, where it was not averred that the land was riparian to said stream, nor that it was part of the land described in the preceding paragraph.

3. Nor did such pleading allege facts sufficient to constitute a cross complaint.

4. A trespasser on public lands is for some purposes deemed the owner, but when one asserts riparian rights as against an upper appropriator of water he must show some right, inchoate or otherwise, to the land.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. R. Webb, Judge.

Action by the Silver Creek & Panoche Land & Water Company and others against W. J. Hayes and others to enjoin defendants from diverting waters from a certain ditch, and for damages for taking water therefrom, and for injuries thereto. From a judgment rendered in favor of defendants on the cross complaint, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Frank H. Short and A. M. Drew, for appellants. Thompson & Pierce, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. Plaintiffs, in their complaint, aver that the corporate plaintiffs own a certain canal or ditch, of which the individual plaintiffs are in possession as lessees, and that without permission of plaintiffs, or any of them, defendant wrongfully entered upon the same, and without right took water therefrom, and injured the banks thereof, and threatens to continue to enter upon it and to take water therefrom, and will so enter and divert and use water therefrom, and injure and destroy the embankments and head gates thereof. And particularly on a day named he did enter in and upon the canal, and, with intent to injure and break said canal, raised the head gates nearest defendant's residence, intending that the waters should injure and destroy the canal. They further aver that defendant will, unless restrained, enter upon the canal, without right, and divert water therefrom, and injure and destroy, tear down, and remove the embankments and head gates thereof. They ask that defendant be enjoined from these acts, and for damages. The defendant answered, and also filed a cross complaint. Plaintiffs demurred to the cross complaint for want of sufficient facts, and on the trial objected to evidence in support of the claim of defendant asserted in the cross complaint on the same ground. The demurrer and the objections were overruled, and the court gave judgment to plaintiffs for all of the relief demanded by them, and then awarded to defendant all the relief asked by him. From the judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order refusing plaintiffs a new trial as to the issues tendered by the cross complaint, plaintiffs take this appeal.

By the demurrer the point is made that the cross complaint does not state a cause of action at all, and that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action for a cross complaint in this action. Both points are well taken. The cross complaint nowhere shows by statement of facts that defendant owns or holds by right any lands which are riparian to Panoche creek. He avers that he owns three lots in section 16, and has possession and control of three other lots, and that said creek flows "through the natural channel thereof, over and across the lands of defendant, as aforesaid." This is true, though the creek only flows over the three lots of which he is possessed, and which he controls. He does not aver that he possesses or controls by right, and the presumption is that this allegation is as strong as he could make it. The presumption, therefore, is that he has taken possession of the other three lots without right, and that the water only flows over these lots in which he has no right. A trespasser on public lands is for some purposes deemed the owner, but when one asserts riparian rights as against an upper appropriator of water he must show some right, inchoate or otherwise, to the land.

In another paragraph of the cross complaint it is averred that defendant has a large amount of land which it is necessary to irrigate, and the only waters available for that purpose are the waters of Panoche creek. It is not intimated in any way that this large tract of land is part of the lots described, or that it is riparian to Panoche creek. In short, in the cross complaint the defendant does not show any right to the waters of Panoche creek. But, if the cross complaint can be held to state a cause of action which might be the basis of an independent suit, it does not state a cause of action which is the proper subject of a cross complaint in this case. The relief sought in the cross complaint does not defeat, overcome, or affect plaintiffs' cause of action or lessen or modify the relief to which plaintiffs are entitled. If this proposition can be tested by the result, it is fully shown by the fact that plaintiffs and defendant were each awarded all the relief they sought.

Nor does the cause of action set up arise out of the transaction set out in the complaint, nor is it connected with the subject of the action. The transaction is the alleged trespass of the defendant, and, if the phrase "subject of the action" refers to the rights involved, only the claim of plaintiffs to their ditch was involved. No right to water is asserted, nor was it necessary for plaintiffs in order to make a case to show any. The court so held in giving them the relief demanded, while finding that they had no right to water in the creek. The trespass charged did not consist in destroying or injuring the dam or other means by which the water was diverted from the creek, nor in diverting the water in the creek to other uses, but was an injury to the embankments of the ditch, and a taking of the water from the ditch itself. Had the alleged trespass consisted in an attempt to prevent the flow into the ditch from the stream, possibly the assertion of a right to have the water flow would be considered; but no such defense could be made here. The cause of action set up by plaintiffs and the rights asserted by defendant have no reference to each other. True, there was water in the ditch, and the evidence shows that it came from Panoche creek. But the fact that defendant had a superior right to the water flowing in the creek would not justify him in destroying the ditch, or in taking what water he needed from the ditch at points where it passed over or near his land. The court is directed to modify the judgment by striking out the judgment in the cross complaint in favor of the defendant, and also by awarding to plaintiffs their costs.

BLOOD v. LA SERENA LAND & WATER CO. (No. 19,510.)

Corporations—Seal—Unauthorized Act of Officers—Ratification.

1. Where a seal which had not been formally adopted by a corporation was used for the first time in the execution of instruments afterwards in question, the finding that it had become the common seal of the corporation by use is sustained by a showing that it had afterwards been employed as the seal of the corporation in all transactions requiring the impress of a seal.

2. That a resolution was passed at the preliminary meeting of stockholders, before the organization of the board of directors, is insufficient to support a finding that an instrument thereby attempted to be authorized was duly and regularly executed.

3. Where the execution of a note and mortgage could have been authorized only by a resolution of the board of directors, equivalent to an authority in writing, within Civ. Code, § 2309, a corporation can ratify an unauthorized execution by its president and secretary only in the manner that would have been necessary to confer original authority for the act ratified, as provided by section 2310, and not by an exercise of ownership over the property for the price of which the note and mortgage were executed. McFarland, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; W. B. Cope, Judge.

Action by James A. Blood against La Serena Land & Water Company to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Thos. McNulta and Chapman & Hendrick, for appellant. R. B. Canfield and J. W. Taggart, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Appeals from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial. The complaint is a pleading in the usual form to foreclose a mortgage alleged to have been executed by defendant corporation to plaintiff. Defendant answered, denying the execution of the instruments, and likewise filed a cross complaint, a general demurrer to which was sustained.

Upon the trial the following facts were disclosed: One James A. Blood was the owner of a ranch containing about 350 acres. In the year 1887 he authorized his nephew, James A. Blood, Jr., a real-estate broker, to make a sale of this ranch at the price of $105,000, agreeing to pay him a commission of $5,000 for effecting the sale. Blood, Jr., proceeded as a "promoter" to organize a corporation for the purpose of purchasing this land, platting, subdividing, and selling it. Under these circumstances, the La Serena Land & Water Company was organized as a corporation. After it had filed its articles of incorporation, but before any meeting of its directors was held, the subscribers to the capital stock of the corporation, of whom Blood, Jr., was one, in meeting, agreed upon the purchase of the Blood ranch, and to that end authorized the payment by Blood, Jr., to plaintiff of one-half of the purchase price of the ranch. Upon receipt of this sum, plaintiff was to execute to the corporation his deed for the land, and, in return, the corporation was to make and deliver to him its note and mortgage for the remaining one-half of the purchase price. Thereafter the directors met and organized. They made no formal adoption of a corporate seal, but seem to have instructed their president to procure such a seal. They adopted no resolution looking to or touching upon the purchase of the Blood ranch, or the execution of the note and mortgage. Payment to plaintiff of the one-half of the purchase price was, however, made by Blood, Jr., pursuant to the instructions which he had received at the stockholders' meeting, which payment consisted of about $40,000 in gold coin, and stock of the corporation of the estimated value of $12,500. Upon receipt of this, plaintiff executed to the corporation his deed for the land, and, in return, received a note and mortgage for the sum of $52,500. Both the note and the mortgage were executed in the name of the corporation by James L. Barker, its president, and James A. Blood, Jr., its secretary. Barker and Blood were, in fact, respectively, president and secretary of the corporation. The note and mortgage also bore impress of what purported to be the common seal of the corporation. Blood, Jr., as one of the original subscribers, received some shares of the stock, and other shares were made over to him by Blood, Sr., representing the commission of $5,000 which he was to receive for effecting the sale. It appears that the stockholders of the corporation knew that the purchase price of the land was to be $105,000, and were satisfied to make the purchase for that sum, and upon the indicated terms. It is not so clear that they knew that their associate, Blood, Jr., was to have received a commission from Blood, Sr., for effecting the sale. Blood, Jr., by his own testimony, acted for the incorporators in the matter of the purchase. How far he acted for them does not clearly appear. It also is uncontradicted that he acted for the seller, Blood, Sr. The corporation entered upon and took possession of the land, exercising general acts of dominion and ownership over it. It was surveyed and platted. Orchards were cut down; springs developed; certain portions of it sold; and deeds for those portions executed by the corporation in its own name, Blood, Sr., joining therein. Interest was paid upon the mortgage for a time, and, by a later convention between the corporation and the mortgagee, the produce of the ranch was afterwards taken in lieu of interest. Finally, the corporation having failed to meet the terms of the contract, this action was instituted.

The court found that the note and mortgage were duly executed by the corporation. It also found that the contract of note and mortgage was duly ratified by the corporation, and decreed foreclosure accordingly. The finding that there was a due execution of the note and mortgage, if understood to mean that there was due authority for their execution at the time they were made, is not supported by the evidence. Plaintiff, by the introduction of the note and mortgage, proof of the corporate seal, and of the names of the officers executing the instruments on behalf of the corporation, established, it is true a prima facie case of due execution; but it was only a prima facie showing, and one subject to be overthrown by proof of the fact that original authority was lacking.

Appellant first contends that the evidence of plaintiff failed in showing that the seal employed upon the instruments was in fact the common seal of the corporation. It is true that one offering a paper purporting to be the instrument of a corporation under seal is called upon to make proof that the seal employed is the corporate seal, but the earlier strictness of proof in this regard has been much abated by later decisions; and it is sufficient if plaintiff can show either that the seal is the regularly adopted common seal of the corporation, or that it is the seal which without such formal adoption is and has been habitually used as such. In the present case it appeared that the seal was not regularly adopted, and also that it was used upon the instruments in question for the first time in the history of the corporation. But it was further shown that it had been afterwards employed as the seal of the corporation in all transactions requiring the impress of such a seal, and we are of opinion that there was a sufficient showing to warrant a finding that it had become the common seal of the corporation by use. Plaintiff thus established his prima facie showing of regular and due authorization; but it was a showing which could be overcome, and in this case it was in fact overcome by proof that no resolution authorizing the making of this contract was ever adopted by the managing board of the corporation, its board of directors. The only authority upon which the president and secretary acted was the resolution passed at the preliminary meeting of stockholders, before organization of the board of directors; and that such authorization was insufficient to support a finding of due and regular execution is a proposition scarcely requiring authority in its support. Gashwiler v. Willis, 33 Cal. 12; Alta Silver Min. Co. v. Alta Placer Min. Co., 78 Cal. 629, 21 Pac. 373. The defect in this instance did not arise from a mere failure to record a resolution duly passed, which was the question considered in Schallard v. Navigation Co., 70 Cal. 144, 11 Pac. 590, but in a showing that such a resolution was never in fact adopted.

But was the contract, originally defective and voidable for lack of power and authorization, afterwards ratified by the corporation? It is so found by the court. Can the finding be sustained? It is a general principle that a corporation, like an individual, may ratify and validate any unauthorized act, the doing of which it could in the first instance have authorized and empowered. What conduct and proceedings will constitute and amount to a ratification is a question which the courts have been called upon to decide with great frequency. In the literature of the law which is thus full upon the subject there has often been little inclination displayed to distinguish between ratification and estopped in pais. The facts are usually set forth at length, and the conclusion is reached and expressed that such conduct amounts to ratification; and indeed, where the form which the ratification must take is not governed by statutory rules, it may and usually does matter little whether the acts of a principal are said to be such as to constitute a ratification, or to be such as to constitute an estoppel. By either name he is held equally bound. But the distinction between the two is, nevertheless, well defined; and where, as in this state, the mode of ratification is governed by statute, it becomes important and necessary to distinguish them. Acts and conduct amounting to an estoppel in pais may in some instances amount also to ratification; but, on the other hand, ratification may be complete without any of the elements of an estoppel. The elements of an estoppel in pais have for so long been settled in this state that it is superfluous even to refer to the leading cases of Boggs v. Mining Co., 14 Cal. 279, and Martin v. Zellerbach, 38 Cal. 300. The requisites and form of ratification, however, are entirely within the provisions of the Code. "An oral authorization is sufficient for any purpose, except that an authority to enter into a contract required by law to be in writing can only be given by an instrument in writing." Civ. Code, § 2309. "A ratification can be made only in the manner that would have been necessary to confer original authority for the act ratified, or, where an oral authorization would suffice, by accepting or retaining the benefit of the act, with notice thereof." Id. § 2310. Ratification is thus a question of legal cognizance, while estoppel in pais addresses itself to equity. "Ratification" under our Code, is a legal term, with a well-defined and specific meaning, and to use it interchangeably with "estoppel," or with the verbs "to adopt" or "to confirm," must result and has resulted in unfortunate confusion. One instance out of many may be cited to point what has been said. In the syllabus to Borel v. Rollins, 30 Cal. 408, is the following: "Ratification by Acts Constituting Estoppel in Pais. The principle that an unauthorized act of an attorney in fact, acting under a power required to be under seal, must be confirmed by an instrument under seal, does not prevent the principal from ratifying by an act which operates as an estoppel in pais." Had the words "confirmed" and "ratifying" been transposed in the foregoing, the language would have been accurate and unobjectionable. But, if the act in fact has been ratified, the ratification is sufficient, and there is no need of invoking the doctrine of estoppel. It is only where the acts fall short of legal ratification that the necessity of calling upon the doctrine of estoppel exists. A reference to the text of the opinion in that case at once discloses this, for it is there found that there was no ratification, but that there was an estoppel, the court saying: "It may be said * * * that, as the authority to execute deeds upon partition must be under seal, there can be no parol ratification without authority under seal. This is certainly the doctrine of the law, but it is also a doctrine that an act which operates as an estoppel in pais, such as accepting the benefit of the partition attempted to be made, and dealing with the property allotted to the principal by the partition as his own, by disposing of it by deeds, confirms the partition made by the attorney without legal authority."

Now, while ratification may be proved under a plea of due execution (Goetz v. Goldbaum [Cal.] 37 Pac. 646), yet the evidence in this case falls short of proving it, and more strongly tends to establish an estoppel. As in the case of Borel v. Rollins, supra, it showed a certain confirmation by the corporation of the unauthorized acts of its president and secretary. The land was taken; control exercised over it; portions of it were sold. There was even a certain recognition of the corporation's indebtedness by a payment of moneys for interest upon the mortgage debt, though it is claimed that this payment was made, not by the corporation, but by certain individual shareholders therein. Many acts of knowledge and adoption might be instanced, but they singly and collectively fall short of the Code requirements for ratification. The corporation, in the first instance, could have authorized the execution of this particular note and mortgage only by a resolution of its board of directors (the equivalent of a writing) duly assembled in meeting, which resolution, either by itself or taken with its by-laws, would have authorized the president and secretary not only to make a mortgage, but would have set forth the rate of interest and the agreement to pay in gold coin. The authority of the agent to make any mortgage must be in writing. Civ. Code, § 2309. The agreement to pay the 10 per cent. must be in writing (Id. §§ 1917, 1918), and the requirement to pay in gold coin as well (Id. § 1913). The contract of mortgage, with these terms and conditions, could only be ratified in the manner that would have sufficed to confer original authority. Such a ratification plaintiff failed to show (Salfield v. Reclamation Co., 94 Cal. 546, 29 Pac. 1105); and this, aside from the consideration of the knowledge or lack of knowledge of the corporation of the interest and dual relationship of Blood, Jr., from the inception to the consummation of the transaction, for the acts did not constitute a ratification, whether the corporation possessed this knowledge or did not. As has been intimated, they more strongly tend to establish against the corporation an estoppel in pais. Such an estoppel was, however, neither pleaded nor found. We do not mean to be understood to say that, under the peculiar facts of this case, it was necessary for plaintiff so to have pleaded. Plaintiff went into court in the belief that he held a note and mortgage duly executed to him. He established a prima facie showing to that effect. In turn, he was met by a counter showing of lack of due authorization, and undertook to meet this by evidence of subsequent ratification. The same evidence, however, treated as evidence by way of estoppel, was admissible, without pleading estoppel, to raise an equitable barrier against defendant's proof of want of authority. Had plaintiff, in the first instance, been called upon to rely upon an estoppel in pais in order to maintain his action against defendant at all, it would have been necessary, of course, for him so to have pleaded. But such was not his cause of action. He successfully makes out a prima facie case, and may, without pleading it, use the evidence in estoppel to prevent the corporation from maintaining what, as against its acts, would be an unjust and unwarranted defense.

Whether or not the acts of the corporation are sufficient to raise such an estoppel is not now a question for determination. It would involve, not the review of findings made by the trial court upon the question (for the trial court made none), but would necessitate the making in this court, in the first instance, of such findings. This we have neither the right nor the disposition to do. But as, under the facts here disclosed, such findings are necessary to the proper determination of the rights of the litigants, a new trial must be ordered. Upon such trial it may be determined what position Blood, Jr., occupied in relation to the corporation,—whether he was merely a mouthpiece to deliver messages, or whether he was chargeable with the high good faith exacted of all who stand in a relation of trust. It may also be determined whether or not the corporation knew or was chargeable with knowledge of the interest of Blood, Jr., and of the fact that he was to receive a commission from the seller. In short, there may be explicitly set forth the acts and conduct of the corporation which may be claimed to estop it from contesting the validity of the note and mortgage. Thereafter, should an appeal be taken to this court, the question will be here properly under review.

So far as this decision goes, it is but a determination that the findings of due execution of the note and mortgage, and of ratification thereof, are not supported by the evidence, and cannot stand. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: TEMPLE, J.; HARRISON, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; VAN FLEET, J.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent, and adhere to the opinion delivered in department. 41 Pac. 1017. Section 2310 of the Civil Code must be construed, and has always been construed, by this court, in connection with the principle declared in section 1589, that "a voluntary acceptance of the benefit of a transaction is equivalent to a consent to all the obligations arising from it, so far as the facts are known or ought to be known to the person accepting"; and in section 2311, that "ratification of part of an indivisible transaction is a ratification of the whole." Of course, there is a certain distinction between ratification and estoppel in pais; that is, the word "estoppel" applies to certain acts and conditions to which the word "ratification" could not be appropriately applied, and vice versa. Strictly speaking, estoppel is where a man is bound by his own act, and ratification where he is bound by his acceptance of the act of another. The common example of estoppel, where the owner of property stands by and sees it sold without disclosing his title, could not well be designated as ratification; and so, when a man consents to and indorses the unauthorized contract of his agent by accepting the benefits of the contract, and acting upon it as if it had been authorized, the proper designation of such conduct is ratification, and not estoppel, although the latter term is sometimes applied to it. But, whether it be called "estoppel" or "ratification," it binds the person thus indorsing the agent, whether such person be a natural one or a corporation. This is the well-established doctrine. See Gribble v. Brewing Co., 100 Cal. 67, 34 Pac. 527, and cases there cited. That the evidence in the case at bar showed such consenting and indorsing conduct on the part of the appellant is beyond question; and, in my opinion, the judge of the court below properly found it to be "ratification." If he had called it by the less appropriate name of "estoppel," it would have meant, under the circumstances of this case, exactly the same thing. And if, under the construction given to section 2310, there can be no valid ratification by conduct or acts in pais of a contract which should have been originally in writing, then, surely, such attempted ratification cannot be made good by calling it estoppel. In my opinion, the judgment should be affirmed.

NEIHAUS et al. v. MORGAN et al. (S. F. 244.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 2, 1896.)

MOTION TO DISMISS—WHEN AUTHORIZED—MECHANICS' LIENS—CLAIM OF LIEN—JUDGMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

1. A motion to dismiss an action tried to the court, on the ground that plaintiff has neglected to have judgment entered for more than six months after decision, is not authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 581, where neither party is entitled to judgment at the time, because written findings have not been prepared and approved by the judge, or waived by the parties.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, prescribing what facts must be stated in the recorded claim of a mechanic's lien, inter alia, requires a statement of claimant's "demand after deducting all just credits and offsets," but does not require a statement that the materials furnished and used were furnished "to be" used in the buildings. Held, that the claim of lien need not contain such statement.

3. A claim of lien on two buildings stated that the reasonable value of the materials furnished by plaintiffs for each house was $182.70, no part of which had been paid, and that the sum of $365.40, "in gold coin of the United States," was still due on such buildings, after deducting all just credits and offsets. Held, that the claim was not open to the objection that it did not state the amount of plaintiffs' demand after deducting all just credits and offsets, because of the quoted words.

4. In an action to enforce a mechanic's lien on two buildings, the decree was that plaintiffs have a valid lien on the houses and lot for the sums found due them; that the sheriff sell the property, and from the proceeds of the sale pay plaintiffs the sums found due them, viz. $365.49 on account of their claim, $50 for attorney's fees, and $45.60 for their costs; and that he bring the surplus money, if any, into court, to abide its further order. Held, that the decree was not open to the objection that it was unintelligible, and incapable of being executed by the sheriff.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by Neihaus Bros. & Co. against Mattie Morgan and others to enforce a mechanic's lien. From a decree for plaintiffs, and an order denying a new trial, defendant Mattie Morgan appeals. Affirmed.

Ben Morgan, for appellant. Philip Teare and T. F. Graber, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. The appellant, Mattie Morgan, wife of defendant Benjamin F. Morgan, being the owner of a lot in the town of Berkeley, county of Alameda, having a frontage of 100 feet on Channing Way, and extending therefrom 304½ feet, entered into a written contract with defendants Higgins, Davidson & Co., by the terms of which the latter agreed to build two dwelling houses on said lot, and to furnish all the materials therefor, and the former agreed to pay for the building of said houses $6,000, by certain installments, the last of which installments was to be paid when both houses should be completed. A memorandum of the contract was filed with the recorder of Alameda county before the commencement of the work, but did not state nor show that 25 per cent., or any part of the contract price for the building of said houses, or either of them, was made payable at least 35 days after the final completion of the work on said houses, or on either of them, or at any time after such completion, but did show that the final payment was to be made when and as soon as both houses should be completed, and all bills paid and liens waived. This action was brought to enforce a lien on said houses and lot for the reasonable value of materials alleged to have been furnished by plaintiffs at the request of Higgins, Davidson & Co. and appellant, to be used, and which were used, in the construction of said houses, which reasonable value is alleged and found to have been $365.40, and also to enforce two other similar liens for materials furnished,—one in favor of Oscar Mayer for $100, and the other in favor of Henry Andrew for $306.60,—the demands secured by which had been assigned to the plaintiffs. The trial court found in favor of plaintiffs on their claim of $365.40 for materials furnished by themselves, but in favor of the appellant on the two demands which had been assigned to plaintiffs, on the ground that the claims of lien for the assigned demands had not been filed in the recorder's office within thirty days after the completion of the houses. A final decree in accordance with these findings was entered, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant Mattie Morgan appeals.

1. Immediately after trial the cause was submitted to the trial court on briefs thereafter to be filed. Thereafter, on May 20, 1893, that court, in the absence of plaintiffs' attorneys, orally announced its conclusions of law, which the clerk entered in the minutes as follows: "It is ordered that judgment be, and the same is hereby, entered for plaintiffs, foreclosing lien of plaintiffs filed by them for $365.10 and costs, and $50 for attorney's fees; and it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the prayer of plaintiffs for judgment on the assigned claims of Messrs. Andrew and Mayer be, and the same is hereby, denied." No order nor request was made that the attorneys for either party draw findings, and no written findings were made or filed, and no formal judgment entered, within six months after the entry of said minute order of May 20, 1893. After the expiration of six months from the entry of said minute order, Mr. Ben Morgan, as attorney for the defendant Mattie Morgan, moved the court to dismiss the action "on the ground that said plaintiff has neglected to demand and have judgment entered for more than six months from the date of the decision, he being during all of said time entitled thereto." The court denied this motion, and the attorney for defendant excepted. Thereafter written findings of fact and conclusions of law were filed, in accordance with which a formal decree was then entered enforcing the lien for the sum of $365.40, without interest, and for costs. Counsel for appellant contends that the denial of the motion to dismiss the action was error for which the judgment should be reversed, and, as authority for this, relies upon the sixth division of section 581, Code Civ. Proc. It has been held by this court that the sixth division of section 581 is not mandatory, and that the exercise of the discretionary power of the court in granting or denying a motion to dismiss an action for the cause therein mentioned will not be disturbed, except for an apparent abuse of such power. Rosenthal v. McMann, 93 Cal. 505, 29 Pac. 121; In re McDevitt, 95 Cal. 17, 30 Pac. 101; Marshall v. Taylor, 97 Cal. 422, 32 Pac. 515. The only showing of negligence on the part of plaintiffs' attorneys, in addition to the facts above stated, is the affidavit of defendant's attorney "that on or about the 25th day of May, 1893, Philip Teare, one of the attorneys for the plaintiffs, informed deponent that the above-entitled cause had been decided by the court, but that his associate, Mr. T. F. Graham, was dissatisfied with said decision"; thus showing merely that plaintiffs' attorney had notice of the minute order above stated about five days after it was made, and that he was dissatisfied with it. On the part of plaintiffs, the affidavits of their attorneys are to the effect that, after the announcement of the conclusions of the court, they applied to the judge to reconsider the evidence, and the law applicable thereto, before making written findings, and that the judge had promised so to do; that, unless he changed the conclusions of law as expressed in said minute order, they had intended to move for a new trial; that a few days before the motion to dismiss the action, they had prepared written findings, which, by request of the court, they submitted to defendant's attorney, who did nothing with them; and that they had understood that it was the duty of the judge to draw the written findings, unless he elected to request attorneys to draw them, and did not understand that they were entitled to have a judgment entered before such findings were filed. Moreover, it does not appear that the defendant was, or could have been, injured by the delay. No interest upon the demand upon which plaintiffs recovered was allowed before judgment, which judgment was entered after the motion to dismiss was denied, and not nunc pro tunc. The only pretense of injury is that the lien upon defendant's property was prolonged. But this was due to the default of the defendant, who might have discharged the lien by payment at any time. Furthermore, it is not perceived that the delay was not caused by the negligence of defendant equally with that of plaintiffs. As written findings were not waived, neither party was entitled to demand the entry of a judgment until such findings were prepared, and approved by the judge. Why had not the defendant an equal right with plaintiffs to urge and promote a speedy preparation of findings, if she desired so to do? It appears that both parties were dissatisfied with the conclusions of law orally announced by the court. Plaintiffs were defeated on two of the three counts of their complaint, embracing more than half of their demand; and therefore the conclusions of law announced were apparently as favorable to defendant as to the plaintiffs, and the defendant was, equally with plaintiffs, entitled to have the judgment entered. But however this may be, since it does not appear that either party was entitled to demand the entry of judgment at any time before the motion to dismiss the action, that motion was not authorized by section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and for this reason alone was properly denied.

2. It is claimed by appellant that, although it is stated in plaintiffs' recorded claim of lien that they furnished certain material actually used in the buildings, it is not therein stated that such materials were furnished "to be used" in said buildings, and for this reason that the claim of lien is void. Section 1187, Code Civ. Proc., prescribes what facts must be stated in the recorded claim. Among other things, it requires a statement of the claimant's "demand after deducting all just credits and offsets," but does not require a statement that the materials furnished and used were furnished "to be used" in said houses. Under section 1183, however, it has been held that a complaint for the enforcement of a lien for materials furnished must contain an averment that the materials were furnished to be used in the construction, etc. Brick Co. v. Moore, 75 Cal. 205, 16 Pac. 890; Cohn v. Wright, 89 Cal. 86, 26 Pac. 643. In this case it is alleged in the complaint that the plaintiffs "furnished * * * all the doors, window sashes, and glass, window weights and window cords, used and to be used in the said construction of, and now actually in and a part of, said two frame dwelling houses or structures, at the special instance and request of said defendants Higgins, Davidson & Co., and that the reasonable value of the same was and is $365.40, and that no part thereof has been paid." None of these allegations was sufficiently denied, and there was no demurrer to the complaint. The cases cited by appellant relate only to the complaint, and not to the recorded claim of lien.

3. It is contended that the recorded claim of lien does not state the amount of plaintiffs' demand "after deducting all just credits and offsets." The claim of lien states that the reasonable value of the materials furnished by plaintiffs for each house was $182.70, no part of which had been paid, and "that the sum of $365.40, in gold coin of the United States, is still due and owing upon said buildings, after deducting all just credits and offsets." The specific objection to this is that the demand is measured by United States gold coin. But surely this statement of plaintiffs' demand was sufficiently definite, since United States gold coin is lawful money, by which all values of property or labor may be accurately measured in any part of the United States. Read in connection with all other parts of the claim, this statement of plaintiffs' demand is clearly sufficient. Under it the plaintiffs were entitled to prove and recover, as they did, $365.40, in lawful money of the United States. Neither the complaint nor the judgment restricts the recovery to any particular kind of money. Nor was the property ordered to be sold for gold coin. In this connection it is objected that the claim of lien stated only the contract price of the materials. But it also stated the reasonable value thereof, and the court found such reasonable value, and the judgment is in conformity with the finding in this respect.

4. It is claimed that the judgment "is unintelligible, and incapable of being carried out by the sheriff," because it is not stated which of the defendants shall pay the amount found due the plaintiffs. A sufficient answer to this is that there is no personal judgment against any one of the defendants. The judgment, in substance, is that the plaintiffs have a valid lien upon the houses and lot for the sums found due them; that the sheriff sell the property, and from the proceeds of the sale pay plaintiffs the sums found due them, viz. $365.49 on account of their claim, $50 for attorney's fees, and $45.60 for their costs; and that he "bring the surplus money, if any, into court to abide its further order." Surely the sheriff can execute this decree.

5. It is contended that the finding that the claim of lien was filed for record within 30 days after the buildings were completed is not justified by the evidence. The plaintiffs' claim of lien was filed for record September 17, 1890, and the court found that the buildings were completed on August 20, 1890. This finding appears to be supported by a preponderance of the conflicting evidence.

Other points made by appellant are not sufficiently plausible to merit special consideration. I think the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; BRITT, C.

BENHAM v. CONNOR. (No. 15,898.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. June 5, 1896.)

PLEADING—INSUFFICIENT ANSWER—VERIFICATION.

1. In an action by the indorsee of a note, an answer which alleges no defense except a counterclaim consisting of an alleged cause of action against the payee of the note, and fails to allege whether such cause of action arose before the transfer of the note or before defendant had notice of such transfer, was insufficient, and a judgment for plaintiff on the pleadings was properly rendered.

2. Where the complaint in an action upon a note is verified, the answer must also be verified, under Code Civ. Proc. § 446.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. Murphy, Judge.

Action by A. M. Benham against M. W. Connor. There was judgment for plaintiff on the pleadings, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Morrison, Stratton & Foerster, for appellant. Olney, Chickering & Thomas and Chickering, Thomas & Gregory, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This action was brought to recover the amount due on three negotiable promissory notes, each of which was separately set out in the complaint, and alleged to have been executed by the defendant, and to have been indorsed by the payee thereof to the plaintiff. The complaint was duly verified. In due time the defendant filed an unverified answer to the complaint, containing a general denial of all its allegations, and setting up as a counterclaim an alleged cause of action against the payee of two of the said notes. Thereafter the plaintiff served notice on the defendant that on the 29th day of April, 1892, he would move the court to strike from the files the said answer, and for judgment on the pleadings, upon the ground that the said document was unverified, and was sham, and irrelevant. On April 28th the defendant served on the attorneys for the plaintiff a properly verified amended answer, but they refused to admit service of the same. This answer contained no denials whatever, but set up the same counterclaim as that found in the original answer, and also a second counterclaim, consisting of another alleged cause of action against the payee of the said two notes. On April 29th defendant filed his amended answer among the papers in the case, without obtaining any leave of the court to serve or file the same. Thereafter, on the same day, plaintiff's motion came up for hearing, and the fact of the service and filing of the said amended answer was then brought to the knowledge and attention of the court by counsel for defendant. After due consideration, the court granted the motion for judgment on the pleadings, and judgment was accordingly entered in favor of the plaintiff as prayed for. From that judgment the defendant has appealed, and it is claimed that the facts above stated show errors in the action of the court which entitle him to a reversal.

This claim cannot, in our opinion, be sustained.

1. The Code provides that when the complaint is verified the answer must also be verified, except in certain specified cases, of which this is not one. Code Civ. Proc. § 446. The original answer was not verified, and for that reason counsel for appellant concede that plaintiff would have been entitled to judgment on the pleadings if no other answer had been filed. The only question, then, is as to the amended answer. Assuming that that answer can be considered, it will be observed that it sets up no defense whatever to one of the notes sued on, and the only defenses to the other two notes are the alleged counterclaims. And it will also be observed that there is no averment or anything to indicate that either of the causes of action set up as a counterclaim arose before the assignments of the said notes to the plaintiff, or before defendant had notice of such assignments. But if the said causes of action did not in fact arise before defendant had notice of the assignments to plaintiff, then it is clear that they could not be availed of as counterclaims or offsets against plaintiff's demand. Id. § 368; Pom. Code Rem. §§ 162–166, and cases cited. It was incumbent upon the defendant to set out all the facts showing that his alleged causes of action constituted valid counterclaims, but this he failed to do. As pleadings are construed most strongly against the pleader, it is apparent that the amended answer raised no issues which could be considered in the case. It was not error, therefore, for the court to grant the motion for judgment on the pleadings. Felch v. Beaudry, 40 Cal. 439; Hemme v. Hays, 55 Cal. 337; Loveland v. Garner, 74 Cal. 298, 15 Pac. 844; San Francisco v. Staude, 92 Cal. 560, 28 Pac. 778.

2. In view of what has been said it is unnecessary to consider the question whether, without leave of the court, the amended answer could be filed and made a pleading in the case. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

DONOHOE v. TRINITY CONSOL. GOLD & SILVER MIN. CO. et al. (Sac. 30.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 4, 1896.)

MECHANIC'S LIEN—EMPLOYMENT—PROOF OF AUTHORITY OF AGENT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, giving mechanics' liens for labor done at the instance of the owner of a building or his agent, and further providing that "every contractor * * * or other person having charge of any mining or of the construction * * * of any building, or other improvement, as aforesaid, shall be held to be the agent of the owner for the purposes of this chapter," proof that a person acted as superintendent of the property of a mining company incorporated in another state, and claimed to be such superintendent, purchasing machinery, and having charge of all work done on the property, is sufficient to establish, prima facie, the agency of such person for the owner.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Shasta county; Edward Sweeny, Judge.

Action by Patrick Donohoe against the Trinity Consolidated Gold & Silver Mining Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Bank of Shasta County appeals. Affirmed.

Clay W. Taylor and J. Chadbourne, for appellant. Thos. B. Dozier, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Appeal from the judgment, and from the order denying a new trial. Plaintiff's action was to foreclose a lien for the value of labor performed upon the mining claim of the Trinity Mining Company. The bank was made defendant, as claiming some interest in the property, which interest, it was averred and not denied, was subordinate to plaintiff's lien. The mining company suffered default. The bank answered, admitting all of plaintiff's allegations, saving that it denied plaintiff's employment, his labor, its value, and nonpayment. The labor, its value, and nonpayment were proved, and no question arises upon any of these matters. Plaintiff had alleged that he was employed as a miner by one Bernard McCourt, the duly-authorized foreman and agent of the mining company. Upon the trial, he undertook to establish this by proving that McCourt was appointed foreman by one Champion, who was the superintendent in charge, under authority of the Trinity Consolidated Company. This company, it is admitted by the pleadings, was incorporated under the laws of the territory of Utah, with its principal place of business in Ogden. The admissibility and sufficiency of the evidence to establish these agencies of Champion and McCourt are made the contention upon this appeal, presented under objections to the reception of the evidence, and also by attacks on the findings based upon it. The evidence adduced by plaintiff was the following: The plaintiff testified that McCourt employed him. McCourt was acting as foreman, and McCourt himself and Champion, the superintendent, both told him that McCourt was foreman. Champion acted as superintendent, and told witness that he was superintendent. He had no other knowledge that Champion had been authorized to act as superintendent by the company. McCourt testified that he was employed to act as foreman by Champion, and did so act, with authority to employ and discharge laborers. He employed plaintiff as a miner. Champion was superintendent. Acting as superintendent, he purchased and shipped quartz-mill machinery to the mine, caused a 10-stamp mill to be erected, and crushed the ore extracted from the mine in this mill. Champion also posted notices about the mine and on the mill to the effect that the Trinity Company was the owner of the property. He knew of Champion's authority only from statements and from his actions as superintendent. James E. Isaacs testified that Champion had repeatedly told him he was managing agent and superintendent of the corporation. He had examined the record of conveyances of property, and of proceedings in a suit against the company brought by the defendant Shasta Bank. This suit was for money had and received. The complaint averred that Champion was the vice president and managing agent, and, as such, was doing business by authority and direction of the Trinity Company. In this action the Shasta Bank accepted a waiver of the issuance of a summons and an acknowledgment of service of the amended complaint on behalf of the Trinity Company, defendant therein, from Champion, who described himself "as managing agent and superintendent" of the corporation, and upon this admission entered the default of the mining company, took judgment, and sold the property. It is admitted that the Utah company did own the property. There was introduced in evidence the record of a lien filed by Champion against the company for a sum due him for services as superintendent and managing agent. There was introduced records of location of water ditches and rights, and mining claims made by the company through Champion, its agent. Nothing further was established by plaintiff; and the evidence indisputably fails in showing direct authority from the company to Champion, or a direct ratification of Champion's acts. The situation, then, amounts to this: A foreign corporation owns mines in this state. In its name, work is commenced upon these mines. Its so-called "superintendent" buys costly machinery; constructs a mill; extracts and reduces ore; employs miners, millmen, and laborers; takes up water rights and mineral claims; enters into contracts; borrows money; acknowledges service of process in a civil action to collect this money; and in general, by word and act, holds himself out and conducts himself as the duly and regularly appointed superintendent of the company.

It is unquestionably true that an agency may not generally be established by the declarations and acts of the alleged agent; but, without discussing the question whether this evidence would be sufficient to establish an ostensible agency by reason of the failure of the mining corporation to exercise ordinary care (Civ. Code, § 2317), it is clear that, under the provisions of our mechanic's lien law, evidence of these acts and declarations is permitted to establish prima facie such agency. Section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure gives to the miner a lien for labor done at the instance of the owner of the building or his agent; "and every contractor, sub-contractor, architect, builder, or other person having charge of any mining, or of the construction, alteration, addition to, or repair, either in whole or in part, of any building or other improvement, as aforesaid, shall be held to be the agent of the owner for purposes of this chapter." These open declarations and continued acts of Champion and McCourt were thus admissible in evidence under this section to show the person in charge of the mining. By the rule of evidence declared by section 1183, this showing, if not dispelled or overcome, prima facie established the agency. It is quite true that the owner or other person in interest might overthrow this by proof of his want of knowledge and nonemployment of the alleged agent, coupled with a showing that he had exercised ordinary care in the premises; but in this case no one seeks to overcome it. The mining company made default, and the bank's claim is also founded upon the sufficiency of the agency of Champion, the very identical agency which, against this miner with a claim of $84 for labor, it is disputing and seeking to overthrow. No counter evidence having been introduced, it follows that the evidence of plaintiff, standing uncontradicted, supports the findings of the court. The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

MORGAN v. RIGHETTI et al. (S. F. 234.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 5, 1896.)

ACTION AGAINST SEVERAL AS PARTNERS — RECOVERY AGAINST ONE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 578, declaring that judgment may be given against one of several defendants, two persons being sued on an alleged partnership debt, and it being found that they are not partners, but that the debt is the individual debt of one of them, judgment may be rendered against him.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by E. H. Morgan against E. Righetti and another, as partners. Judgment for plaintiff against said E. Righetti, and said defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank M. Stone and Reel B. Terry, for appellant. Joseph Kirk, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff against E. Righetti, one of the defendants, upon the judgment roll. The only question upon this appeal is whether in an action against two as partners, upon an alleged partnership liability, a recovery may be had against one of the defendants; the court finding that the defendants were not partners, but that appellant is individually liable for the indebtedness alleged in the complaint, and for which judgment was entered against appellant, E. Righetti, alone.

At common law, in an action against two or more defendants upon an alleged joint contract or liability, the judgment was required to be against all the defendants, or in favor of all. But this rule was changed by section 145 of the practice act, which was afterwards adopted in hæc verba as section 578 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section reads as follows: "Judgment may be given for or against one or more of several plaintiffs, and for or against one or more of several defendants; and it may, when the justice of the case requires it, determine the ultimate rights of the parties on each side as between themselves." The question here involved was decided under the practice act adversely to appellant in Rowe v. Chandler, 1 Cal. 167, Lewis v. Clarkin, 18 Cal. 399, and People v. Frisbie, Id. 402; and we must assume that said section of the practice act was re-enacted in the Code with the construction given it in those cases; and in Shain v. Forbes, 82 Cal. 577, 583, 23 Pac. 198, those cases are cited and followed. See, also, Loan Co. v. Hall (Cal.) 42 Pac. 962. These cases should be held conclusive of the question presented upon this appeal. We have carefully examined the cases cited by appellant, and find all of them broadly distinguishable from those we have cited above. In none of them, except Weinreich v. Johnston, 78 Cal. 254, 20 Pac. 556, is section 578, Code Civ. Proc., mentioned, and in that case it was said that section did not apply. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

GREGORY et al. v. DIGGS et al. (Sac. 20.)

INJUNCTION—ACTION AT LAW—RESTRAINING.

Where plaintiff has sued in a justice court which has complete jurisdiction of his case, but has not jurisdiction sufficiently broad to enable it to entertain defendant's counterclaim, which grows out of the same transaction, and involves the same precise issue, so that the determination of plaintiff's case could be pleaded as a bar to defendant's, defendant can enjoin further proceedings, and have the case determined in a court having jurisdiction of the whole controversy.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; W. H. Grant, Judge.

Action by Eugene J. Gregory and another against M. H. Diggs and others to enjoin proceedings in a justice court. From a judgment on a demurrer to the complaint, and from an order refusing an injunction, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Armstrong & Bruner, for appellants. E. B. Merling and C. W. Thomas, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. In this case a demurrer was interposed to the complaint, which having been sustained, the plaintiffs refused to amend. This appeal is taken from that judgment, as well as from an order refusing an injunction. Appellants have very little to say in their points in regard to the demurrer, further than that it is not pretended that their complaint does not state a cause of action, and that the burden on that question is on the demurring party. The respondents do not allude to the subject. Looking at the complaint and the demurrer, I see no valid point against the sufficiency of the complaint. As the matter is not discussed, the judgment upon the demurrer is therefore reversed.

The only question considered in the briefs has reference to the order refusing the injunction. It appears that plaintiffs purchased from defendants certain potatoes, which were warranted to be merchantable and suitable and fit for the market in Denver. Plaintiffs paid the purchase price except the sum of $132. For this sum suit was brought against plaintiff in the justice court. Appellants appeared, and answered, setting up a counterclaim for $500 damages for violation of the warranty. This plea was stricken out by the justice, on the ground that he had no jurisdiction, the demand being for more than $300. Plaintiffs then brought this action in the superior court, and asked that the justice be enjoined from proceeding with the case pending before him, but that the entire matter may be litigated in the superior court. In the complaint, plaintiffs claim damages in the sum of $525 for the alleged violation of the contract of sale; and, if their right to an injunction is sustained, the effect will be to compel the plaintiff in the justice's court to plead his demand in the superior court as a counterclaim, and to permit the whole controversy to be there tried. If plaintiffs are entitled to this remedy, it is solely upon the ground that, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, the jurisdiction of the justice court is too limited to afford them relief. They cannot be required to remit a portion of their demand to enable them to put in a counterclaim of which the justice has jurisdiction; and a judgment entered in the justice court by default or consent would probably be a bar to the suit for damages in the superior court. But, whether this would be the case or not, the entire issue is one which the practice here authorizes the parties to have determined upon one trial, and evidently that cannot be done in the justice court. This is a well-known ground of equitable jurisdiction. It is not a case in which a party is entitled to some remedy which only a court of equity can give, and which, having obtained jurisdiction for one purpose, will proceed to adjudicate upon the whole controversy; nor is it a case where a court of equity will interfere to prevent a multiplicity of suits. The demand of the plaintiffs and that of the defendants only involve legal issues; but the defendant Diggs has brought his action in a court which has complete jurisdiction of his case, but has not jurisdiction sufficiently broad to enable it to entertain a counterclaim of the other party,—a counterclaim which grows out of the very transaction upon which Diggs' claim is founded; and neither can get relief without having the claim made by the adverse party passed upon. In such case, I think, plaintiffs are clearly entitled to the relief sought. If the counterclaim sought to be set up did not grow out of the same transaction, and did not involve a trial and determination of the same precise issue, so that the determination of one case could be pleaded as a bar to the other, the case would be different. Nor do I think the power to enjoin proceedings in such a case is likely to be abused. A bond must be given upon the issuance of the injunction; and, if it is wrongfully done, the party will be taxed for costs and damages. By such a bond, the demand made by the plaintiff in the justice court may be secured. The judgment and the order refusing the injunction are reversed.

PEOPLE v. FAUST. (Cr. 105.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 5, 1896.)

CRIMINAL LAW—INTOXICATING LIQUORS—SALE TO INDIANS—INFORMATION—EVIDENCE.

1. Under Pen. Code, § 397 (as amended in 1893), providing that "every person who sells or furnishes * * * intoxicating liquors to any Indian is guilty of a felony," an information charging that defendant did "willfully and unlawfully sell and furnish intoxicating liquor * * * to two Indians," etc., is sufficient, without naming the Indians.

2. The information charges but a single offense.

3. It will be judicially noticed that Susanville is the county seat of, and situated within, Lassen county.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Lassen county; W. T. Masten, Judge.

P. J. Faust was tried for selling intoxicating liquor to Indians, and from the judgment of conviction appeals. Affirmed.

E. V. Spencer and F. C. Spencer, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

BRITT, C. It is provided by section 397 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1893, that "every person who sells or furnishes * * * intoxicating liquors to any Indian is guilty of a felony." Defendant in this case was tried and convicted under an information charging that he did on August 17, 1895, at the county of Lassen, "willfully and unlawfully sell and furnish intoxicating liquor, to wit, whisky, to two Indians," contrary to the form of the statute, etc. He contends on this appeal that the information was not direct and certain as to the offense charged (Pen. Code, § 952), in that it failed to name the Indians to whom the liquor was furnished. The question is not free from difficulty, and, though decisions on cognate subjects are numerous, there is much conflict. Black, Intox. Liq. 464. Wharton states the prevalent opinion to be that the name of the purchaser need not be averred in an indictment for retailing liquors without license, though he thinks that on principle, supported by several cases, the name of the vendee should be specified, if known, or the fact that he is unknown should be alleged. Cr. Law, § 1510. And Mr. Bishop, in guarded language, expresses a similar view. St. Crimes, § 1037. The matter of legal reason involved is whether the offense is charged with sufficiency of detail to enable the accused to prepare for his defense, and to denote and characterize the transaction so that the judgment will operate as a bar to a second prosecution founded thereon. See People v. McKenna, 81 Cal. 158, 22 Pac. 488. The offense denounced by the statute consists in furnishing intoxicating liquor to any Indian,—not to those of a special description, as minors, habitual drunkards, etc.,—so that defendant needed not to be apprised of their names, as a means of ascertaining whether they belonged to an interdicted class of Indians; and as to the use of the judgment as a bar to another prosecution, since the identity of the offense involved in a plea of former acquittal or conviction rests ultimately in parol proofs, even when the indictments are alike (People v. Lockwood, 6 Cal. 205; 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. 816; Whart. Cr. Ev. 593), we apprehend that little aid in this regard would be furnished by designating the Indians by name, especially as the names of California Indians are seldom a matter of notoriety among the white population. In Com. v. McClellan, 101 Mass. 34, the defendant was charged with cruelly beating a certain horse. The court said: "Nor is it necessary to describe the horse particularly, for the sake of distinguishing it from other horses, in order to protect the defendant from a second prosecution for the same offense. If he is again prosecuted for the offense, he may plead this conviction, and establish the identity of the cases by evidence, the burden being on him." We think the present information must be considered sufficient.

Appellant argues that more than one offense is charged in the information, because he is thereby accused of furnishing liquor to two Indians; but obviously the act charged is single, just as when, by a single act, larceny is perpetrated of two or more coins, or other chattels. Whart. Cr. Pl. 254.

It is claimed that on the trial there was a variance between allegation and proof, in that the evidence showed that the liquor was furnished, if at all, to one Indian only. Conceding to the exigence of the argument that such a variance would be material, we think none appears. The evidence tended to show that the two Indians were together in a barroom, and that one of them gave defendant money with which he purchased a bottle of whisky at the bar. Both Indians repaired to a convenient rendezvous, where defendant met them, and he there designedly placed the bottle within their reach, or delivered it into the hand of the one from whom he received the money. Both then drank from the bottle, though not in defendant's presence. These facts, unexplained as they were, justify the inference that liquor was furnished to two Indians. It is said, also, that the persons who received the liquor were not proved to be Indians, but we think the evidence on that subject was ample to support the verdict. There is an objection that the venue of the offense was not proved. The evidence showed that it occurred at Susanville, and it is judicially noticed that Susanville is the county seat of, and situated within, Lassen county. People v. Etting, 99 Cal. 577, 34 Pac. 237. The judgment and order denying defendant's motion for new trial should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order denying defendant's motion for new trial are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GUSTI. (Cr. 98.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 5, 1896.)

CRIMINAL LAW—INTOXICATING LIQUORS—SALE TO INDIAN—INFORMATION.

Under Pen. Code, § 397, as amended in 1893, which provides that "every person * * * who sells or furnishes, or causes to be sold or furnished, intoxicating liquors to any Indian, is guilty of a felony," an information charging that defendant, April 20, 1895, "at and in the county * * *, did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously furnish, and cause to be furnished, intoxicating liquor," etc., does not charge two offenses, since to "furnish and cause to be furnished" constitute but one and the same act.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; R. F. Crawford, Judge.

N. Gusti was indicted for selling intoxicating liquor to an Indian. A demurrer to the information was sustained, and, the district attorney declining to file a new one, defendant was discharged, and his bail exonerated. From a judgment on the demurrer, and the order discharging defendant, the people appeal. Reversed.

Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People. Burnett & Leppo, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. Section 397 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1893, provides: "Every person * * * who sells or furnishes, or causes to be sold or furnished, intoxicating liquors to any Indian, is guilty of a felony." An information was filed against the defendant which charged as follows: "The said N. Gusti, on the 20th day of April, A. D. 1895, at and in the county of Sonoma, state of California, did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously furnish, and cause to be furnished, intoxicating liquor, to wit, wine, to an Indian, to wit, Molinda Dugan, contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute," etc. A demurrer to the information was interposed upon the ground that it charged two offenses, to wit, "the offense of furnishing intoxicating liquor to an Indian, and the offense of causing to be furnished intoxicating liquor to an Indian." The court below sustained the demurrer, and ordered the district attorney to file a new information. This he declined and failed to do for more than 30 days, and thereupon the court ordered that the defendant be discharged, and his bail exonerated. From the judgment on the demurrer, and the order discharging defendant, the people appeal.

Of course, an indictment or information must charge but one offense (Pen. Code, § 954), and if it charges more than one it is subject to demurrer upon that ground. The question then is, did the information here charge two offenses? We do not think it did. It is a well-settled rule of law that "when a statute enunciates a series of acts, either of which separately, or all together, may constitute the offense, all of such acts may be charged in a single count, for the reason that, notwithstanding each act may by itself constitute the offense, all of them together do no more, and likewise constitute but one and the same offense." People v. Gosset, 93 Cal. 641, 29 Pac. 246; People v. Harrold, 84 Cal. 567, 24 Pac. 106; People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507; People v. Shotwell, 27 Cal. 394. If the defendant furnished the intoxicating liquor, he caused it to be furnished; and, if he caused it to be furnished, he in legal effect furnished it himself, and was criminally responsible for the act. Pen. Code, § 31. Mr. Wharton, in his work on Criminal Pleading and Practice (ninth edition, section 228), states the law as follows: "Though the language of the statute be disjunctive, e. g. burned or caused to be burned, and the indictment charge the offense in the conjunctive, e. g. burned and caused to be burned, the allegation, as has been noticed, is sufficient. The same rule applies where the intent is averred disjunctively. In either case the superfluous term may be rejected as surplusage. And it has been held that, when the words of the statute are synonymous, it may not be error to charge them alternatively." Again, in section 251 of the same work, the author says: "When a statute, as has already been observed, makes two or more distinct acts connected with the same transaction indictable, each one of which may be considered as representing a phase in the same offense, it has in many cases been ruled they may be coupled in one count. Thus setting up a gaming table, it has been said, may be a distinct offense. Keeping a gaming table, and inducing others to bet upon it, may constitute a distinct offense. For either, unconnected with the other, an indictment will lie, yet when both are perpetrated by the same person at the same time they may be coupled in the same count." So it is admissible to charge "several statutory phases of making, forging, and counterfeiting, of causing and procuring to be falsely made, forged, and counterfeited, and of willingly aiding and assisting in the said false making, forging, and counterfeiting. It is admissible, also, to charge that the defendant 'administered, and caused to be administered,' poison," etc. And see cases cited. The above authorities are, in our opinion, decisive of the question in hand. Respondent cites and relies upon the case of People v. Cooper, 53 Cal. 647. In that case the indictment charged "that on the 15th day of January, 1878, the defendant was the cashier and secretary of the Santa Cruz Bank of Savings and Loan; that, as such cashier and secretary, he, together with the president of the corporation, 'did execute, sign, and verify by their oaths a certain sworn statement'" (setting out the statement); and "that on the 25th day of the same month they published the statement in a newspaper." The court said, "The making and the publishing of the statement are charged in the indictment as two distinct acts, which it is alleged were performed at different times, and each of these acts is declared to be a felony." Under these circumstances the court very properly held that the indictment charged two offenses, and was obnoxious to a demurrer upon that ground. That case is not in point here. The defendant in the case at bar is not charged with furnishing liquor to an Indian at one time, and with causing it to be furnished at another time. So far as appears, it was one transaction, and all performed at the same time. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

We concur: BRITT, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

SMELTZER v. MILLER, County Auditor.
(S. F. 249.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. June 5, 1896.)

Taxation—Publishing Delinquent Tax List—Contract.

Pol. Code, § 3766, as amended March 28, 1895 (St. 1895, p. 326), provides that the board of supervisors "must" contract for publishing the delinquent tax list with the lowest bidder after 10 days' notice of the letting of the contract. Section 3764 requires the tax collector to publish the delinquent list by June 5th. Held that, on failure of the supervisors to contract for publishing the list, the tax collector was not authorized to do so.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; N. A. Dorn, Judge.

Action by M. J. Smeltzer against George S. Miller, auditor of Monterey county. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John K. Alexander and Geo. A. Dougherty, for appellant. P. E. Zabala, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The plaintiff, as a citizen and taxpayer of said county of Monterey, brought this action to enjoin the defendant auditor perpetually from drawing his warrant upon the county treasurer in favor of one W. J. Hill for the payment of his claim against the county for having published the delinquent tax list for the year 1894-95, which claim, for the sum of $466.65, had been formally allowed by the board of supervisors of that county. The court sustained a general demurrer to the complaint, dissolved the temporary injunction, and rendered judgment in favor of defendant. Plaintiff appeals from the order dissolving the injunction, and from the judgment.

Whether or not the court erred in sustaining the demurrer is the only question involved or presented, and this is reduced to the question whether the complaint shows that the demand of Hill for having published the delinquent list was not a lawful charge against the county. The claim of Hill was for having published the delinquent list four weeks immediately preceding June 20, 1895, as to which the complaint contains the following: "Plaintiff avers that said publication of said delinquent tax list or roll, if made, was and is entirely unauthorized by any law or order or ordinance, and without any right or authority whatever; that no advertisement for or notice of the letting of any contract therefor was made or given by the board of supervisors of said county, or at all; that no contract therefor was made by said board of supervisors with said Hill, or any one else, or at all; that said Hill was not, nor was any one else, the lowest or any bidder for the publication of said delinquent tax list; that no proposals therefor were asked for or received by said board of supervisors, or any one else; that no contract therefor was awarded to the lowest or any bidder by said board of supervisors, or by any one, or at all; that the publication of said list by said W. J. Hill, if made, was voluntary, and without any right, authority, or validity whatever; that said claim of said W. J. Hill, based and founded thereon as it is, is illegal, and constitutes no legal or valid claim or demand against the county of Monterey, and, if paid, will wrongfully and unlawfully increase the burden of taxation on this plaintiff and on and of all other taxpayers of said county." It is further alleged, in substance, that the defendant has declared and threatened that he will draw his warrant on the treasurer in favor of Hill for said sum of $466.65, and will do so unless enjoined by order of the court. No further statement of the contents of the complaint is necessary, since it is not claimed to be otherwise defective than in that it does not show that Hill's demand was not a lawful and valid charge against the county.

I think the court erred in sustaining the demurrer. The tax collector had no authority to contract for the publication of the delinquent list. Section 3766, Pol. Code, as amended March 28, 1895 (St. 1895, p. 326), provides: "The publication [of delinquent list] must be made once a week for three successive weeks in some newspaper, or supplement thereto, published in the county, and the board of supervisors must contract for such publication with the lowest bidder, and after ten days' public notice that such will be let. The bidding must be by sealed proposals. If there is no newspaper published in the county, then by posting a copy of the list in three public places in each township." Section 4046 of the same Code provides that "boards of supervisors in their respective counties have jurisdiction and power * * * (21) to contract for the county printing." Section 4047 of the same Code contains the following provisions: "The supervisors must contract for: (1) All county printing. * * * And all contracts must be made with the lowest bidder, and after ten days' public notice that such contract will be let. The bidding must be by sealed proposals." The complaint shows not only that there was no advertisement for bids, and no bids made for the publication of the delinquent list, but that the board of supervisors made no contract with Hill, nor with any other person, for the publication of said list, and that Hill had no contract with any person for the publication thereof. The only answer to this by counsel for respondent is that, inasmuch as the board of supervisors failed to perform its duty to advertise for bids and to make the contract as required by law, the duty to contract for the publication of the delinquent list devolved upon the tax collector, since section 3764, Pol. Code, required him to publish such list on or before the 5th day of June of each year. This argument is fully answered in the case of Times Pub. Co. v. Alameda Co., 64 Cal. 469, 2 Pac. 246, wherein all the above cited sections of the Political Code (as they then stood) were considered and construed. The only amendment of either of those sections affecting this case is that of section 3766, made March 28, 1895 (St. 1895, p. 326), which makes that section more favorable to the appellant than it was in 1884, when the Case of Times Pub. Co. was decided. As it then stood, it did not expressly say "the board of supervisors must contract for such publication," as it does since said amendment. In the case cited this court said: "The duty of preparing the delinquent tax list for publication and of causing it to be published therefore devolved upon the tax collector; but he could not provide for its publication, unless it had been let to the lowest bidder by sealed proposals, after ten days' public notice (section 3766, Pol. Code); and he had no authority to let such a contract, because the publication was part of the county printing, for which boards of supervisors in their respective counties were authorized to contract." Speaking of the sections of the Political Code above cited, the court further said: "Reading them together, it seems to be manifest that the legislature intended to give the power of contracting for the county printing to the boards of supervisors of the respective counties, and not to a county or township officer." It is to be observed, however, that the decision in the case cited was based solely upon those sections of the Political Code above cited, as the action was commenced before the enactment of the county government act; and that the question again arose after the passage of that act in the case of Publishing Co. v. Whitney, 97 Cal. 283, 32 Pac. 237, wherein the sole question was "whether or not, under the laws of this state, it is the duty of the tax collector to publish the delinquent tax list * * * in such newspaper as has tendered the lowest bid to do such advertising." In this later case, after referring to the case of Times Pub. Co. v. Alameda Co., supra, this court called attention to that part of twenty-fifth section, subd. 23, of the county government act, which reads as follows: "The board of supervisors shall annually fix the price at which the county shall be supplied with job printing and blank books, and also the price of all county advertising; and each county officer shall procure such blank books, job printing and advertising at a price no greater than is so fixed, and certify the bills therefor to the board of supervisors;" and said: "This changes the rule as declared in section 3766, Pol. Code, and the board of supervisors, of their own motion, now are to fix the price of county advertising, * * * without advertising for bids or sealed proposals. When that duty is performed by them, the tax collector must 'procure' some newspaper to do the advertising; not by any bid which may have been made, but at the price previously fixed by the board of supervisors, in their discretion." Thus it was held that the above-quoted provision of the county government act repealed by implication so much of section 3766 of the Political Code as was inconsistent therewith; citing Mendocino Co. v. Bank of Mendocino, 86 Cal. 255, 24 Pac. 1002, and Ex parte Benjamin, 65 Cal. 310, 4 Pac. 23. If section 3766, Pol. Code, was thus wholly or partially repealed, surely the amendment and re-enactment of that section in the form above set out, of March 28, 1895, likewise repealed so much of the county government act as was inconsistent therewith. Besides, the amendment makes it more specific to the intent that "the board of supervisors must contract for such publication" of the delinquent list. As to all other county printing, the county government act probably governs, since section 3766, Pol. Code, applies only to the delinquent tax list. I think the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed.

VANDERHURST v. THOLCKE et al. (S. F. 152.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 5, 1896.)

NUISANCE—TREES ON SIDEWALK—DETERMINATION OF CITY AUTHORITIES—REVIEW.

The determination of the common council of a city (given by the city charter the care and control of the streets, with power to define, prevent, and remove nuisances) that trees two to five feet in diameter, standing in the center of a sidewalk twelve feet wide, constitute a nuisance, cannot be reviewed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; N. A. Dorn, Judge.

Action by William Vanderhurst against J. W. Tholcke and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

J. J. Wyatt, for appellants. Parker & Sargent, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. This action was brought to enjoin the authorities of Salinas city from cutting down or removing, as an obstruction and nuisance, certain shade trees standing and growing on the sidewalk in front of plaintiff's premises, within the corporate limits of said municipality. The material facts found by the court are: That plaintiff's premises (which are on a corner) front on Pajaro and Alisal streets, two regularly established public streets of said city, under the control and management of the authorities thereof, having curbed and graveled sidewalks some 12 feet wide. The trees in question were set out by plaintiff many years since, and have now grown so that their trunks are from 2 to 5 feet in diameter, and with a height of about 50 feet, and they stand in a row almost in the center of the sidewalk—15 of them on Alisal, and 10 on Pajaro, street. That the city council has ordered the removal of the trees, as presenting an obstruction to public travel, and a nuisance. And that defendants and appellants (one of whom is the superintendent of streets of said city, and the other chairman of the street committee of the common council thereof) are threatening to carry said order into execution. It was further found, upon evidence admitted against the objection of defendants that the same was immaterial and incompetent, that said trees are of great use and benefit to plaintiff, and beautify and protect his premises; and that they are of public utility and benefit in furnishing shade from the heat of summer, and shelter from wind and storm, and serve to beautify the streets, etc.; and it is found that there is sufficient room and passageway for travel along said walks on each side of said trees. And, apparently as a conclusion and deduction from these last special and probative facts, the court found that the trees are not an obstruction to the use of the said streets or sidewalks, and do not constitute a nuisance. Judgment was entered restraining the removal of the trees, from which and an order refusing a new trial the defendants appeal.

It is contended that the finding that the trees do not constitute an obstruction or nuisance is without competent support, and this is the material question arising, since, without the aid of that finding, the judgment cannot stand. We are of opinion that this contention must be sustained. Under the charter of Salinas city, the common council is given the general care, custody, and control of the streets, with power to lay out, open, alter, vacate, improve, cleanse, and repair the same; to make regulations for the protection of health, safety, order, and cleanliness of the city; and to define prevent, and remove nuisances. Charter of Salinas City (St. 1875–76, p. 98.) Under this grant of power there can be no question that the city authorities can, and it is their duty to, cause the removal of anything constituting an obstruction to the streets and sidewalks (the latter being a part of the street), and abate it as a nuisance, since anything which is an obstruction to the free use of a public street constitutes a public nuisance. Pen. Code, § 370; Taylor v. Reynolds, 92 Cal. 573, 28 Pac. 688; Marini v. Graham, 67 Cal. 130, 7 Pac. 442. This power, indeed, is not questioned; but it is contended that the determination of the city authorities in the premises is not conclusive, but is open to review by the courts, and that it was competent for the court to take evidence upon the question as to whether or no the trees in question constituted an obstruction to the free use of the streets, and hence a nuisance. But the rule would seem to be that in an instance, where the thing may or may not, in its nature or circumstances, constitute an obstruction, the determination of the city authorities, in the absence of fraud or oppression or circumstances disclosing a manifest abuse of their discretion, is conclusive, and not open to question by the courts. North Chicago City Ry. Co. v. Town of Lake View, 105 Ill. 207; Roanoke Gas Co. v. City of Roanoke (Va.) 14 S. E. 665; Chase v. City of Oshkosh (Wis.) 51 N. W. 560. Mr. High, in his valuable work on Injunctions (volume 3, § 593), says: "Courts of equity are averse to interfering with the exercise of the discretion or judgment of public officers in matters committed to their care; and where municipal or town authorities are charged by law with the care of highways, and are empowered to remove obstructions therefrom, equity will not pass in review upon their judgments as to what constitutes an obstruction." And, in Beach on Public Corporations (section 1234), the author, speaking of the same character of obstruction as the one under consideration, uses this language: "A city may, without notice to an abutting landowner, remove shade trees which have been growing on the sidewalk of a public street, if they constitute an obstruction to public travel; and whether or not such trees are an obstruction must be determined by the proper city authorities, and their determination cannot be reviewed by the courts, unless they have clearly abused their discretion. It is not necessary, in order that trees shall constitute an obstruction so as to authorize their removal, that they should interrupt or stop travel."

In this instance we think it very clear, under the undisputed facts disclosed, that the question was one upon which the determination of the city council must be held final. As we have seen, the trees in controversy were very large, and, standing immediately in the center of the sidewalk, necessitate the public travel passing along the narrow edges or spaces left on either side thereof, instead of having the enjoyment of the entire width and surface of the walks to which it is entitled. Such an obstruction constitutes a nuisance per se. Chase v. City of Oshkosh, supra. It was not essential to the power of the city to remove the trees that they should completely obstruct the walk, or take up the entire width thereof. The degree of obstruction justifying their removal is a question for the city, in the absence, as we have said, of an abuse of discretion. The public is entitled to the free and unobstructed use of the entire street and sidewalk for purposes of travel, subject only to the reasonable and proper control of the municipality (24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 33, 34; Ex parte Taylor, 87 Cal. 91, 25 Pac. 258; Beach, Pub. Corp. supra); and that it cannot enjoy this right with the obstruction presented by these trees, situated as they are, is beyond question. When it became established, therefore, that the city council had determined that the trees constituted an obstruction to public travel such as to require their removal, the court should not have proceeded to review such action, and the evidence admitted for the purpose was wholly incompetent, and did not legally tend to sustain the finding based thereon. The mere form of the order declaring the trees a nuisance, and requiring their removal, was immaterial. An ordinance was not required for the purpose, and the order in question is clearly sufficient as a direction and authorization to the superintendent of streets to remove the obstruction. The judgment and order are reversed.

MURPHY v. CLAYTON et al. (S. F. 191.)

RESULTING TRUSTS — RIGHTS OF BENEFICIARY AGAINST ADMINISTRATOR AND CREDITORS OF TRUSTEE.

The beneficiary of a resulting trust in an undivided half of land, arising from title to land being taken in the name of a husband, while the purchase price was paid half by him and half by her, can claim such half against his administrator and general creditors, though the estate be insolvent; they not being purchasers, the law of fraudulent conveyances not being applicable, and she not being estopped, though after the conveyance the property, with the knowledge and consent of the wife, remained in the apparent sole possession and ownership of the husband, and his financial standing was based in part on the fact that the property stood in his name, and his indebtedness was contracted without notice to his creditors of his wife's equity; no act, conduct, or admission of hers by which the creditors were induced to give him credit being shown, and it not even being shown that they knew the title stood in his name, or that means were taken by them to ascertain the true state of the title.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Action by Ann Murphy against Edward W. Clayton, administrator of D. J. Murphy, deceased, and another. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant Clayton appeals. Affirmed.

Kittredge & Kraft and Rhodes & Barstow, for appellant. Geo. W. Lewis (J. H. Campbell, of counsel), for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. This is an action to establish a resulting trust in land. The cause was tried by the court, without a jury. Defendant Clayton, administrator, etc., appeals upon the judgment roll.

The following is a condensed statement of the findings of fact: The land described in the complaint was conveyed to D. J. Murphy on the 31st day of August, 1887, upon the consideration of $23,000 then paid by said D. J. Murphy and the plaintiff jointly; plaintiff paying one-half thereof, namely, $11,500, from her separate property and estate. From the date of said conveyance till on or about the 20th day of June, 1893, when said D. J. Murphy died, said land was of record in his name. Said conveyance was made to him with the knowledge and consent of plaintiff. From the date of said conveyance to the time of his death the premises remained in the apparent sole possession and ownership of said Murphy, and was managed and dealt with by him as apparently the sole owner thereof, with the plaintiff's knowledge and consent. The plaintiff (his mother) and the defendant Kate Murphy (his wife) were his only heirs at law. The defendant Clayton, by an order of court duly made on the 21st day of July, 1893, was appointed administrator of the estate of said D. J. Murphy, and from thence hitherto has been the duly qualified and acting administrator of said estate. Upon qualifying, he took possession of, and still holds, the whole of said land, claiming that it is a part of said estate. A notice to creditors was duly published on the 27th day of July, 1893. Within 10 months thereafter, claims against said decedent, aggregating $90,000, were presented and allowed by said administrator and the judge of the court. Said estate is insolvent if the half of the property claimed by the plaintiff be excluded therefrom. The financial standing and credit of said D. J. Murphy were good, and were based on his real estate holdings and other properties standing in his name, including the premises in dispute; and his indebtedness was contracted without notice to his creditors of the plaintiff's secret equity in said premises.

The consideration for the land having, at the time of the purchase, been paid (half of it by appellant's intestate, and half of it by the respondent), and the title taken by the former, a resulting trust arose in the land in favor of respondent for the undivided one-half thereof, that proportion being an aliquot part of the consideration. Olcott v. Bynum, 17 Wall. 44; Buck v. Swazey, 35 Me. 48; Woodside v. Hewel, 109 Cal. 484, 42 Pac. 152; Somers v. Overhulser, 67 Cal. 237, 7 Pac. 645; Davis v. Baugh, 59 Cal. 573; Case v. Codding, 38 Cal. 193; Dikeman v. Norrie, 36 Cal. 101; Hidden v. Jordan, 21 Cal. 99; Osborne v. Endicott, 6 Cal. 149; Perry, Trusts, § 127 et seq.; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1038, and numerous authorities there cited.

It is insisted by the appellant that he, as the representative of the creditors of the deceased debtor, can assert the priority and superiority of their claims over the secret equity of the plaintiff, under the rule declared in Riley v. Martinelli, 97 Cal. 575, 32 Pac. 579. In that case the apparent right and title of the debtor were sold under execution upon an indebtedness arising from a deficiency remaining after a sale in foreclosure. It was there held that "a judgment creditor purchasing at his own sale, equally with a third party making a purchase under the execution, is protected against latent equities of which he had no notice"; meaning, of course, of which he had no notice at the time of the sale. Further, at page 583, 97 Cal., and page 579, 32 Pac. it was said: "The plaintiff cannot be said to be in a better position than she would have been had she held an unrecorded conveyance of the property. It was in her power for many years to have enforced her equitable right to the property; but having failed to do so until a sale thereof, and recording of the evidence of such sale under an execution against her husband, who was the ostensible owner thereof, and in whose name the title was recorded, she comes too late to ask for relief against one clothed with the legal title and an equal equity." The decision proceeds upon the principle that the execution creditor, because he purchased the property without notice of the latent equity, was protected by the provisions of section 1107 of the Civil Code. That section gives a bona fide purchaser or incumbrancer, without notice, the right to hold against a prior purchaser having an unrecorded deed. The principle is familiar. In Bass v. Wheless, 2 Tenn. Ch. 535, it was held that, unless a purchaser has notice of the resulting trust, he takes the property freed of the equity of the cestui que trust, and that the advance of money on a mortgage is pro tanto a sale, "and gives such a mortgagee, to the extent of the money advanced, all the rights of a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice." So, also, in Haggard v. Benson, 3 Tenn. Ch. 278. In Catherwood v. Watson, 65 Ind. 576, it was held that the resulting trust must give way to the creditor, who purchased the property under execution, because of a statute of that state which reads: "No such trust, whether implied or created, shall defeat the title of the purchaser for a valuable consideration, and without notice of the trust." A resulting trust, being a purely equitable interest, is cut off and destroyed as against all bona fide purchasers or mortgagees from the trustee for a valuable consideration and without notice. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1043; Lehman v. Lewis, 62 Ala. 129; Flynt v. Hubbard, 57 Miss. 471. In Scott v. Umbarger, 41 Cal. 419, it is decided that one who purchases land from another who acquired the title fraudulently, and thereby became a trustee, in order to protect himself must have been ignorant of any of the facts constituting the fraud, not only at the time of his purchase, but when he paid the purchase money and obtained his deed.

It is claimed here that the appellant stands in the relation of an incumbrancer by reason of his administratorship, which gives him a right to the possession of all of the decedent's estate for the purposes of administration and for the payment of debts, which right of possession has been recognized as a lien by this court in Beckett v. Selover, 7 Cal. 238, Brenham v. Story, 39 Cal. 186, 188, and Smith v. Olmstead, 88 Cal. 586, 26 Pac. 521. But it will be observed that in all these cases, as well as in the sections of the Code of Civil Procedure applicable to the estates of deceased persons, the possession and lien mentioned relate to the estate of the decedent, and not to that which he held in trust for others. The decedent, D. J. Murphy, was the owner of but a moiety of the property, the other moiety belonging to the respondent. Neither the appellant nor any creditor of the decedent stands in the relation of purchaser or mortgagee of the property. Counsel for appellant does not mention any case which extends the doctrine of the cited cases, or applies section 1107 of the Civil Code to mere creditors who have not advanced money on mortgage or purchased at a sale; and I have been able to find no such case, and am of the opinion that the decision in Riley v. Martinelli, supra, cannot be considered applicable here.

The question remains: Does the finding that the conveyance was made to D. J. Murphy, and that from the date thereof to the time of his death he was in the apparent sole possession and ownership, managing and dealing with the property as his own, with respondent's knowledge and consent, coupled with the finding that his credit was based, in part, upon the fact that the property stood in his name, and his indebtedness was contracted without notice to his creditors of respondent's equity, estop the respondent and cut off that equity? I do not think the facts found tend to establish such estoppel. They show no act, conduct, or admission upon the part of the respondent by which the creditors were induced to give credit to the decedent. They do not show even that any of the creditors knew that the title to the property stood in his name, or that means were taken by any of them to ascertain the true state of the title. In Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 266, 10 Pac. 674, the court said: "To constitute the estoppel, the party claiming the benefit of it must be destitute of knowledge of his own legal rights, and of the means of acquiring such knowledge. Boggs v. Mining Co., 14 Cal. 279; Stockman v. Irrigation Co., 64 Cal. 57, 28 Pac. 116; Morrill v. Water-Power Co., 26 Minn. 229, 2 N. W. 842. To constitute such an estoppel, it must also be shown that the person sought to be estopped has made an admission or done an act, with the intention of influencing the conduct of another, or that he had reason to believe would influence his conduct, inconsistent with the evidence he proposes to give or the title he proposes to set up; that the other party has acted upon or been influenced by such act or declaration; that the party so influenced will be prejudiced by allowing the truth of the admission to be disproved. Brown v. Bowen, 30 N. Y. 519; Plumb v. Insurance Co., 18 N. Y. 392." Equity does not favor estoppels, and I see no reason why this case should not be determined according to the verity of the fact. Perry, Trusts, § 416. In Lord v. Bishop, 101 Ind. 334, where a husband received money from his wife's mother to be invested in lands for the wife, and took title in his own name, and held it 33 years, and then, when in debt, put the title in his wife, having during that time paid the taxes, and by his labor cleared and improved the land, it was held that equity would not subject it to the payment of his debts. The court said: "Taking the title in his own name made the husband as much her trustee as though he had received the money directly from his wife's hand. It was not for the husband to take to himself the benefaction which the mother intended to bestow upon her daughter, and his creditors can stand in no better attitude than he stood himself. Bank v. Kimble, 75 Ind. 195; Perry, Trusts, § 127. "That the husband spent his time and labor in clearing and improving the land, and that he paid the taxes, does not alter the case. The fact remains that it was his wife's land, and he could not improve it away from her." It is true that in that case the husband took the title in his own name without his wife's knowledge or consent; but that fact does not seem to have been considered important. The wife had had ample time to ascertain the fact, and to have the legal title transferred to herself. The reasoning of the court in Breeze v. Brooks, 71 Cal. 169, 9 Pac. 670, and 11 Pac. 885, more nearly applies to this case than that of any other case I have found. The decree of the court below adjudged that a deed made by John Brooks to his brother and co-defendant, Patrick Brooks, was fraudulent and void; and that Patrick took the legal title thereunder in trust for John and his successors in interest; and that he holds the same in trust for the plaintiffs, who were creditors of John and purchasers at a sheriff's sale of the land conveyed, under a judgment in their favor against John. The court said: "From the findings, it plainly appears that John had nothing except a naked legal title. Patrick had paid all the money for the land, and John, therefore, held it in trust for him. * * * John never, so far as Patrick knew, asserted any title adverse to Patrick's; and Patrick's right to assert his claim thereto was not barred, and John only conveyed to Patrick that which belonged to him. The findings negative the idea that the plaintiffs, in giving credit to John, relied on any statement of Patrick that John owned the land; nor is it there intimated that they examined the records of deeds * * * to find out what they disclosed in reference to John's title, or relied on them in any way to induce the credit which they extended to John. They seem to have relied on the facts that John lived on the land, claimed it in his conversations with them as his, and that he was insolvent, and Patrick knew it. * * * Therefore, it does not appear that the deed from John to Patrick was made to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. It was simply made to reinvest Patrick with the legal title to his own land." Held, that the purchaser at execution sale got no title, "as a purchaser at such sale can get no title save that of the judgment debtor," and that the findings, therefore, did not justify the decree. See the same case, upon a second appeal, reported in 97 Cal. 72, 31 Pac. 742. There is nothing illegal or against public policy in the mere fact that a party equitably entitled to real property permits the legal title to remain in another. Resulting trusts are fully recognized by our law, and every one is presumed to know the law. Clarke v. Dutcher, 9 Cow. 681–684; Gas Co. v. Brickwedel, 62 Cal. 642. I think the judgment of the court below legally results from the findings of fact, and therefore should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. ELLERT, Mayor, v. COGSWELL et al. (S. F. 133.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 4, 1896.)

TRUSTS—PUBLIC CHARITY—POWER OF STATE—PERPETUITY—ELEEMOSYNARY PURPOSES—IMPEACHING DEED.

1. The state, as representative of the public, may maintain an action to enforce, or prevent the mismanagement of, a public trust, such as is created by the conveyance of property to trustees, authorized by St. 1885, p. 49, for the founding or maintenance of an institution of learning.

2. It is essential to the validity of a charitable trust that the beneficiaries should be designated as a class only, leaving the numbers and individuals to be determined by the trustees in its administration.

3. The word "eleemosynary," in its modern and legal meaning, is interchangeable with "charitable," and the creation of a perpetuity by a conveyance of property in trust for the founding of an educational institution, as is authorized by St. 1885, p. 49, is not in violation of the constitutional provision which forbids perpetuities "except for eleemosynary purposes," though the institution is to be for the benefit of "the boys and girls of California," and not alone for those who are poor.

4. The burden of proof is on one attacking the validity of the deed of a married woman, which it is admitted she executed and acknowledged, to impeach the certificate of the notary, the recitals of which are in due form.

5. Where no power of revocation is reserved in a conveyance of property in trust for a public use, the trust does not fail, nor the property revert, by an abandonment or abuse of the trust by the trustees, but in such case the state may invoke the powers of a court of equity to correct the abuse.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Action by the state, on relation of L. R. Ellert, mayor, against Henry D. Cogswell, Caroline Cogswell, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Caroline Cogswell appeals. Affirmed.

W. T. Baggett, for appellant. Rodgers & Paterson, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Appeals from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial. Defendants Henry D. Cogswell and his wife, Caroline E. Cogswell, upon March 19, 1887, executed to certain trustees, themselves among the number, a deed of trust to real estate in the city and county of San Francisco. The trust was created under the provisions of the act of the legislature entitled "An act to advance learning, the arts and sciences, and to promote the public welfare by providing for the conveyance, holding and protection of property, and the creation of trusts for the founding, endowment, erection and maintenance within this state of universities, colleges, schools, seminaries of learning, mechanical institutes, museums and galleries of art." St. 1885, p. 49. The nature, object, and purposes of the trust were declared to be the erection and maintenance of a polytechnic college for the purpose of giving the boys and girls of the state of California a practical training in the mechnical arts and industries, the better to fit them to engage in the different pursuits of life. The trustees, including the defendants Cogswell, accepted the trust upon the day of the execution of the deed, and thereafter as a board managed and conducted its affairs. The defendants Cogswell attended the meetings of the board, and participated in its deliberations and acts.

The present action was brought by the state upon the relation of L. R. Ellert, mayor of San Francisco, to have the trust decreed valid, and for relief against certain acts and abuses of the defendants Cogswell and other defendant trustees, which acts, it is alleged, were designed to hinder the management of the trust, and to frustrate its purpose and defeat its object. The nature of these acts need not be specified, as an amicable stipulation was afterwards entered into, which eliminated these matters as issues in the case. Under this stipulation the action was dismissed as to one of the alleged recalcitrant trustees, other trustees were appointed to fill existing vacancies in the board, the Polytechnic College was to be reopened, and the defendant H. D. Cogswell consented to the entry of a judgment against himself decreeing that the deed created a valid and operative public trust. By this stipulation the rights of the wife, Caroline, were protected, and her claims and contentions reserved for adjudication. In the action she answered and filed a cross complaint. By her answer she raised the question of the validity of the trust, and by her cross complaint she pleaded that her hearing was imperfect, and that she did not know that she had signed the deed, nor did she understand its full meaning and import. It was read to her by the notary, but she failed to hear or comprehend it. There was no one present to advise her as to the meaning of the deed and its effect, or to inform her of her rights. She thought the papers were for the purpose of "establishing a school for those of small means," and believed she was merely signing for the incorporation of the college, and was simply accepting the trust as trustee. She discovered, while the paper was being read to her by the notary, that it purported to be a deed of some kind, because she heard him read descriptions of land; but she did not know in what way it concerned her, or that she had signed that particular paper. She trusted her husband, who deceived her in the matter. She had never had independent advice, and did not know that under the law the conveyance, which was of community property, was inoperative unless she joined therein. Had she known, she would not have executed it. She also pleaded that the trust is in contravention of the constitutional inhibition against perpetuities. The answer to this cross complaint was a denial and a plea of the statute of limitations. Defendant Caroline Cogswell also demurred to the complaint, and her demurrer was overruled.

The only ground of demurrer inviting consideration is that the state is not a party in interest, and therefore has not capacity to sue. The objection is not sound, and the demurrer was properly overruled. This action is based upon averments of a public trust. It is brought to remedy abuses in the management of this trust. It is not only the right, but the duty, of the attorney general to prosecute such an action. The state, as parens patriæ, superintends the management of all public charities or trusts, and in these matters acts through her attorney general. Generally speaking, such an action will not be entertained at all unless the attorney general is a party to it. Such was the rule at common law, and it has not been changed in this state. Even in those states, such as Massachusetts, where by special statute the attorney general is instructed to prosecute such actions, it is declared that the statute does not narrow or diminish in this regard the common-law powers incident to the office. Parker v. May, 5 Cush. 336. The principle and rule are thus succinctly stated in Attorney General v. Compton, 1 Younge & C. Ch. 417: Where property affected by a trust for public purposes is in the hands of those who hold it devoted to that trust, it is the privilege of the public that the crown should be entitled to intervene by its officers for the purpose of asserting, on behalf of the public generally, the public interest and the public right, which probably no individual could be found effectually to assert even if the interest were such as to allow it. 2 Kent, Comm. (10th Ed.) 359; Lewin, Trusts, § 665; 1 Daniell, Ch. Prac. § 13; Perry, Trusts, § 732.

2. It is next contended that the trust designating for its beneficiaries "the boys and girls of California" is void for uncertainty, because the trustees are not empowered to designate what boys and girls, and, if all applied, the trust would be impossible of execution. It should scarcely be necessary to observe that when the class has been designated this very vagueness and uncertainty and indefiniteness as to individuals and numbers is a necessary and essential element to the creation of a valid charitable trust. Perry, Trusts, § 710; Estate of Hinckley, 58 Cal. 488. It is in discussing such trusts that the supreme court of the United States says in Russell v. Allen, 107 U. S. 163, 2 Sup. Ct. 327: "They may, and indeed must, be for the benefit of an indefinite number of persons, for, if all the beneficiaries are personally designated, the trust lacks the essential element of indefiniteness, which is one characteristic of a legal charity. If the founder describes the general nature of the charitable trust, he may leave the details of the administration to be settled by trustees under the superintendence of a court of chancery."

3. It is claimed that the trust is void as creating a perpetuity which does not come within the exception of the constitution which forbids perpetuities "except for eleemosynary purposes." Herein it is argued that "eleemosynary" pertains exclusively to almsgiving; that alms are given to the poor; and that this trust is generally for "the boys and girls of California," and not specifically for the poor boys and girls. From this the claim is made that the constitution never meant to permit perpetuities for strictly educational purposes, or the word "eleemosynary" would never have been used. It may at once be said that the trust creates, and is intended to create, a perpetuity. It may further be said that the beneficiaries under it are not limited to the poor. But is it for these reasons any the less an eleemosynary trust? It is quite true that the word "eleemosynary" comes to us from the Greek word meaning "alms," but, while it is always interesting to note the origin and first meanings of words, this knowledge is frequently more curious than valuable; while to insist that the original meaning shall govern the word in its modern use and acceptation is very rarely permissible. It is in this way interesting to note that "sycophant" comes from Greek words meaning "fig informer"; but it would scarcely be contended to-day that a man could not properly be called a sycophant unless he had dealings in figs. In short, words by use are sometimes degraded, sometimes ennobled; sometimes narrowed in meaning, sometimes broadened. "Eleemosynary" has come in the law to be interchangeable with the word "charitable." A charitable trust or a charity is a donation in trust for promoting the welfare of mankind at large, or of a community, or of some class forming a part of it, indefinite as to numbers and individuals. It may, but it need not, confer a gratuitous benefit upon the poor. It may, but it need not, look to the care of the sick or insane. It may, but it need not, seek to spread religion or piety. Schools and libraries, equally with asylums, hospitals, and religious institutions, are included within its scope. It is impossible to enumerate specifically all purposes for which an eleemosynary trust may be created. The difficulty is inherent in the subject-matter itself. With the progress of civilization new needs are developed, new vices spring up, new forms of human activity manifest themselves, any or all of which, for their advancement or suppression, may become the proper object of an eleemosynary trust. As was said by this court in People v. Association, 84 Cal. 114, 24 Pac. 277: "The enforcement of charitable uses cannot be limited to any narrow and stated formula. As has been well said, it must expand with the advancement of civilization and the daily increasing needs of men. New discoveries in science, new fields and opportunities for human action, the differing condition, character, and wants of communities and nations, change and enlarge the scope of charity; and, where new necessities are created, new charitable uses must be established. The underlying principle is the same; its application is as varying as the wants of humanity." The objects and purposes of the present trust are purely charitable. The mode of effectuating the charity by the erection and maintenance of a polytechnic college is clearly set forth. The salaries of the professors, teachers, and instructors are to be paid out of the trust funds. Suitable college buildings are to be provided. Tuition is to be absolutely free so long as the resources of the trust will permit, and when a tuition fee is charged it is only to aid in maintaining the institution. Nothing is reserved for profit or gain. All goes to the spread of technical knowledge, and to the gratuitous instruction in the mechanic arts of the boys and girls of the state. Such a trust is in conformity with the act of 1885, and that act in no way contravenes the provisions of section 9, art. 20, of our constitution. Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518; Vidal v. Girard's Ex'rs, 2 How. 127; Russell v. Allen, 107 U. S. 163, 2 Sup. Ct. 327; American Academy, etc., v. President, etc., of Harvard College, 12 Gray, 582; Whicker v. Hume, 7 H. L. Cas. 124; President of United States of America v. Drummond, 33 Beav. 449.

4. The next point urged is that the evidence does not support the finding that Mrs. Cogswell duly made, signed, executed, and delivered the trust deed. It was admitted by appellant that Mrs. Cogswell's acknowledgment to the deed was in due form. The consideration is thus limited to the question of fact as to whether or not the provisions of section 1186 of the Civil Code were complied with by the notary before he affixed his certificate. The evidence upon this whole subject is conflicting. That of Mrs. Cogswell is sufficiently well epitomized in the foregoing summarization of her cross complaint. Upon the other hand, there was ample evidence to warrant the court in holding that she did understand the trust deed, and did freely execute it, without the imposition of any fraud or deceitful contrivance. There is upon this point the direct evidence of Thomas B. Bishop, who drew the instrument, and carefully read it aloud to her in the presence of others named as trustees, who had assembled in his office for the purpose of accepting the trust. He also informed her that it was necessary for her to be examined apart from her husband by the notary, in order that she might make a legal acknowledgment. Nothing indicated her lack of understanding of the instrument. Dr. Cogswell testified that his wife understood that property was to be donated by them for a school. "It was understood that I was not to include the Ohio street property. I did not tell her that we were going to put the Ohio street property in. That came in rather suddenly on me, and when she objected to it I said, 'That is a mistake.' I was afraid she would create a scene." Her objection when the deed was read was only to the including of this piece of property. Charles D. Stone testified that he was present at the reading of the instrument, and heard it read to Mrs. Cogswell. "When Mrs. Cogswell objected to the Ohio street property being put in, I said they would have it, or have control of it, as long as they lived, and it is so specified in the deed. When that part of the deed was read, Mrs. Cogswell turned to the doctor and said, 'I did not know you were going to put in the homestead,' or something to that effect. * * * I have since heard Mrs. Cogswell say that she thought it was a good thing the school was started; that she did not like it in the first place, but, after it was going, that they had done a good thing, a good work. * * * I never heard any complaint that she had been deceived until after they talked about the suits to recover the property." Mrs. Arnold was also present. She heard the deed read distinctly and carefully, and heard Mrs. Cogswell's objection to inserting the Ohio street property. After the execution Mrs. Cogswell asked the doctor why he had not told her that the deeds were to be signed that day. James G. Kennedy testified that Mrs. Cogswell told him after the college was open that she at first was not in favor of the work, but now she was thoroughly in favor of it, and was glad the deed was made. Mrs. Cogswell retired with the notary, King, to a room apart from her husband. King testified, in answer to interrogatories by the court, that he did not know she was deaf; that he read the paper carefully and deliberately, and took her acknowledgment when he "was satisfied that she fully understood the contents of the paper. * * * I sat down alongside of her, and told her that this was a deed, and the purport of it, and read it to her, and she assented to the acknowledgment." Some claim is made by appellant that the execution is void because Mrs. Cogswell was not asked by the notary whether or not she wished to retract it. The burden of proving want of due execution of an instrument admittedly signed and bearing a certificate of acknowledgment admittedly in due form was upon appellant. Upon the claim of appellant in this regard it is sufficient to say that there is no evidence in the case that she was not so asked. The notary's attention is not directed to the point; he is not questioned concerning it. The whole argument is based upon absence of evidence which it was appellant's duty to furnish, and which she failed to furnish, to overcome the presumptions attaching to a deed thus duly signed, and bearing a certificate of acknowledgment in lawful form.

Appellant's attacks upon other findings of the court do not require special consideration. Some of the findings were immaterial to the controversy by reason of the stipulation of the parties; the only important issues left for determination being those of the legality of the trust and of appellant's execution of the deed. What has been said renders unnecessary any consideration of the questions of her estoppel by laches and acquiescence, and the bar of the statute of limitations.

Other findings are against the averments of defendants' answer that the trust had been abandoned by the trustees; that they had made an improper lease of the trust property, and had violated their trust; that the trust had become impracticable, and that, therefore, the property had reverted, and should, in equity, be decreed to have reverted, to the founders. A trust in this state is not extinguished, nor does the property revert, for any of these reasons. If the trustees abandon, or in any way abuse, their trust, equity will correct the abuses, and remove the offenders. A trust is extinguished by the entire fulfillment of its object, by its object becoming impossible, or by its object becoming unlawful. Civ. Code, § 2279. No one of these contingencies has arisen, and the court was right in finding that the object of the trust had not become impracticable. The founders had reserved no power of revocation (Civ. Code, § 2280), and the acts complained of were mere abuses, which, in the absence of an express condition to that effect, did not work a reversion, but merely warranted the interposition of equity for their correction. Perry, Trusts, § 744; Brown v. Society, 9 R. I. 177; Barr v. Weld, 24 Pa. St. 84; Stanley v. Colt, 5 Wall. 119; Attorney General v. Town of Dublin, 38 N. H. 459; Sanderson v. White, 18 Pick. 328. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PACIFIC UNDERTAKERS v. WIDBER, Treasurer. (S. F. 288.)

COUNTIES — BURIAL OF INDIGENT — INCURRING INDEBTEDNESS EXCEEDING INCOME.

A claim under a contract between petitioner and the board of supervisors, by which petitioner was to bury the indigent dead for the fiscal year at a certain sum for each burial, is within Const. art. 11, § 18, declaring that no county shall "incur any indebtedness * * * in any manner or for any purpose, exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for it for such year without the assent," etc., and therefore cannot be paid from the income of a succeeding year, it not being an obligation imposed by law, though St. 1860, p. 272, gives the supervisors authority to allow and order paid out of the general fund such sums as may become due for burying the indigent dead, and Pen. Code, § 292, imposes the duty of burying the dead, first on relatives, next on the coroner, and next on those charged with the support of the poor, and section 293 provides that every person omitting to perform such duty shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and liable in treble damages to the person performing the duty.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Petition by the Pacific Undertakers for writ of mandate to A. C. Widber, treasurer. Judgment for petitioner. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

H. T. Creswell, for appellant. Wheaton, Kalloch & Kierce, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The Pacific Undertakers, a corporation, filed a petition in the superior court for a writ of mandate commanding A. C. Widber, treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco, to pay certain demands against said city and county amounting to $83.03, which had been regularly allowed and audited. The prayer of the petition was granted, and Widber appeals.

The demands were presented to the treasurer on June 26, 1893, and were for services rendered in burying indigent dead during the months of April and May, 1893; but the general fund of the treasury was entirely exhausted, and there was no money of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, to pay said demands, and there has not since been any money of said fiscal year to pay the said demands. However, since the 1st day of July, 1893, there has been, and at the time of the filing of the petition there was, sufficient money of the income and revenue of subsequent fiscal years with which to pay said demands. Respondent contends that the nature and character of the demands here sought to be enforced exempt them from the operation of the provision of section 18, art. 11, of the state constitution, that no county, etc., shall "incur any indebtedness or liability, in any manner or for any purpose, exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for it for such year, without the assent" of the electors expressed at an election, etc., as construed in Gas Co. v. Brickwedel, 62 Cal. 641, and subsequent cases on the subject. But the contention cannot be maintained. To sanction it would be to open the door to a rush of claims that would practically sweep away the entire constitutional provision in question. The demands here involved arose out of a contract between the petitioner and the board of supervisors, by which the former was to bury the indigent dead for one year, commencing July 1, 1892, and ending June 30, 1893,—the close of the fiscal year,—at a certain sum for each burial. The contract was made after an advertisement for bids, such as is required by law in the letting of contracts for services, goods, wares, etc., the petitioner being the lowest responsive bidder. By an act of the legislature of April 27, 1860 (St. 1860, p. 272), the board of supervisors was given, among other powers, authority "to allow and order paid out of the general fund such sums as are now due or may become due for burying the indigent dead." By section 292, Pen. Code, the duty of burying the body of a deceased person is imposed on certain relations in an enumerated order, and, if there be no such relation, then upon the coroner who held an inquest on the body, and, if there be no such coroner, then "upon the persons charged with the support of the poor in the locality in which the death occurs," and, if all these "omit to act," then upon the tenant or owner of the premises where the death occurred or the body is found. Section 293 provides that "every person" upon whom the duty rests who omits to perform it within a reasonable time is guilty of a misdemeanor, and is liable to the person who performs the duty in treble the expenses incurred by the latter in making the burial. And it is contended by petitioner that under these statutory provisions the demands here sought to be enforced are obligations imposed by law within the ruling of this court in Lewis v. Widber, 99 Cal. 412, 33 Pac. 1128, and therefore not within the declaration made in the Brickwedel Case, supra, that "each year's income and revenue must pay each year's indebtedness and liability, and no indebtedness or liability incurred in any one year shall be paid out of the income or revenue of any future year." But this position is not tenable. In Lewis v. Widber the question involved was the salary of a public officer, whose office had been created and his salary fixed at a definite, certain sum per month by an act of the legislature. The demand for the salary sought to be enforced there was not the result of any contract by the municipality, nor was it an indebtedness or liability incurred by the municipality, and for that reason it was held not to be within the limitation of the clause of the constitution under consideration. We there said: "It is quite apparent, however, that this clause of the constitution refers to an indebtedness or liability which one of the municipal bodies mentioned has itself incurred; that is, an indebtedness which the municipality has created, or a liability resulting in whole or in part from some act or conduct of such municipality. * * * But the stated salary of a public officer fixed by statute is a matter over which the municipality has no control, and with respect to which it has no discretion; and the payment of his salary is a liability established by the legislature at the date of the creation of the office. It therefore is not an indebtedness or liability incurred by the municipality within the meaning of said clause of the constitution." But in the case at bar the demand sought to be enforced was not fixed by the legislature. It arose directly out of the contract of the municipality, and was an indebtedness which it expressly incurred. It is, no doubt, the general duty of the municipal government to see that the bodies of deceased persons are properly disposed of, just as it is its general duty to do many other things necessary to public health, decency, comfort, and convenience. The sections of the Code above referred to are only declarations of a duty already existing, and which belongs to every municipality. The manner in which dead bodies shall be disposed of, the person or persons by whom they shall be buried, the amount which shall be paid for the work, etc., are all left to the discretion of the municipal authorities. Like all other expenditures necessary for the general welfare, and not fixed by statute, the amounts of the demands here in question are the result of a contract made by the board of supervisors, and therefore constitute a liability incurred by the municipality. They are, therefore, within the provision that no indebtedness shall be incurred "in any manner or for any purpose" exceeding, etc. If they are without that provision, then it is difficult to see how indebtedness incurred for any services or commodities necessary for the public welfare could be held to be within it, or how the constitutional limitation could be kept from being frittered entirely away. The judgment appealed from is reversed.

SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. v. PAINTER.

(No. 19,532.)

UNITED STATES LANDS — GRANTS — FINAL DETERMINATION OF RIGHTS THEREUNDER— JUDICIAL NOTICE.

1. The determination by the supreme court of the United States in an action between the United States and plaintiff (relative to certain lands within the limits, both of the grant to plaintiff by Act Cong. March 3, 1871, and the grant to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company by Act Cong. July 27, 1866) that Act 1871 gave plaintiff no right to any of the lands included within the limits of both grants, "finally determined" plaintiff's rights under Act 1871 to other lands within the limits of both grants, within an agreement for sale thereof by plaintiff to defendant, stipulating that, "in case it be finally determined that patents shall not issue" to plaintiff, money paid by defendant shall be returned. Van Fleet and McFarland, JJ., dissenting.

2. A state court will take judicial notice of an opinion of the court of the United States that an act of congress granting lands gave no rights to lands included both within the limits of its grant and the grant of a prior act of congress. Van Fleet and McFarland, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company against Painter, as administrator. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. D. Redding and J. S. Mosby, for appellant. A. R. Metcalfe and Anderson & Anderson, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff entered into two several contracts with the defendant's intestate August 18, 1887, for the sale to the latter of two certain sections of land in the county of Los Angeles. The land described in the agreements was claimed by the plaintiff as a portion of a grant to it by the United States by virtue of the act of March 3, 1871. At the date of the agreements, no patent had been issued therefor, and each of the agreements contained the following covenant: "In case it be finally determined that patent shall not issue to said party of the first part for all or any of the tracts herein described, it will, upon demand, repay (without interest) to the party of the second part all moneys that may have been paid to it by him on account of any such tract as it shall fail to procure patent for." The defendant's intestate paid to the plaintiff 20 per cent. of the purchase money, with one year's interest upon the remainder, at the execution of the agreements, and, by their terms, was to pay the balance of the purchase money, with interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, on or before August 18, 1892. No other payments having been made, the plaintiff, after the maturity of the agreements, brought the present action to compel their performance, or, in case the defendant failed so to do within a specified time, for a sale of the land in satisfaction of the amounts unpaid upon the agreements, and for a foreclosure of the defendant's right therein. In the answer to the complaint, the defendant denied all liability to the plaintiff, and pleaded as a counterclaim the above payment to the plaintiff by his intestate at the execution of the agreements, the aforesaid covenant of the plaintiff, and alleged that it had been finally determined by the supreme court of the United States and by the land department of the United States that patent should not issue from the United States to plaintiff for said tract of land, nor for any part thereof. At the trial it was stipulated that the two sections of land were claimed by the plaintiff under the act of congress of March 3, 1871; and that it had no other title or claim thereto save that derived under said act; and that the said two sections are within the limits of the grant to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company by the act of congress of July 27, 1866, and also within the limits of the grant to the plaintiff by the aforesaid act of congress of March 3, 1871. The court found that it had been finally determined that plaintiff was not entitled to any patent for the lands described in the agreements, and rendered judgment for the defendant upon his counterclaim. The plaintiff has appealed.

In U. S. v. Railroad Co., 146 U. S. 570, 13 Sup. Ct. 152, and in another case between the same parties, 146 U. S. 615, 13 Sup. Ct. 163, the right of the plaintiff herein by virtue of the act of March 3, 1871, to any of the lands which were included in the grant by congress to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company under the act of July 27, 1866, was considered by the supreme court after a full and elaborate argument thereon; and that court held that by the act of 1866 the title to these lands passed to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, and was held by that corporation until the act of forfeiture, passed July 6, 1886; that as the act of March 3, 1871, had no effect upon lands that had been previously granted, it did not include any of the lands within the limits of the grant to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company under the act of 1866; that by the act of forfeiture passed July 6,

1886, the lands became public lands, and that the plaintiff herein never had title of any kind to said lands. It is contended by the plaintiff that, notwithstanding this decision of the supreme court, it is not liable under its covenant aforesaid to repay the moneys received by it on the contracts in question, for the reason that the decision in that case was with reference to other lands than those involved herein, and that its liability under the covenant cannot arise until it has been finally adjudged, in a proceeding in which these particular sections are the subject of controversy, that it has no right to a patent therefor. It would, however, be giving too narrow and technical a meaning to the expression "finally determined," as used in the agreements to hold that it is the equivalent of "finally adjudged," or that it was the intention of the parties thereto that the money should not be repaid until it had been determined, in a proceeding to obtain a patent for the particular sections of land described in the agreements, that the plaintiff is not entitled to a patent therefor. The lands in question were but a small fraction of a very large tract claimed by the plaintiff under the same title. The plaintiff had made numerous contracts of the same character as the ones in question. The application for a patent was to be made by the plaintiff. Its right to a patent for these lands involved its right to any of the lands which were within the limits of the grant to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, and depended upon the determination of that question. It is but reasonable to hold that it was the intention of the parties to the agreement that, whenever that question was "finally determined," —that is, determined by a tribunal whose decision would be a final determination of the question,—the plaintiff's liability under the covenant would be also determined; and that, if that question was determined adversely to the plaintiff, it would thereupon repay the money. In the case of U. S. v. Railroad Co., supra, the question for determination was the right of the plaintiff herein to any of the lands within the limits of the grant to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company under the act of July 27, 1866; and the court then held that it had no right to any of those lands, and that the act of 1871 gave no right thereto. Upon the stipulation in the present case that the lands described in the agreements are within the limits of the grant of July, 1866, and that the plaintiff has no title or claim thereto save that derived under the act of March 3, 1871, the superior court had no alternative than to apply the law as thus declared by the supreme court of the United States, and to hold that the question of the plaintiff's right to a patent for said lands had been finally determined adversely to the plaintiff. The supreme court of the United States is the ultimate tribunal for interpreting and determining the effect of an act of congress, and all other courts are bound to take judicial knowledge as well of its interpretation of the act as of the act itself. The interpretation and construction of an act of congress by the supreme court is determinative of the law which congress has enacted, and is binding upon the judiciary of the several states as well as of the United States; and the courts of the several states take judicial notice of the opinions of the supreme court of the United States, and of the law as declared therein, in the same way and to the same extent that the superior courts of this state take judicial notice of the opinions of this court. The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; TEMPLE, J.; HENSHAW, J.

VAN FLEET, J. I dissent. The contracts sued on are in all respects similar to those involved in the case of Pacific Co. v. Allen (No. 15,714, recently decided) 44 Pac. 796; and the material facts are the same as in that case, except as herein noted.

The case was submitted upon an agreed statement of facts, the substance of which was as follows: The plaintiff's only claim to the land in question was under the act of congress of March 3, 1871, granting lands to it for its branch line. The said lands lie within the limits of that grant, and also within the limits of the grant made by the act of congress of July 27, 1866, to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, at the crossing of the lines of said railroads as definitely located. That the lands are unsurveyed, and no steps have been taken by plaintiff to obtain a patent for the same. "That there is now pending, and was pending at the time that case, reported in 146 U. S. Reports, page 570 [13 Sup. Ct. 152], was decided, a suit in the circuit court of the United States," brought by the United States against the parties to this action, for trespass on said lands, and to quiet the title thereto. That the defendant's intestate took possession of said lands, but that defendant has exercised no acts of ownership over the same. The court found that plaintiff never owned and never had any interest in the lands, and is not ready, willing, or able to perform the agreements in question, and never will be able to perform the same, and further found: "That it has been finally determined by the supreme court of the United States, and by the land department of the United States, that patent shall not issue from the United States to plaintiff" for any of the lands in question.

We held in the case No. 15,714, above referred to, that the plantiff was entitled to recover in such an action, unless it had been "finally determined" that a patent should not issue to plaintiff. The only question now to be determined, therefore, is whether the finding of the court here that such final determination has been had is justified by the evidence. There is no evidence in the case other than that contained in the agreed statement, and I fail to find in that statement any evidence of any determination, final or otherwise, that patent shall not issue to plaintiff. Counsel for respondent refers to the case of U. S. v. Railroad Co., 146 U. S. 570 [13 Sup. Ct. 152], in which case, they say, the supreme court of the United States decided that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company has "no title of any kind" to the lands within the overlapping limits of the two grants above referred to. It is not contended that the particular lands here in question were involved in the issues of that case; but counsel contend, under the authority of Bissell v. Spring Valley Tp., 124 U. S. 225, 8 Sup. Ct. 495, and other cases, that the judgment in that case concludes the plaintiff, by way of estoppel, from claiming title to any lands within those overlapping limits, and therefore amounts to a final determination that patent shall not issue to plantiff for the lands in question. The question thus raised is one of great delicacy. This court is, in effect, asked to say that the supreme court of the United States cannot reconsider its views on that question, but must, should the question of the title to these lands come before it, hold itself absolutely concluded by its former decision in a case involving entirely different lands. We should hesitate long before assuming thus to set bounds to the power of that court; but the exigencies of this case do not, in my judgment, require any decision of that question. Under these contracts, the defendant is bound to make the payments agreed upon, unless it has been "finally determined" that a patent shall not issue. Whatever our views may be as to the effect of the decision referred to, it is, at least, possible that the supreme court of the United States may hold, when the question comes before it, that plaintiff is entitled to a patent for these lands. It is evident, then, that the decision is not a final determination of the question here involved. At the most, it could only be used to show what that final determination will be when rendered; but it is not, in itself, a determination that patent shall not issue for the lands involved in this action. But, if that were not so, still defendant cannot avail himself of that case; for there is no evidence in the record that any such judgment was ever rendered as would bind the plaintiff even by way of estoppel. It is true that the agreed statement incidentally refers to a "case reported in 146 U. S. Reports, page 570" [13 Sup. Ct. 152]; but no facts are stated showing that the plaintiff was actually a party to that suit, or what the issues therein were, or whether the court had any jurisdiction of the parties. Still less is it shown that the defendant here was a party or privy to that suit, or would be bound by the judgment therein. Such a loose, incidental mention of a decision by an appellate court is not evidence on which a finding of estoppel by judgment should be predicated.

But counsel for respondent contend that the judgment in that case is an "official act of the judicial department of the United States," of which this court must take judicial notice, under subdivision 3, § 1875, Code Civ. Proc., and that the 146th volume of the Reports of the Supreme Court of the United States is an "appropriate book of reference," to which this court may resort for that purpose. If that be so, a great and hitherto unnoticed change in the rules of evidence has been wrought by the section referred to. According to that construction, a party relying on a judgment of any court of this state, or of the United States, may abstain entirely from producing the record, or, indeed, any evidence of such judgment, and may require the court to ascertain the fact for itself. But section 1905 of said Code expressly requires such records to be proved by the production of the original or of a certified copy thereof; and, as that section is contained in the chapter of the Code upon this very subject, its provisions must prevail as to that subject over those of section 1875, which is contained in another chapter of a more general scope. Pol. Code, § 4482. It is therefore not necessary to determine here precisely what are the "public and private official acts of the judicial departments of this state and of the United States," referred to in section 1875. If these words include the judgment of a court in an action inter partes, and the various steps in the action leading up to that judgment, that section would so far conflict with section 1905, and the latter must prevail. It should be further noted that, if the defendant in this action was not a party to the suit in question (and there is no evidence that he was a party thereto), he would not be estopped by the judgment therein, and would be entitled, in the pending suit mentioned in the agreed statement, to claim that a patent should issue to plaintiff for his benefit. In that event it is certainly possible that such patent may yet be issued. Defendant is therefore not entitled to rely upon any supposed estoppel as between the United States and plaintiff. In any point of view, then, the finding in question is unsupported by evidence.

The finding that plaintiff never will be able to perform its agreement, for the reason that it has no title or interest in the lands in question, is also unsupported by the evidence. The question of plaintiff's title, in a general sense, is wholly irrelevant. Plaintiff contracted to convey, not the title it had, nor a title to be pronounced good by a court, but such title as the United States should thereafter convey by its patent. The contract, by its terms, was to continue in force until it should be finally determined that patent should not issue. That determination can be made only by some competent tribunal of the United States; and it is not for any court of this state to say, in an action like the present, how that question will or should be determined.

For these reasons I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

I concur: McFARLAND, J.

(Supreme Court of California. June 16, 1896.)

Injunction Pendente Lite—Jurisdiction.

In an action for divorce the court has jurisdiction, in a proper case and on a proper showing, to grant an injunction pendente lite, restraining plaintiff from alienating his separate property.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Petition by George E. White for a writ of habeas corpus for the purpose of obtaining his discharge from custody under a judgment finding him guilty of contempt in violating an injunction made pendente lite in an action by him for divorce. Writ discharged.

Carl Spelling and Alexander Laidlaw, for petitioner. Walter H. Linforth and W. H. Baggett, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Petitioner was adjudged guilty of contempt in disobeying and violating the injunction of the court made pendente lite in the action of divorce entitled "George E. White v. Frankie White." The injunction restrained petitioner from alienating his separate property. The only jurisdictional question involved turns upon the power of the court to issue such an injunction in a divorce proceeding pending the litigation. We entertain no doubt that in a proper case, and upon a proper showing, this may be done. High, Inj. §§ 1393–1395; Bish. Mar. & Div. §§ 1106, 1107, and notes, where cases are collated. Whether or not the injunction in this case was warranted by the circumstances, or was an abuse of the discretion of the trial judge, is a question which cannot be considered in this proceeding. The restraining order being within the jurisdiction of the court to make, it follows that the prisoner must be remanded. Writ discharged, and prisoner remanded.

RUSSELL v. PACIFIC RY. CO. et al. (COBB et al., Interveners. No. 19,573).

Corporations — Statutory Liability of Stockholders—Enforcement in Foreign State.

1. Where a statute creates a liability against the stockholders of a corporation, and prescribes a remedy for its enforcement, that remedy is exclusive.

2. In such case the liability cannot be enforced in a foreign state.

3. A statute of Illinois making stockholders liable for the debts of the corporation to the amount of their stock remaining unpaid, and providing that whenever any action is brought to recover against a corporation it shall be competent to proceed against any one or more stockholders at the same time, as in case of garnishment, etc., creates a special remedy, which cannot be enforced in California.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Creditors' bill by Edward W. Russell against the Pacific Railway Company and others, in which S. B. Cobb and others filed a complaint in intervention. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order refusing a new trial, said interveners appeal. Affirmed.

E. Walker, W. P. Gardiner, and Allen, Cowrey & Miller, for appellant Russell. S. C. Hubbell and T. Z. Blakeman, for interveners. Chapman & Hendrick, J. D. Bicknell, and Bicknell & Trask, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. The plaintiff brings this action as a judgment creditor of the Pacific Railway Company, in his own behalf and for other creditors of the corporate defendant and of the Los Angeles Cable-Railway Company, for the appointment of a receiver, for the sale of its property, and that the sum due from stockholders of the Pacific Railway Company on their stock, so far as necessary, may be called in. Numerous stockholders resident in California are made defendants. A complaint in intervention was filed in behalf of numerous persons who claim to be creditors of the Pacific Railway Company in various amounts. These creditors have no joint or common interests whatever, but claim the right to thus join under the provisions of a statute of the state of Illinois, which was proven at the trial. February 10, 1891, Charles H. Morse in the superior court of Cook county, Ill., recovered a judgment against the Pacific Railway Company for a sum of money, and caused an execution to be issued on said judgment, which was afterwards returned nulla bona. Afterwards, upon the averment of the insolvency of the corporation, said Morse caused a receiver to be appointed for said corporation by the said Illinois court. On the 20th day of January, 1891, plaintiff recovered a judgment in the superior court of Los Angeles county against the Pacific Railway Company for the sum of $1,058.48, and thereafter commenced this action, and has procured a receiver to be appointed to impound the assets of the Pacific Railway Company. It is averred, and practically found, that the corporation is utterly insolvent. Judgment was entered for the defendants, and the interveners, having made a fruitless application for a new trial, now appeal both from the order refusing a new trial and from the judgment.

One reason urged by the respondents why the appeal should not be sustained is that, as they contend, an action of this character cannot be maintained in this state; that is to say, it is a special remedy given by the statute of Illinois, and can be enforced nowhere else. The law of the state of Illinois, as found by the court, is as follows: By the eighth section of the act under which the Pacific Railway was incorporated it was provided that: "Each stockholder shall be liable for the debts of the corporation to the extent of the amount that may be unpaid upon the stock held by him, to be collected in the manner herein provided. No assignor of stocks shall be released from any such indebtedness by reason of any assignment of his stock, but shall remain liable therefor jointly with the assignee until the said stock be fully paid. Whenever any action is brought to recover against the corporation, it shall be competent to proceed against any one or more stockholders at the same time to the extent of the balance unpaid by such stockholders upon the stock owned by them respectively, whether called in or not, as in cases of garnishment. Every assignee or transferree of stock shall be liable to the company for the amount unpaid thereon to the extent and in the same manner as if he had been the original subscriber." Laws 1871–72, p. 299. By section 25 of the same statute it is further provided that under certain circumstances a creditor who has obtained a judgment against the corporation, and whose execution has been returned nulla bona, may bring suits by joining the corporation against the persons who were stockholders at the time or in any way liable for the debts of the corporation, to compel each stockholder to pay his pro rata share of such debts, or liabilities to the extent of the unpaid portion of the stock after exhausting the assets of the corporation. Further, it authorized courts of equity, on good cause shown, to dissolve the corporation, and close up the corporate business, and to appoint a receiver, who shall in all cases be a resident of the state of Illinois. Counsel for appellants admit that the proceedings provided for in the twenty-fifth section can be taken only in the state of Illinois. It is a special remedy, providing for contribution among the stockholders, and a possible dissolution of the corporation and a winding up of its business. They contend, however, that the eighth section merely creates a liability, which is in the nature of a contract liability, and which is enforceable wherever the stockholder can be found. The general rule upon this subject is very well established. Where a statute creates a right and prescribes a remedy for its enforcement, that remedy is exclusive. Where a liability is created which is not penal, and no remedy is prescribed, the liability may be enforced wherever the person is found. The procedure will, however, be entirely governed by the law of the forum. If the law creating the liability provides for a particular mode for enforcing it, the mode limits the liability. If it be a contract, the parties here contracted with the understanding that they can be held liable in no other way. Bank v. Francklyn, 120 U. S. 747, 7 Sup. Ct. 757. And such a liability cannot be enforced in another state. Young v. Farwell, 139 Ill. 326, 28 N. E. 845; Bank v. Rindge, 154 Mass. 203, 27 N. E. 1015; Fowler v. Lamson, 146 Ill. 472, 34 N. E. 932; Jessup v. Carnegie, 80 N. Y. 441; Erickson v. Nesmith, 4 Allen, 233. By the eighth section of the Illinois statute, above quoted, a special remedy is provided, and, not only so, but plainly it was intended that it should be the only remedy. By the first clause, apparently, an absolute liability is imposed upon the stockholder for the debts of the corporation to the extent of the amount unpaid upon his stock. If this were all, the liability would be primary, and could be enforced without suing the corporation, and without reference to its solvency. In fact, nowhere in this section is it made of any consequence whether the corporation is solvent or insolvent, or whether or not it has assets which could be reached by ordinary writ. The next clause, however, expressly limits the collection of the debt to the mode prescribed, which is by garnishment. And this may be done whether the amount unpaid has been called in or not. Whether this can be done after the assets have been impounded by the appointment of a receiver for the purpose of liquidation will depend upon the laws of Illinois. It is said that it has been there held that it can be done by what is called "equitable garnishment." It would not be so here. The unpaid subscription would, with other assets, pass to the receiver, to be collected and disbursed under the direction of the court. The Illinois remedy cannot be imported here.

I think the question has been passed upon by the courts of Illinois in Pease v. Union, 1 Ill. App. 287, which was a proceeding under the eighth section. The court said: "It will be seen by the terms of this statute a new remedy is provided for the creditors of corporations by providing that 'whenever any action is brought to recover any indebtedness against the corporation, it shall be competent to proceed against any one or more stockholders at the same time, * * * as in case of garnishment.' There has been some discussion between counsel in the case as to the proper form of procedure by the usee, Miller, to avail himself of this new remedy. There has been no judicial construction of this statute that we are aware of, and we are left to determine just what the mode of proceeding contemplated by the legislature was. We think the language employed in the statute is unambiguous, and, fairly interpreted, means that a creditor of a corporation may bring suit in any of the usual forms of action for any indebtedness due to him from such corporation, and, upon suing out summons, may, by virtue of this statute, sue out at the same time a garnishee summons, directed to any of the stockholders of such corporation whose subscription to the capital stock thereof is wholly or in part unpaid; and by the service of such garnishee summons upon such stockholder prevent his further payment for such stock to the corporation, but hold the same in abeyance, to await the result of the trial of the original cause; and when a recovery is had (if at all) the garnishee may be then compelled to respond to such judgment creditor instead of paying his said indebtedness to the corporation. This is briefly and substantially the proceeding which we think the state authorizes at the instance of a creditor of a corporation." This language is unambiguous, and shows the construction given to the statute by the courts of Illinois. Independently of this ruling we should have no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the Illinois statute does not create a liability which can be enforced here. The interveners, therefore, have no standing as litigants in the case, and the order and judgment are affirmed.

COOPER v. MILLER et al. (No. 18,333.)

TAXATION — IRRIGATION DISTRICT — ASSESSMENT AND LEVY—PLEADING—EJECTMENT—FINDINGS.

1. Under St. 1887, p. 40 (Irrigation Act) § 18, subd. 3, providing the manner of assessment of city and town lots, it is proper to assess contiguous lots owned by one person, and used together, and on which is a building covering a part of each lot, together, as one parcel.

2. That a levy by the board of directors of an irrigation district, for the purpose of paying interest on the district bonds, and also for current expenses of the district, are both embraced in the same order, the amount for each purpose being stated, does not render the levy invalid.

3. While an election authorizing it is a condition precedent to a valid levy for special purposes under section 41 of the irrigation act, it is not necessary that the order of the board of directors making the levy should recite such election.

4. In ejectment based on a tax deed, where it is essential to plaintiff's case to prove each fact going to establish the validity of his deed, an allegation in the answer of payment of the tax before sale of the property does not create a material issue, requiring a finding thereon, the fact being covered by a finding as to the validity of the deed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Colusa county; E. A. Bridgford, Judge.

Action by H. M. Cooper against William Miller and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. M. Alberry, K. Alberry and Edwin Swinford, for appellants. W. C. Belcher and J. W. Good, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action of ejectment to recover possession of certain town lots. Plaintiff's claim of title is based upon a tax deed executed by the tax collector of Central irrigation district, upon a sale for a delinquent tax levied by the board of directors of said district. Defendants appeal from the judgment and order denying their motion for a new trial, and claim that the assessment, levy, sale, and deed made thereunder are void. Section 30 of the irrigation act (St. 1887, p. 40) provides: "The matter recited in the certificate of sale must be recited in the deed, and such deed duly acknowledged or proved is prima facie evidence that—First, the property was assessed as required by law; second, the property was equalized as required by law; third, that the assessments were levied in accordance with law; fourth, the assessments were not paid; fifth, at a proper time and place the property was sold as prescribed by law, and by the proper officer; sixth, the property was not redeemed; seventh, the person who executed the deed was the proper officer." Invoking these provisions of the statute, plaintiff introduced his deed in evidence as establishing a prima facie case of title in himself, and rested. It is claimed that the assessment is void because the five town lots were assessed in one parcel, with one valuation upon the whole parcel, and one valuation for the improvements upon the entire parcel. The lots were also sold in one parcel for the nonpayment of the tax. Section 18 of the irrigation act provides that the assessor must assess: "All the property in the district, and must prepare an assessment-book with appropriate headings, in which must be listed and specified in separate columns under the appropriate head: * * * Three. City and town lots, naming the city or town, and the number of lot and block, etc., and the improvements thereon."

Is this assessment void as violative of the foregoing requirements of the law? The provisions of this act as to the manner and character of the assessment are duplicated from the provisions of the Political Code pertaining to assessments levied for the purposes of state and county taxation; and defendants, to support their contention, rely upon various decisions of this court made in the construction of those provisions of the Political Code. The principal case may be said to be Terrill v. Groves, 18 Cal. 149. There the assessment was held to be void. But that case is widely variant in its facts from the case at bar. There town lots in two distinct and separate blocks, not even contiguous, while valued separately, were carried out upon the roll in a lump assessment, and a single tax charged up against the lots as a whole. In addition to these salient facts, upon one lot there were improvements, and the tax upon these improvements was charged against all the land. In People v. Morse, 43 Cal. 534, it was held that an entire block or a half block owned by a single individual might be assessed in one parcel, and this notwithstanding the blocks were divided into lots; and, in sound reason, there is no more cause for assessing a block of land owned by one party in lots, than there is in assessing a section of land owned by a single individual in 80 or 160 acre tracts. The land involved in this litigation consisted of five lots, with a frontage of 25 feet each, adjoining, and all belonging to the defendant Miller. A livery stable was situated upon these lots, and extended over and upon each of them. Upon such a state of facts, we are clear that for the purposes of taxation the entire five lots should be held to be but a single parcel of land, and so assessed. With a building resting upon them all, any other kind of assessment would be improper. To divide the improvement into fifths, and assess an undivided one-fifth thereof upon each lot, would be a practice not contemplated by the law. To hold that the statute requires that the land upon which the Palace Hotel of this city, or any other large building, is situated, should be assessed by lots, and the improvements assessed and apportioned in undivided parts to each lot, would be to declare an absurdity existing in law, where there is no reason whatever for it. The case of Weaver v. Grant, 39 Iowa, 294, is directly in point upon this question, and by its syllabus declares: "The use and nature of the property must determine whether or not several lots assessed to one owner, and sold en masse, should be regarded as one lot. Where two lots were occupied and used for one purpose, the buildings being partly on each, it was held that they might be sold for taxes together."

The board of directors of the district is empowered. by section 22 of the act, to levy assessments to pay interest upon the bonded indebtedness, and by section 41 the board of directors is also authorized to levy assessments for special purposes therein named. Upon October 1, 1889, the board passed the following order and resolution: "Whereas, the assessment roll of Central irrigation district for the year 1889–90 has been completed, and the assessment on the property mentioned therein equalized, and there being two hundred and ninety-two bonds of the district, of the par value of five hundred dollars each, now outstanding, on which the annual interest from July 1, 1889, to July 1, 1890, aggregates the sum of $8,760, it is by the board of directors of said district now here ordered that an assessment sufficient to raise the annual interest on the aforesaid outstanding bonds, and to defray the expenses of the care, operation, management, repair, and improvement of such portions of the canal and works as are completed and in use, including the salary of officers and employés, be, and the same is hereby, levied and ordered collected on each one hundred dollars on the assessed valuation of the property of the Central irrigation district for district purposes as aforesaid, for the second fiscal year 1889–90, as follows, to wit: For bond fund, thirty cents; for general fund, twenty cents; total assessment, fifty cents on each one hundred dollars." It is now claimed by defendants that the aforesaid order is void, upon the ground that a double levy, or a levy for a double object and purpose, is joined in one order of the board. There is nothing in this objection. It is plainly apparent from the order what action was taken by the board. There was no reason why a levy for two different objects could not be incorporated in one order, and here the amount and character of each levy are fully and clearly set forth.

It is claimed that the levy for special purposes was in excess of the power of the board, inasmuch as the electors of the district, at an election held for that purpose, had not authorized the board to make it. It is conceded that if no election was held that fact would be fatal to the validity of this levy. Tregea v. Owens, 94 Cal. 313, 29 Pac. 643. But defendants offered no evidence whatever upon the question of an election, and, plaintiff having established a prima facie case by the introduction of his deed, in the absence of other evidence we are bound to assume that an election as authorized by law was held, for the deed is made by statute prima facie evidence that the assessments were levied in accordance with law.

It is claimed that the order of the board of directors in making the levy contains no recital that an election had been previously held, and, therefore it must be assumed that no election was held. While it is true that the election is a condition precedent to the making of a valid levy by the board, yet there is no statute requiring the order of levy to recite the fact of a previous election, and, on principle, there is no reason why it should do so. If such recital was contained in the order, it would not be conclusive upon the owner of the land assessed. He could still go behind it, and show its falsity. It is the fact of the election, and not a statement in the order that an election was held, which gives the board power to make the levy. Unless some provision of law required such a recital to be set out in the order making the levy, the absence of it is no evidence that an election was not held, authorizing the board to act in the premises. Although the election is a condition precedent to the making of the levy, there are many other conditions precedent of equal importance and gravity, as that the property must be assessed as required by law, or the property must be equalized as required by law. No levy would be valid unless these things were done, yet a recital of them in the order would not conclude inquiry as to the truth or falsity of the recital. These views are fully supported by People v. Hagar, 49 Cal. 229. Counsel cite a few Michigan cases as supporting his contention. We think they fail to reach the mark, but, aside from that, there is no such rule of law.

It is insisted that the collector's deed, when offered in evidence by plaintiff, should have been rejected as invalid, upon the ground that the assessment of the entire five lots as one parcel of land rendered it void. We have disposed of this objection in discussing the first proposition advanced. A great portion of the examination of the witness Welch related to the manner and character of the assessment of other property situated within the district. Such evidence was clearly objectionable as immaterial, and, as to the other matters upon which he was questioned, we see no error in the record.

The complaint in this case is the simple and ordinary complaint in ejectment. The answer contains a denial of ownership, and, among other things, alleges that the assessment was fully paid and discharged prior to the sale. At the trial, evidence was introduced upon this question of payment, and defendants now claim that the allegation in the answer of payment created a material issue, and that the trial court has failed to make any finding of fact thereon. This contention is unsound. The allegation of payment is not a material allegation in the pleading. Payment or nonpayment was a mere matter of evidence. Under the general denial, defendants were entitled to prove payment of the assessment, and, such being the fact, the allegation was not material or necessary. Plaintiff introduced his deed, and thereby established the fact, prima facie, that the assessment was not paid. It was a material part of his case to show nonpayment, and he showed it by an introduction of the deed. When the court made a finding of fact that plaintiff was the owner of the land, it necessarily followed that the deed was a valid deed; and, finding that the deed was a valid deed and carried title, it necessarily found as a fact that the assessment had not been paid prior to the sale. Ownership was the ultimate fact to be tried, and, under a general denial, defendants might prove any fact going to show that plaintiff had no right of entry at the commencement of the action. The allegation of the answer that defendant had paid the assessment, and all other kindred allegations contained in the answer, only amounted to a denial of plaintiff's title. For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ALDEN. (Cr. 111.)[1]

FORGERY — MISSPELLING OF NAME — EVIDENCE — JUDGMENT OF ANOTHER COURT.

1. The fraudulent and felonious indorsement of the name of the payee of a certificate of deposit thereon by another is forgery, although the name is misspelled.

2. The fact that a judgment roll may have been removed from the office of the clerk of the court where entered in violation of law does not affect its admissibility as evidence in another court.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William R. Daingerfield, Judge.

J. W. Alden was convicted of forgery, and appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. Hayford, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The defendant was convicted of forgery, and appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The evidence warranted the jury in finding these facts: That appellant unlawfully got possession of a certain certificate of deposit for $140, made by the California Savings & Loan Society, and payable to the order of "Chas. R. Woodward" on the return of the certificate properly indorsed; that he falsely and feloniously, and for the purpose of fraudulently procuring the money mentioned in said certificate, forged on the back thereof the name "Chas. R. Woowared"; that he then gave the certificate, thus in appearance properly indorsed, to an acquaintance named Perrine, who was in the employment of Armes & Dallam, a business firm in San Francisco, and asked him to get it cashed, as he (appellant) did not want to lose time; that he told Perrine that the money was his, but had been paid to Woodward for him, and Woodward had deposited it, and taken a certificate in his (Woodward's) own name, and had indorsed it; that Perrine turned it over, and saw that it was indorsed, but did not notice the difference in spelling between the name indorsed and the one in the body of the instrument; that Perrine took the certificate to the bookkeeper of Armes & Dallam, and asked him to cash it; that the bookkeeper referred the matter to Mr. Armes, one of the firm, who, seeing it indorsed, supposed it was all right, and indorsed it with the firm name, and gave a check for the amount, whereupon the bookkeeper paid the $140 to Perrine, who gave it to appellant, who upon the next day left the state. In a day or two, the false indorsement was discovered, and appellant was afterwards arrested in Oregon.

Appellant moved to dismiss the information; demurred to the information; objected to certain evidence; moved the court to instruct the jury to acquit; asked certain instructions, which were refused; and made a motion in arrest of judgment. In all said matters the rulings of the court were adverse to appellant, and he took exceptions to the rulings; but it is unnecessary to notice them separately, for, upon examination, they are all found to rest upon the proposition that the facts above recited do not make a case of forgery, on account of the difference in the spelling in the indorsement of the last part of the name "Chas. R. Woodward." This proposition cannot be maintained. The fraudulent purpose and the felonious intent to commit a forgery are as clearly manifested and as completely executed as they would have been if the spelling of the forged name had been entirely correct, and the doctrine of idem sonans fully applies.

[1] Rehearing denied.

The case was tried in the city and county of San Francisco; and the prosecution, for the purpose of contradicting and impeaching the appellant, who had testified as a witness, was allowed to introduce, over appellant's objection, an original judgment roll in a case which had been tried and decided in the county of Santa Clara; and counsel for appellant argues that this was error, because, as he contends, this record was illegally taken from the office of the county clerk of Santa Clara county, as no order of court allowing its removal was shown,—contrary to the provision of section 1950 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This position is not tenable. Whether or not the record was removed from Santa Clara county to San Francisco without authority may, perhaps, be a question of some consequence to the person who removed it, but is of no consequence in the case at bar. Its competency as evidence in the San Francisco court in no way depended upon the means by which it was brought there.

We see no other point necessary to be noticed. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

LOFTUS v. FISCHER. (S. F. 34.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 17, 1896.)

Jury—Right to Demand Jury Trial—Evidence—Trial—Reopening Case for Further Testimony—Review on Appeal—Conflicting Evidence—Taxation of Costs.

1. In an action to reform a written contract, and to restrain defendant meanwhile from disposing of the subject-matter of the contract, plaintiff is not entitled to a jury trial.

2. On plaintiff's cross-examination as to the value of certain mining stock, a paragraph of a complaint verified by him in another suit was admitted, because it contained an averment as to such value, and plaintiff was allowed to explain fully what he meant by the averment. On redirect examination, plaintiff's counsel offered the entire complaint, which offer was refused, though the court consented to receive any other portion of the complaint which would explain or modify the part admitted. Held no error.

3. The court need not reopen a case for the taking of further evidence, the existence and materiality of which were known to the party offering it before the case was closed.

4. Sup. Ct. Rule 11, allowing the costs of obtaining the clerk's certification to the transcript to be taxed to respondent on his refusal or failure to certify to the correctness of the transcript within five days after its presentation to him for that purpose, was merely intended to give respondent the opportunity to protect himself from the payment of such costs in case appellant is successful, and does not permit costs to be cast on him for such refusal where the appeal does not succeed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Edward C. Loftus against Jacob A. Fischer to reform a written contract. From an order denying a motion for a new trial, an appeal directly from the judgment having been decided adversely to plaintiff (106 Cal. 616, 39 Pac. 1064), plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. Motion by appellant that the costs of obtaining the clerk's certification to the transcript be taxed to respondent. Denied.

Jas. L. Crittenden, for appellant. Scrivener & Schell and Wheaton, Kalloch & Kierce, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. In the opinion of this court rendered upon the appeal from the judgment (Loftus v. Fischer, 106 Cal. 616, 39 Pac. 1064), the facts are fully set forth, and need not here be repeated.

1. It was not error for the court to refuse a continuance on account of the absence of the witnesses Behlow and O'Gorman. Defendant made the admission as to the evidence of these absent witnesses which is contemplated by section 595 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and the affidavit containing all that it was proposed to prove by them was admitted in evidence at the trial upon plaintiff's offer.

2. It was not error to refuse plaintiff a jury trial. The action was a simple proceeding in equity to reform a contract, and meanwhile to restrain defendant from disposing of certain mining stock, the subject-matter of the contract, and held by him in pledge. Société Française v. Selheimer, 57 Cal. 623; Fish v. Benson, 71 Cal. 428, 12 Pac. 454.

3. Of the numerous exceptions taken to the rulings of the court in rejecting or admitting evidence, it is sufficient to say, as to most of them, that the rulings were correct, or that the subjects of inquiry were immaterial and collateral matters. The rulings, even if technically erroneous, could not have injured appellant. The complaint contained a mass of averments redundant and superfluous to the cause of action stated. Under these unnecessary averments, a vast amount of evidence was introduced, which was entirely immaterial to the legitimate issues of the case. The court gave the widest latitude to counsel upon either side, both in their direct and cross examinations. All of the business affairs of the corporation (or partnership), whether bearing upon the transaction in dispute or not, were gone into and discussed with tiresome iteration. That a little more or less evidence was admitted or excluded cannot have worked injury when the evidence itself was upon questions collateral to matters collateral to issues immaterial. But, touching specifically upon one or two of the many rulings complained of, it was not error for the court to refuse admission in evidence to all of the complaint in the case of Behlow v. Fisher. This complaint had been verified by plaintiff. Upon cross-examination, and while being interrogated as to the value of the stock of the corporation at a certain time, a paragraph in this complaint which contained an allegation of its value was offered and admitted in evidence. Witness was allowed to, and did, explain fully what he meant by this averment, and all about the value of the stock. Upon redirect examination, plaintiff's counsel offered all of that complaint "to explain the portion admitted." The court very properly said, in ruling that the portion offered was admitted as showing the value of the stock, "If there is any portion that the other side think will show how or why that was, it is admissible." No effort was made by counsel to meet this ruling, and to specify other portions of the instrument which would explain or modify the part admitted; but appellant simply insists that the whole complaint should have been admitted. The mere statement of the facts shows the unsoundness of the claim. So, too, it was not error for the court, after the case had been closed, to refuse to open it for the taking of further evidence. No showing is made that it had but newly come to the knowledge of plaintiff; and indeed, as the offered evidence was a part of defendant's answer in another action between the same parties, it is, at least, presumable that its existence and materiality were known to plaintiff all the time.

4. Of the findings which it is claimed are erroneous, each and all are fully supported by the evidence of defendant, which in many instances is corroborated by that of other witnesses. It is true that the evidence presents a conflict upon many of the questions; but the trial court's determination of the facts, under such circumstances, will not be disturbed. The order appealed from is affirmed.

Appellant has moved that the costs of obtaining the clerk's certification to the transcript, amounting to $126, be taxed against respondent, under rule 11 of this court, for the failure and refusal of respondent's counsel to certify to the correctness of the transcript within five days after its presentation to them for that purpose. The Code provides the mode by which the appellant shall bring his appeal to this court, and, as one of the steps in the process, that the clerk shall certify to the correctness of the contents of the transcript. In this case it appears that the law values the services of the clerk so rendered in the sum of $126. The claim of appellant is that, by its rule, this court could compel, and does compel, respondent's counsel to give his money or its equivalent in service to appellant in an adversary proceeding for the taking of an appeal which it is the duty of appellant to perfect, or, for his failure, to pay the cost of the clerk's certification to the appellant, regardless of the merits or outcome of the appeal. This claim is not sound, nor has this court the power to compel the performance of such services under penalty for refusal. The costs of appeal are by law, in the first instance, to be borne by the appellant. The respondent, in case the appeal is successful, may protect himself against the payment of the costs of certification, by having previously stipulated to the correctness of the transcript. But he is not obliged, and cannot by order or rule of court be compelled, to perform this labor. If the transcript be presented, and respondent, under the rule, refuses to certify, then, in the event of appellant's success, the latter may recover the costs. In brief, the rule contemplates that, to save possible expense to the respondent, the transcript shall be presented to him. If presented, and he fails to certify, he may be cast for costs in the event of appellant's success. If not presented, appellant shall not recover the costs of the certification which respondent might have saved to himself by stipulating to the transcript's correctness, had it been presented to him. The motion to allow the costs of certification is therefore denied.

SPRECKELS v. NEVADA BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 140.)

PLEDGE OF CORPORATE STOCK.

The pledgee of corporate stock, the contract of pledge being silent on the subject, has not the right, by virtue of the pledge, before maturity of the debt, to have the stock transferred on the books into his name.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Bill by Rudolph Spreckels against the Nevada Bank of San Francisco. From an order dissolving a temporary injunction, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

E. P. Cole, for appellant. Delmas & Shortridge and F. S. Brittain, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal from an order dissolving a preliminary injunction. The complaint charged the following facts: In 1894, C. A. Spreckels purchased of Claus Spreckels stocks and bonds of the Hawaiian Commercial & Sugar Company for the sum of $700,000, payable one-half on or before January 4, 1895, the other half on or before January 4, 1896. To secure these payments, C. A. Spreckels pledged collateral securities largely exceeding in value the amount of the debt. As additional security for this debt of C. A. Spreckels, plaintiff, Rudolph Spreckels, pledged 5,000 shares of the Paauhau Plantation Company of the value of $500,000. This stock was pledged under an agreement with Claus Spreckels that it should not be transferred out of the owner's name upon the books of the corporation until after maturity of the debt. In December, 1894, Claus Spreckels transferred and assigned the debt and its securities to the defendant bank, which took with notice of all conditions. The first moiety of the debt was paid when it became due, and defendant, under agreement, thereupon delivered to their respective owners one-half of the securities pledged as collateral. The half retained and still held by defendant is of more than twice the value of the unpaid debt. Defendant, before maturity of the principal debt, threatens to send, and, unless restrained, will send, the certificates of 2,500 shares of plaintiff's stock out of the jurisdiction of the court, and to a foreign country, the republic of Hawaii, and will surrender the same to and cause them to be transferred upon the books of the Paauhau Plantation Company out of plaintiff's name and into the name of defendant, or some of its agents. This will be done that said stock at the next election of officers of the Paauhau Company may be voted against the will and interest of plaintiff. These threatened acts, if consummated, will impair plaintiff's credit, will deprive plaintiff of control and the courts of this country of jurisdiction of the stock, will violate the contract of pledge by preventing plaintiff from redeeming it at will, will imperil plaintiff's interests in the corporation and impose extra burdens and large expenditures upon him by compelling him to go to a foreign jurisdiction to enforce his rights. At the hearing of the motion to dissolve the preliminary injunction there were disputes upon certain questions of fact. It was denied that in the contract of pledge there was an agreement that the stock should not be transferred until after maturity of the principal debt. It was further denied that the defendant bank took with notice of any such agreement. And it was denied that its purpose in seeking to effect the transfer, which purpose was admitted, was anything other than to avail itself of its legal rights for its protection against possible impairment of its securities, should proceedings be instituted against plaintiff, and his property be subjected to seizure or attachment at the hands of the Hawaiian government, or some private creditor, without notice of the pledge. By the order of the court dissolving the injunction these questions of fact may be taken as having been resolved against the claim of plaintiff. They need not here be further considered.

We turn to the legal problem of the case: Has a pledgee in this state, when the contract is silent on the subject, as matter of law, the right to have the pledgor's stock transferred upon the books of the corporation into his own name before maturity of the debt? If not, then it is not to be denied but that plaintiff's complaint shows cause for an injunction pendente lite, and the order dissolving it was erroneous. Code Civ. Proc. § 526; Civ. Code, § 3422; Porter v. Jennings, 89 Cal. 440, 26 Pac. 965; Ayer v. Seymour (Com. Pl.) 5 N. Y. Supp. 651; McHenry v. Jewett, 90 N. Y. 61; State v. Smith, 15 Or. 98, 14 Pac. 814, and 15 Pac. 137, 386. Section 324 of the Civil Code provides that shares of stock may be transferred by indorsement and delivery of the certificate, but that such transfer is not valid except between the parties thereto, "until the same is so entered upon the books of the corporation as to show the names of the parties by and to whom transferred, the number or designation of the shares, and the date of the transfer." It has been determined by the decisions of this court interpreting these provisions that, even without entry upon the books of the corporation, such a transfer is valid as against all but innocent purchasers and transferees in good faith, for value, and without notice. Actual notice to such an intending purchaser by one having a prior claim upon the stock, even though his claim be not noted in the books of the corporation, is sufficient. Weston v. River Co., 6 Cal. 425; People v. Elmore, 35 Cal. 653; Winter v. Mining Co., 53 Cal. 428; Bank v. Wilson, 58 Cal. 600; Barstow v. Mining Co., 64 Cal. 388, 1 Pac. 349; Blakeman v. Iron Co., 72 Cal. 321, 13 Pac. 872. From these authorities, which declare the unquestioned rule in this state, appellant argues that a pledgee of stock would be fully protected by his power to give notice to an intending purchaser of his prior claim thereon. But this view of a pledgee's rights, we think, is altogether too strained and narrow. He should not be obliged to be on the constant watch to prevent dealings with the stock which has been hypothecated to him, at the peril of losing his security if he fails to give actual notice of his prior right to a subsequent intending purchaser or transferee. Section 324 of the Civil Code, it will be observed, is general in its terms, and applies not merely to sales of stock, but to all transfers thereof, and thus includes transfers by way of pledge as fully as transfers by which the absolute title is parted with. We entertain no doubt, therefore, that under this section a pledgee of stock has the right, and, indeed, as an ordinary business precaution it may well be his duty, to cause a proper entry of the transaction between himself and his pledgor to be entered upon the books of the corporation for his protection, as the section contemplates. The only question is whether the mode which plaintiff and appellant here pleads is about to be taken by defendant to effectuate this end is a proper one. In the case of a sale of stock the purchaser's right to have the stock transferred from the name of the seller into his own, and to surrender, if he desires, the old certificate, and have a new one issued to him in his own name, is unquestioned and unquestionable. But in the case of a pledgee, unless this particular form of procedure be necessary for his protection, it will not be adjudged to be within his rights, for the effect of it might be to imperil, upon the other hand, valuable rights and privileges of the pledgor. Thus, as here, it would give rise to questions involving the right to vote the stock at corporate elections, questions as to who should receive and retain dividends, questions of the removal of the stock to foreign jurisdictions, and the like. All that section 324 of the Civil Code exacts of a pledgee for the protection of his interests is that he should cause the transaction and the nature of it to be so entered upon the books of the corporation as to show the names of the pledgor and the pledgee, the number or designation of the shares, and the date of the transfer. All this may be done to the full protection of the pledgee's rights without the surrender of the certificates, their cancellation, and the issuance to him of new ones, and, when done, the pledgee would be fully protected against a subsequent purchaser, who would be charged with the constructive notice which the entries upon the books of the corporation import; and, upon the other hand, there would be preserved to the pledgor all the rights incident to his ownership under the pledge. Moore v. Opera-House Co., 81 Iowa, 45, 46 N. W. 750; Haegele v. Manufacturing Co., 29 Mo. App. 487. It is not the law of this state, nor is it the law generally, that a transfer upon the books of the corporation is essential to the creation of a valid pledge. Civ. Code, § 324; Graves v. Mining Co., 81 Cal. 303, 325, 22 Pac. 665; National Bank v. Watsontown Bank, 105 U. S. 217; Cook, Stock & S. § 465. The order dissolving the preliminary injunction is reversed.

PEOPLE v. TURNER. (Cr. 164.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 16, 1896.)

FORGERY — WHAT CONSTITUTES — CERTIFICATE OF RECORD—FRAUDULENT INTENT—INDICTMENT IN SEVERAL COUNTS—GENERAL VERDICT.

1. The false and fraudulent indorsement of a certificate of record on a deed, purporting to be made and signed by the recorder in his own handwriting, is forgery, under Pen. Code, § 470, providing that one who counterfeits or forges the seal or handwriting of another is guilty of forgery.

2. An indictment charging that defendant did willfully, knowingly, falsely, and fraudulently make and forge on a deed a certificate, in the handwriting of the recorder, purporting to recite the record of the deed and to be signed by the recorder, but which failed to allege that it was done with intent to defraud, was fatally defective.

3. On the trial of an indictment in two counts, the first charging the defendant with making a forged instrument, and the second with uttering the same, where it appeared that the first count was fatally defective, it was error to overrule a motion in arrest of a judgment entered upon a general verdict of guilty.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallner, Judge.

J. F. Turner was convicted of forgery, and appeals. Reversed.

Knight & Heggerty and George D. Collins, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

HENSHAW, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of forgery, and from the judgment, and from the order denying him a new trial, prosecutes these appeals. The information, it is admitted, contained two counts. By the first it is charged that the defendant, having in his possession a deed of a piece of realty made and executed by one Lizzie O'Donnell to J. P. Frenna, did "willfully, unlawfully, knowingly, feloniously, falsely, and fraudulently make and forge on the back of said deed a certificate in the handwriting of T. A. Bell, recorder of Fresno county, of the recordation of said deed in the county records of said county of Fresno, which said false, fraudulent, and forged certificate purported to recite that the aforesaid deed had been, to wit, on the 22d day of September, A. D. 1892, filed in the office of the county recorder of said county of Fresno for record, and had been recorded in the county records of said county, at a time, in a book, and at a certain page, specified in said false, fraudulent, and forged certificate and handwriting, and which said false, fraudulent, and forged certificate purported to be signed by said T. A. Bell, recorder of said county of Fresno." By the second count it is charged that the defendant, "well knowing said pretended certificate to be false, fraudulent, and forged, did then and there, to wit, on the 4th day of October, 1892, at the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, willfully, unlawfully, knowingly, falsely, fraudulently, feloniously, and with intent to defraud J. P. Frenna, of the city and county of San Francisco, utter, publish, and pass the same to said Frenna as genuine and true." The information is framed under section 470 of the Penal Code. It is contended that the act complained of is not embraced therein, nor known to our law as a forgery. We think, however, that section 470 is broad enough to cover the offense here charged. By the terms of that section, one who "counterfeits or forges the seal or handwriting of another" is guilty of forgery. Fraud and deceit are essential elements to the crime, and, unless the counterfeited handwriting be of such a nature as that some one might possibly be defrauded by it, the mere fact that it is a false writing is not sufficient to constitute an offense. But, on the other hand, if the counterfeit writing might possibly deceive another, and was prepared with intent to deceive and defraud another, then it becomes immaterial whether any person was actually injured or not. 1 Whart. Cr. Law, § 743; 2 Russ. Crimes (9th Ed.) *p. 774. It may be readily seen that one might be exposed to fraud and injury by a forged certificate such as this. He might rest under the assurance which the certificate carried with it,—that his deed was in fact of record,—and be subjected to injury, or perhaps to loss of the property at the hands of the forgers, who might thereafter sell or mortgage to an innocent third person, whose deed was placed on record.

Upon the trial of the cause, evidence was introduced under both counts, the jury was instructed upon the law governing both the making and the uttering of a forged instrument, and a general verdict of guilty as charged was returned. It is here contended, as it was in the trial court, both upon demurrer and upon a motion in arrest of judgment, that the first count is radically defective. The intent to defraud is not only an essential element of the crime of forgery, but it is an essential averment to every indictment for forgery. The first count is radically defective. It is therein merely declared that the defendant did fraudulently make and forge the certificate. It does not allege that the acts were done with intent to defraud anyone. In People v. Mitchell, 92 Cal. 590, 28 Pac. 597, a count containing the identical defect was held by this court in bank to be fatally imperfect. As evidence was introduced under both counts, as the jury was instructed upon both counts, and as their verdict was general, it is impossible to say whether that verdict was based upon one or the other, or upon both, of them. The judgment must therefore be reversed. People v. Mitchell, 92 Cal. 590, 28 Pac. 597; People v. Smith, 103 Cal. 563, 37 Pac. 516. In this case the attorney general has admitted, as the appellant has contended, that the information contains two counts. So treating it, the first count is defective for the reasons above given, while a new trial could not be had upon the second count by reason of the absence of necessary averments of facts. The judgment and order are therefore reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to sustain the motion in arrest of judgment.

SMITH v. SMITH. (S. F. 193.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. June 11, 1896.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE — SEPARATION AND MAINTENANCE—DECREE FOR ALIMONY—DISCRETION OF COURT—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 137, authorizing the court, in a suit by a wife against her husband for permanent maintenance, to require defendant to pay as alimony any money necessary for the prosecution of the suit and for maintenance, and to make and alter, in its discretion, such orders as it may deem necessary to enforce its final judgment, the granting or refusing of orders modifying the original decree in regard to the amount to be paid for plaintiff's support cannot be reviewed, in the absence of any evidence that the court abused its discretion.

2. In a suit by a wife against her husband for permanent maintenance, an order modifying the original decree in reference to the amount to be paid by defendant cannot be attacked for matters occurring before it was made, on a mere affidavit which shows no circumstance of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Josephine Smith against Charles H. Smith for permanent maintenance. From an order denying plaintiff's motion to have defendant pay certain sums alleged to be in arrears, and to increase the amount to be paid for maintenance, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Gear & Gear, for appellant. Foshay Walker, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Plaintiff is the wife of defendant. She began this action July 5, 1893, to enforce from him permanent maintenance of herself and their minor child, a boy then near 14 years of age; alleging in her complaint that defendant willfully deserted her on May 18, 1892; that he receives a salary of $300 per month; and that he usually paid her $150 per month for the support of herself and said child until May 31, 1893, when he refused to make further payments. Defendant by his answer, admitted his salary to be $275 per month. He charged plaintiff with certain misconduct, but at the trial admitted, "for the purpose of this case only," the desertion alleged by her. The court made an order for plaintiff's alimony pending the suit, and by its decree, rendered after trial, January 3, 1894, required defendant to pay to her each month, until otherwise ordered, $100 "for her individual support and maintenance, and forty dollars for the support and maintenance of" said minor, who had elected to remain in his mother's custody. On March 7, 1894, both parties being before the court, an order was made reciting that plaintiff has become unable to control said minor, and is unwilling to have the further charge of him, and directing that he be placed at a certain school, there to remain under the control of the court, with permission to visit and be visited by both parents at reasonable intervals; reciting also as a fact that the sum of $80 per month will be all that is necessary or proper for the support of plaintiff individually when relieved of the care of said child, and reducing the provision for plaintiff's personal maintenance to $80 per month, and increasing that for the child to $720 per year, which latter sum defendant was required to pay for his support at said school. April 19, 1895, plaintiff moved the court for an order commanding defendant to pay sums amounting to $121.50, which she claimed to be in arrears upon the decree; also the further sum of $500 to discharge certain obligations of her contracting; and to restore her monthly stipend of $100, as it existed before the modifying order of March, 1894. This motion was supported by her affidavit, which stated, among other matters, that between May 31, 1893, and August 15, 1893, her husband paid nothing for her maintenance, and, in consequence, she incurred debts during that time which remain unpaid; that she has paid out $81.65 in order to keep in force a policy of insurance on defendant's life in her favor; that from May 31, 1893, to January 15, 1894, she was at the sole charge of maintaining the said minor; that said minor has visited her several times at her expense; and that in justice she ought to have the sum of $100 per month for her personal maintenance. Her motion was denied. Hence this appeal.

[1] Rehearing denied.

It must be presumed that the court took into view the pecuniary condition and requirements of the parties, as well as their relative claims to its equitable consideration, when it made the decree of January 3, 1894, providing for the support of plaintiff and the minor child; and the like presumption must be made in favor of the modifying order of March, 1894. If the court abused its discretion on either of those occasions, the plaintiff might easily have brought the evidence disclosing such abuse to this court for review. That the court had jurisdiction to enter the order of March, 1894, changing the dispositions of the original decree, we have no doubt (Civ. Code, § 137[1]); the remedy being "enforced after analogies drawn from the divorce jurisdiction" (1 Bish. Mar., Div. & Sep. 1421); and the modified decree is not to be assailed now, for matters occurring before its rendition, on a mere affidavit which shows no circumstance of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect. If defendant was in arrears of payments directed by the court, the proper course was to proceed against him for contempt in failing to obey the decree; no further order to pay was needed. Treating the affidavit as a petition for a new modification of the original decree, it was a matter addressed to the discretion of the court, and the record discloses nothing to convince us that in denying the motion the court exercised its discretion arbitrarily or indiscreetly. The order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order is affirmed.

[1] Civ. Code, § 137, provides that during the pendency of an action by a wife against a husband who has deserted her, for permanent support, the court may, in its discretion, require the husband to pay, as alimony, any money necessary for the prosecution of the action and for maintenance; that the final judgment may be enforced by such orders as the court, in its discretion, may from time to time deem necessary, and that such orders may be varied, altered, or revoked.

KENDALL v. PORTER, City Treasurer.

(Sac. 57.)[1]

CITY BONDS—INTEREST AFTER MATURITY.

Act April 24, 1858 (St. 1858, p. 267, § 37), authorizes a city to issue bonds, not to exceed a certain amount, "bearing interest from * * * and payable at the office of the treasurer * * * on the first day of January of each year, * * * coupons for the interest shall be attached to each bond." Section 38 provides that "the annual interest and principal of all bonds * * * shall be paid from the interest and sinking fund provided by section 35." Section 40 declares that "it shall be the duty of the treasurer to pay the interest on said bonds, when the same falls due, out of the interest funds, as provided in this act." Section 35 creates the interest and sinking fund (a certain per cent. of the revenues of the city's waterworks), and declares that the fund "shall be applied to the payment of the annual interest, and the final redemption of bonds." Held, that it authorized interest on the bonds after maturity, and made it the duty of the treasurer to pay the same. McFarland and Van Fleet, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; Matt F. Johnson, Judge.

Mandamus by W. S. Kendall against James M. Porter, treasurer of the city of Sacramento. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

F. S. Sprague, for appellant. Robert T. Devlin and Holl & Dunn, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent, as treasurer of the city of Sacramento, to pay to plaintiff the principal of certain overdue bonds of the city of Sacramento, with interest thereon from the date of their maturity. A demurrer to the petition was sustained by the trial court, and judgment thereupon entered against plaintiff, from which judgment he prosecutes this appeal. The question thus presented is whether the bonds of the city of Sacramento, issued under the provisions of the act of April 24, 1858 (St. 1858, p. 267), bear interest after their maturity. Various questions touching the construction of the act of 1858, under which these bonds were issued, and the rights of the bondholders thereunder, have been decided by this and other courts. Meyer v. Brown, 65 Cal. 583, 26 Pac. 281; Davis v. Porter, 66 Cal. 658, 6 Pac. 746; Bates v. Porter, 74 Cal. 224, 15 Pac. 732; Bates v. Gerber, 82 Cal. 550, 22 Pac. 1115; Davis v. City of Sacramento, 82 Cal. 562, 22 Pac. 1118; Kennedy v. City of Sacramento, 10 Sawy. 29, 19 Fed. 580. By these cases it is held that the act constitutes a contract between the city and the bondholders, and that the bondholders' rights, upon the one hand, and the duties of the city and its officers, upon the other, are measured by the terms of the statute. Thus in Davis v. Porter, 66 Cal. 658, 6 Pac. 746, the court decided that the treasurer of the city was not authorized to pay interest on coupons after they had matured and remained unpaid, holding that the overdue coupons did not bear interest, because the act nowhere in its terms provided for the payment of interest upon interest. Bates v. Gerber, 82 Cal. 550, 22 Pac. 1115, affirmed the case of Davis v. Porter, and the court said: "The statute under and by virtue of which the bonds were issued was the basis of, and became part of, the contract; and the bondholders must be held to have taken the bonds with the understanding and agreement that they were only entitled to the principal and the annual interest, and that, if the fund provided for the payment thereof should be insufficient to meet the same, that no interest on the coupons was provided for, or could be recovered."

The statute being thus the measure of the bondholders' rights, it becomes important to consider its provisions in relation to the interest upon the bonds; for the bondholders will be entitled to just such interest, and no other, as by a fair intendment the statute provides that they shall have. Section 37 of the act authorizes the city of Sacramento to issue bonds, not exceeding the sum of $1,600,000, "bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum from the first day of January, 1859, and payable at the office of the treasurer. * * * The interest on said bonds shall be made payable at the office of the treasurer, on the first day of January of each year. * * * Coupons for the interest shall be attached to each bond so that they may be removed without injury to the bond. Said coupons consecutively numbered shall be signed by the treasurer." Section 38 provides: "The annual interest and principal of all bonds issued for claims against said city shall be paid from the interest and sinking fund provided by section thirty-five, and in the manner otherwise provided in this act." Section 40 provides: "It shall be the duty of the treasurer to pay the interest on said bonds, when the same falls due, out of the interest funds, as provided in this act." Section 35 of the act creates the interest and sinking fund, and declares that the fund "shall be applied to the payment of the annual interest, and the final redemption of bonds issued for city indebtedness." It is by this language specifically declared that the bonds shall bear interest, that the interest shall be payable annually from the date of their issuance, and that the interest shall be made a charge upon, and payable out of, a fund created by and designated in the act. There is no suggestion or intimation that the interest is to cease upon the maturity of the bond. It is a rule so general and well established that it is not even controverted by respondents in this case, that interest-bearing coupon bonds continue to bear interest after their maturity. People v. Getzendaner, 137 Ill. 234, 34 N. E. 297; Pruyn v. City of Milwaukee, 18 Wis. 367; Cromwell v. County of Sac, 96 U. S. 51; Beckwith v. Railroad, 29 Conn. 268; St. 1850, p. 92; Civ. Code, §§ 1917, 1918; Kohler v. Smith, 2 Cal. 597; Nash v. El Dorado Co., 24 Fed. 252. To take these bonds out of the operation of this rule, there must be pointed out some language in the statute evincive of an intent so to do; some declaration which will justify the court in saying that it was designed that the interest should cease upon the maturity of the bonds. That this intent can be deduced from the fact that the coupons attached to the bonds extended only to maturity is a proposition met and disposed of by People v. Getzendaner and Pruyn v. City of Milwaukee, supra. The attached coupons never extend beyond the maturity of the bond. The presumption is always that a contract will be performed, not violated. It is presumed, therefore, that the bonds will be met and paid at maturity. When we come to scan the language of the act above quoted, we find that the bonds are to bear annual interest from the date of their issuance, without any limitation upon the length of time that annual interest is to run. We find that the interest is payable at the office of the treasurer on the 1st day of January of each year. We find also that a fund is created which is to be devoted to the payment of the annual interest, and to the final redemption of the bonds, and, finally, that it is made the duty of the treasurer to pay the interest on the bonds, when it falls due, out of the interest funds provided in the act. These terms not only show no intention to terminate the interest upon the maturity of the bonds,—which intention must be expressed, if this contract is to be made an exception to the general rule,—but, to the contrary, they indicate with some clearness the intent that the bonds shall bear annual interest from the date of their issuance until the time they are actually paid. Nor can there be discerned in this any hardship upon the city. It is but the application of the general statutory rule allowing interest for the detention of moneys due.

In Beals v. Board of Sup'rs, 28 Cal. 449, which is relied upon by respondent, the question under consideration by the court involved, and was determined upon, an entirely different principle from that which governs this consideration; and this was pointed out by the learned author of that opinion in Nash v. El Dorado Co., 24 Fed. 252. In Beals v. Board of Sup'rs, an equitable demand growing out of the division of a county had been recognized by the legislature, which had imposed upon the new county an obligation to pay a specific sum. The obligation extended no further than the law expressly required, and the general principle here is as declared in the case of Wightman v. U. S., 23 Ct. Cl. 144, that from a legal obligation created solely by statute no obligation to pay interest will ordinarily arise. In the case at bar, however, the obligation to pay interest is itself a part of the contract. The declaration in Soher v. Supervisors, 39 Cal. 134, that interest was not provided for after the maturity of the bonds, is explicitly made to rest upon the authority of Beals v. Board of Sup'rs, supra; but as has been said, and as was pointed out by the learned author of the opinion in Beals v. Board of Sup'rs, the case is not authority for such a doctrine.

The question whether or not there was money in the treasury to pay the bonds at the time they became due, and that thus the holder of a matured bond, who had failed to present it at maturity, could not recover interest, does not here arise. If such be the facts, they might constitute a defense to the present action, but they cannot be considered upon demurrer. The treasurer is specially charged with the duty of paying the interest. If he can make a valid and sufficient showing why that interest should not be paid, he may make it in his return; but under the facts here pleaded, as it is made the explicit duty of the treasurer to pay the interest upon these bonds as it becomes due, mandamus may be employed to compel him to perform that duty. It follows, therefore, that the demurrer was improperly sustained. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to overrule the demurrer to the petition, with leave to the treasurer to make his answer or return thereto.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; TEMPLE, J.; HARRISON, J.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent, and am of the opinion that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed. The rights which the appellant has against the city are not those of a general creditor. He could not recover a judgment against the city, upon his bonds, for a single dollar; for the bonds were issued, and accepted by the bondholders, under a statute which provides that the city "shall not be sued in any action whatever." The complaint does not show the form of the bonds, but, assuming that they are, on their face, similar to ordinary bonds issued by corporations, they do not in themselves constitute complete and independent contracts. They are only parts of the contract which was made between the bondholders and the city by the passage of the act of April 24, 1858, and the issuance and acceptance of the bonds according to the provisions of that act,—a contract, as was said in Meyer v. Brown, 65 Cal. 589, 26 Pac. 281, "as solemn and binding * * * as it would have been if made between private persons." By that contract they waived all rights as general creditors under their old floating demands against the city, which were of uncertain value, and agreed to rely upon a special trust fund, to consist of 55 per cent. of the revenue derived by the city from certain enumerated sources, which substantially included all sources of revenue, and waived all right to sue the city. The contract was undoubtedly a good one for the bondholders, and this court has construed it very liberally in their favor. For instance, it was held in Bates v. Porter, 74 Cal. 224, 15 Pac. 732, by a majority of the court, that 55 per cent. of the "revenue derived" from "water rents" meant 55 per cent. of the gross receipts of the city's waterworks. But their legal remedies are confined to proceedings to compel the officers of the city to perform the duties enjoined upon them by the said act of 1858, and other supplementary acts, not important here. The question, then, is not whether, under general law, coupon bonds bear interest after the exhaustion of the coupons, for which judgment may be recovered, but whether, under the said statutes, the payment of interest on the bonds, other than that evidenced by the coupons, is "an act which the law specially enjoins" upon the city treasurer "as a duty resulting from" his office, and which he may be compelled to perform by mandamus. Section 40 provides that the treasurer shall pay "the interest" on said bonds "as provided in this act"; and section 37, in which authority for the issuance of the bonds is given, provides that "the interest" shall be payable annually at the office of the treasurer, but the latter section also provides that "coupons for the interest shall be attached to each bond"; and the whole tenor of the act seems to me to be clearly to the effect that it is not the duty of the treasurer, nor has he the power, to pay any interest other than that represented by the coupons. I think that the correct construction of the act is expressed in the opinion of Fox, J., in Bates v. Gerber, 82 Cal. 553, 22 Pac. 1115, as follows: "It did not provide for either principal or interest bearing interest after maturity, and provided no fund to meet such added liability." The treasurer is nowhere required, in the event of the bonds not being satisfied at maturity, to pay interest by way of damages. This is the view that must have been entertained in Davis v. Porter, 66 Cal. 658, 6 Pac. 746, where it was held that it was not the duty of the treasurer to pay interest on overdue coupons; and it is conceded that, under the general authorities, interest on matured and unpaid coupons stands in the same category with interest on the principal of a coupon bond after the exhaustion of the coupons. Moreover, in that case the view of the court must have been the same as that hereinabove stated, for in the opinion of the court it is expressly said, "The court cannot, therefore, issue any command to the defendant to pay, beyond the annual interest evidenced by the coupons involved in this proceeding," and cites Soher v. Supervisors, 39 Cal. 134, and Beals v. Board of Sup'rs, 28 Cal. 449; and those cases are, I think, clearly in accordance with the views above expressed. In the Beals Case, interest was claimed upon an overdue debt of the county of Amador, but the amount was to be paid out of a special fund, as provided by an act of the legislature; and the court say, "Nothing is said about the addition of other amounts resulting as damages for default in payment," and the claim for interest was denied. And so, in the case at bar, there is no provision for the payment, out of the special fund, of anything other than the coupons and the principal of the bonds. While the bondholders, if they could sue the city, might recover judgments for interest accruing after the maturity of the bonds, there is no provision in the act for the payment of such interest by the city treasurer out of the special trust fund. When the bondholders entered into the contract, they anticipated, no doubt, as they well might, that the enormous trust fund created by the act, into which more than one-half of all of the revenues of the city went, would be amply sufficient to pay the coupons as they should fall due, and the principal of the bonds when they should mature; and therefore no provision was made for the payment, out of the trust fund, of interest, as "damages in default of payment," in the event that the fund would not be sufficient to satisfy the principal at maturity. I think that in the case at bar the majority opinion treats this proceeding as an action against the city, by a general creditor, to recover a judgment for interest on overdue bonds; but, in that view, appellant could not recover either the principal or interest of his bonds, for both would be barred by the statute of limitations.

KENNEDY & SHAW LUMBER CO. et al. v. PRIET et al. (S. F. 23.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 18, 1896.)

MECHANIC'S LIEN — FORECLOSURE — JUDGMENT — APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. In an action by several material men to foreclose their respective liens, the court rendered a money judgment for all the plaintiffs, but adjudged that the liens of A. and B., two of the material men, were invalid, and decreed that, as the aggregate amount of the liens of the other parties was less than the sum due the contractor, the surplus should be paid to A. and B. in proportion to the amounts of their judgments. Held, that the judgment was erroneous so far as it authorized the payment of said surplus to A. and B.

2. An error in favor of appellants affords them no ground of complaint.

3. In an action by several material men to enforce liens, one plaintiff cannot attack that portion of the judgment upholding the validity of his co-plaintiffs' liens.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Consolidated actions by the Kennedy & Shaw Lumber Company, the Charles M. Depew Planing-Mill Company, and others, against Pierre Priet and others, to foreclose mechanics' liens. From a judgment foreclosing the liens of all the plaintiffs except those above named, but giving the latter a money judgment against the contractor, and from an order denying their motions for a new trial, said plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. H. Jordan, for appellants. D. H. Whittemore, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is a consolidation of several actions brought by different plaintiffs to foreclose their respective liens as material men against a building and premises owned by the defendant Pierre Priet and wife. Judgment was rendered enforcing the liens of all the plaintiffs except the Kennedy & Shaw Lumber Company and the Charles M. Depew Planing-Mill Company. The court found that said two last-named plaintiffs had no valid liens, and entered judgment in their favor against the contractor merely for the amount due to them from the latter, and refused to enforce their liens. There was also another provision in the judgment, to be noted hereafter. The said two last-named plaintiffs, the Kennedy & Shaw Lumber Company and the Charles M. Depew Planing-Mill Company, appeal from the whole of the judgment, and from an order denying their motions for a new trial.

The defendant Pierre Priet made a contract with one Fletcher, by which the latter was to erect a building upon certain land of Priet for the sum of $18,997, but said contract was never recorded. The court found, however, that Fletcher erected the building and did $1,100 worth of extra work, and that $20,097 was the amount of the reasonable value of the work done by Fletcher. It found also that Priet had paid Fletcher for the work $14,212, leaving a balance of $5,885. It also found that the said two appellants had furnished materials to Fletcher for which he was owing the Kennedy & Shaw Lumber Company $3,841.39, and the Depew Company $1,129.97, for which two sums judgment was entered against Fletcher in favor of the said two appellants respectively; but it was found that neither of said two appellants had any valid lien against the property. It found, however, that the aggregate amount of the liens of all the other plaintiffs was $1,721.73 less than the amount which Priet owed Fletcher; and it was adjudged by the court that, after the payment of the liens of said other plaintiffs, the said sum of $1,721.73 should be paid by Priet to said two appellants in proportion to the amounts of their judgments against Fletcher.

Appellants do not attack the findings that they have no valid liens. Their main attacks are upon the findings that the liens of the other plaintiffs were valid; and, contending that said findings as to said other liens were erroneous, they say that the whole of the money due from Priet to Fletcher should be applied to the satisfaction of their judgments against Fletcher. But, as the appellants have themselves no liens against the building and premises, they are not concerned with the correctness or incorrectness of the findings of the court as to the liens of the other plaintiffs. We see no warrant for that part of the judgment which decrees that the $1,721.73 should be paid by Priet to these appellants. This is not a creditors' bill nor a garnishment. The appellants brought their actions to recover judgment against Fletcher for the amount which he owed them for the materials furnished, and for liens against the property of Priet; and, having no liens, they were entitled only to a money judgment against Fletcher. That part of the judgment which decrees that the $1,721.73 owing by Priet to Fletcher after the payment of the other liens should be distributed between these appellants, while erroneous, is still an advantage to the appellants, of which they cannot complain.

In the brief of respondents it is asked that the appeals be dismissed for the reason that the notice of the motion for new trial was directed only to Priet and wife, and the notice of appeal was not served upon Fletcher. The appeal from the order was heretofore dismissed, and, under the views we have taken of the case, it is not necessary to determine that question as to the judgment. The judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF HEALDSBURG v. MULLIGAN et al. (S. F. 15.)[1]

CITY TREASURER — LIABILITY FOR MONEY TAKEN BY ROBBERY.

Const. art. 11, § 16, requires all money collected for the use of any city, etc., coming into the hands of any officer thereof, to be immediately deposited with the treasurer to the credit of the city, etc., for the benefit of the fund to which it belongs. Section 17 makes it a felony for any officer having control of such money to use or make any profit out of the same. Municipal Corporation Act, § 876, makes it the duty of the treasurer to receive and safely keep money coming into his hands, and pay it out on warrants signed, etc., and not otherwise. Pen. Code, § 424, makes it embezzlement for the officer to loan such money, to use it as his own, or to fail to keep it in his possession. Held, that the common-law liability of a city treasurer is not enlarged by such statutes, or by a bond providing that, if he shall faithfully "perform all the duties of such office of treasurer as required by any law," the obligation shall be void, and such treasurer is not liable for money forcibly taken from him by robbers. Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; R. T. Crawford, Judge.

Action by the city of Healdsburg against George V. Mulligan and others on the official bond of defendant Mulligan as treasurer of such city. Pending the action, defendant Mulligan died, and Frances Mulligan, executrix of his estate, was made defendant in his stead by supplemental complaint. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Rose & Pond, J. T. Campbell, and J. A. Barham, for appellants. W. W. Moreland, E. M. Norton, and Ruthledge & Pressley, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This is an action brought upon the official bond of George V. Mulligan, as treasurer of the city of Healdsburg, and his sureties, to recover the sum of $3,541.49, with interest thereon, which moneys, it is alleged, were received by said treasurer on or about October 20, 1893, and which, in breach of his said trust, said Mulligan converted to his own use, and refused to account to the plaintiff therefor, or to pay out said sum on the warrant of the president of the board of trustees, countersigned by the clerk thereof. The answer consists of two defenses. The first puts in issue the alleged breach of trust, conversion, and refusal to pay out said moneys; and the second defense alleged, at great length and particularity, that the city of Healdsburg owned a city hall, in which was an office for the treasurer, and a vault in which he kept, and was required to keep, the funds of the city, and that on October 20, 1893, he had in said vault the said sum of $3,541.49, and that at about 4 a. m. of that day he was seized by robbers, carried to the vault, and compelled, by irresistible force and violence, and against his will, to open the vault, and that the said money was taken by the robbers by such irresistible force and violence. Upon motion of the plaintiff said second defense was stricken out, and the defendants excepted. Afterwards George V. Mulligan died, and Frances Mulligan was appointed and qualified as his executrix, and plaintiff afterwards filed a supplemental complaint, making the original complaint a part thereof by reference, and alleging the death of George V. Mulligan, the appointment of the executrix, and that plaintiff's claim had been presented to and rejected by her. Answers, in substance the same as those originally filed, were filed to the supplemental complaint, and plaintiff demurred to said second defense, and the demurrer was sustained. The cause was tried by the court without a jury. Findings and judgment went for the plaintiff, and defendants appeal from said judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The findings were general, viz. that all the allegations of the complaint were true, and those of the answer untrue; and it was therefore found that "the said defendant George V. Mulligan, on or about said 20th day of October, 1893, in breach of his said trust, converted to his own use the said sum of $3,541.49, and refused to account to the plaintiff therefor, or for any part thereof, and refused to pay out any part thereof on the warrant signed," etc.

The principal question presented by the record is whether the forcible taking of the moneys in question from the custody of the treasurer by robbers is a defense to an action upon his bond. "A public officer having property in his custody in his official capacity is a bailee, and the rules which grow out of that relation are held to govern the case; but the legislature can undoubtedly at its pleasure change the common-law rule of responsibility." U. S. v. Thomas, 15 Wall. 337, 344. The receipt of money by a public officer, such as Mulligan in this case, does not create the relation of debtor and creditor. The money received by him is not his, and he can only become a debtor when he becomes a defaulter; and whether he became a defaulter is the question raised by the second defense in the answer, to which a demurrer was sustained. That, at common law, a bailee for hire would not be responsible for moneys stolen from him, or taken from him by robbery, without his fault or neglect, is a proposition so well settled that authorities need not be cited. In the case before us, however, it may be that the responsibility of the treasurer has been enlarged, either by the statutes relating to such officers, or by the terms of his contract embodied in his official bond; and we must therefore look to the statute and the bond for the purpose of determining whether Mulligan's common-law liability has been enlarged. The condition of Mulligan's bond was in the following language: "Now, therefore, the condition of this obligation is such that if the said George V. Mulligan shall well and faithfully perform all official duties now required of him by law, and shall well and faithfully execute and perform all the duties of such office of treasurer required by any law to be enacted subsequently to the execution of this bond, then this obligation is to be void and of no effect; otherwise, to remain in full force and effect." The constitution (article 11, § 16) requires that "all moneys collected for the use of any county, city, town or other public municipal corporation coming into the hands of any officer thereof shall immediately be deposited with the treasurer or other legal depositary to the credit of such city, town or other corporation, respectively, for the benefit of the fund to which they respectively belong." Section 17 of the same article provides: "The making of profit out of county, city, town or other public moneys, or using the same for any purpose not authorized by law by any officer having the possession or control thereof, shall be a felony, and shall be prosecuted and punished as prescribed by law." Section 876 of the municipal corporation act, so far as material, is as follows: "It shall be the duty of the treasurer to receive and safely keep all moneys which shall come into his hands as treasurer. * * * He shall pay out said money on warrants signed by the president and countersigned by the clerk, and not otherwise; * * * and for his compensation he shall be allowed one per cent. on all moneys received and paid out by him as such treasurer. * * *" By section 853 of the same act it is provided, among other things, that "all the provisions of any law of this state relating to the official bonds of officers shall apply to such bonds, except as herein otherwise provided."

If anything were required to show that Mulligan, as treasurer of the city, was a bailee of all the moneys received by him as such treasurer, and that the receipt of the money did not make him a debtor, the above provisions of the constitution and statutes would conclusively show it. It may be added, however, by section 424 of the Penal Code, the loaning of such money by the officer, or the appropriation thereof to his own use, or failing to keep the same in his possession, or changing or converting any portion thereof from coin into currency, or from currency into coin or other currency, without authority of law, makes such officer an embezzler, and subjects him to imprisonment in state's prison. If, therefore, the receipt of the money made him a debtor, the money when received became his; and, if his, he could not embezzle it. All these provisions are based upon the theory that money in the hands of the treasurer is the money of the municipality, and that the treasurer is but the custodian or bailee of the money for the municipality. It is conceded that the requirements of the municipal corporation act make it the duty of the treasurer "to safely keep all moneys which shall come to his hands as treasurer," and that "he shall pay out said money on warrants signed by the president and countersigned by the clerk, and not otherwise," and that these requirements are included in the conditions of his bond. These statutory provisions, however, do not add to the common-law liability of the treasurer. "When the treasurer-elect accepts his office he thereby takes upon himself all the duties thereof, general as well as special. His general duties, arising from the very nature of his office, are to receive the money of the county lawfully deposited with him, keep it safely, and pay it out according to law. From these general duties, accepted, springs the legal obligation that he will bring to their performance good faith and reasonable skill and diligence, to enforce which the statute already referred to requires him to take upon himself the moral obligation of an oath that he will faithfully perform the duties which he has assumed, and give a bond with sureties with a condition of like import." Cumberland Co. v. Pennell, 69 Me. 357, 365. And, in State v. Harper, 6 Ohio St. 607, 610, it was said: "By accepting the office the treasurer assumes the duty of receiving and safely keeping the public money, and of paying it out according to law." If this be true, it will be seen that the condition of the bond given by Mulligan does not enlarge his common-law liability.

Counsel for respondent, however, has cited a very large number of cases to the point that robbery is no defense to an action upon this bond. The first case cited under this head is that of U. S. v. Prescott, 3 How. 578. Following this he cited five other cases from the supreme court of the United States, which, it is claimed, support his contention. U. S. v. Prescott, supra, was a suit upon the bond of a receiver of public moneys conditioned that "he should well, truly, and faithfully keep safely, without loaning or using, all the public moneys collected by him, or otherwise at any time placed in his possession and custody, till the same had been or should be ordered by the proper department or officer of the government to be transferred or paid out, and when such orders for transfer or payment had been or should be received, had faithfully and promptly made, and would faithfully and promptly make, the same as directed." The defense was the felonious taking and carrying away of the moneys without any fault or negligence on the part of the receiver. It was held that this defense was not within the condition of the bond, that the defendant knew the extent of his obligation when he entered into it, and had realized the force of his obligation by the enjoyment of the office. The court said: "Shall he be discharged from liability contrary to his own express undertaking? There is no principle on which such a defense can be sustained. The obligation to keep safely the public money is absolute, without any condition, expressed or implied; and nothing but the payment of it, when required, can discharge the bond." In U. S. v. Thomas, 15 Wall. 337, the case of U. S. v. Prescott, supra, was virtually overruled. After quoting from the Prescott Case as above, the court said: "This broad language would seem to indicate the opinion that the bond made the receiver and his sureties liable at all events, as now contended for by the government; but that case was one in which the defense set up was that the money was stolen, and a much more limited responsibility than that indicated by the above language would have sufficed to render that defense nugatory. And, as the money in the hands of the receiver is not his, as he is only custodian of it, it would seem to be going very far to say that his engagement to have it forthcoming was so absolute as to be qualified by no condition whatever, not even a condition implied in law. Suppose an earthquake should swallow up the building and safe containing the money, is there no condition, implied in the law, by which to exonerate the receiver from responsibility?" The court there also referred to the cases of Muzzy v. Shattuck, 1 Denio, 233; Com. v. Comly, 3 Pa. St. 372; State v. Harper, 6 Ohio St. 607; and the then recent Cases of Dashiel, Keehler, and Boyden in that court,—all of which are cited by respondent. In another part of the opinion in U. S. v. Thomas it was said: "Where, however, a statute merely prescribes the duties of the officer, as that he shall safely keep money or property received or collected, and shall pay it over when called upon to do so by the proper authority, it cannot, without more, be regarded as enlarging or in any way affecting the degree of his responsibility. The mere prescription of duties has nothing to do with the question as to what shall constitute a rule of responsibility in the discharge of those duties, or a legal excuse for the nonperformance of them, or a discharge from their obligation. The common law, which is common reason, prescribes that; and statutes in subordination to their terms are to be construed agreeably to the rules of the common law." The court in the same case noticed a distinction between an official bond and an ordinary money bond, saying that "the condition of an official bond is collateral to the obligation or penalty. It is not based on a prior debt, nor is it evidence of a debt; and the duty secured thereby does not become a debt until default be made on the part of the principal. Until then, as we have seen, he is a bailee, though a bailee resting under special obligations. The condition of his bond is, not to pay a debt, but to perform a duty about and respecting certain specific property which is not his, and which he cannot use for his own purposes." In that case Justices Swain, Miller, and Strong dissented. Justice Miller, for himself, referring to the case of U. S. v. Prescott, said: "In the subsequent case of U. S. v. Morgan, 11 How. 154, the same question was decided on precisely the same grounds. The case of U. S. v. Dashiel, 4 Wall. 182, was decided with merely a reference to the doctrine of the two cases just cited. The case of U. S. v. Keehler, 9 Wall. 83, asserts the same doctrine, and applies it to an action on a postmaster's bond. He had paid the money to the agent of the Confederate States on an order made by the insurrectionary government directing him to do so. When the case of U. S. v. Dashiel came before the court I was not satisfied with the doctrine of the former cases, and I do not believe, now, that on sound principle the bond should be construed to extend the obligation of the depositary beyond what the law imposes on him, though it may contain words of express promise to pay over the money. I think the true construction of such a promise is to pay when the law would require it of the receiver if no bond had been given; the object of taking the bond being to obtain sureties for the performance of that obligation. Nor do I believe that, prior to this decision, there was any principle of public policy, recognized by the courts or imposed by the law, which made the depositary of the public money liable for it, when it had been lost or destroyed without any fault or negligence or fraud on his part, and when he had faithfully discharged his duty in regard to its custody and safe-keeping. Such were my opinions when, as a member of the court, I took part in the decision of U. S. v. Dashiel. But either no other judge shared those opinions, or, if any one did, he felt bound by the two previous decisions. I therefore acquiesced." So, in Cumberland Co. v. Pennell, 69 Me. 370, in a very learned opinion, in which the authorities are largely cited and reviewed, it is declared that U. S. v. Prescott for the first time promulgated the extreme views therein expressed. Of the cases cited by respondent the following are based upon statutes which made the officer a debtor as to all the funds received in his official capacity: Muzzy v. Shattuck, 1 Denio, 233; Inhabitants of Hancock v. Hazzard, 12 Cush. 112; Perley v. County of Muskegon, 32 Mich. 132. And these cases are cited in nearly all of the other cases cited by respondent.

It must be evident that, if the defendants in these cases were debtors as to all the funds received by them in their official capacity, they could not be bailees of their own property, nor embezzle it, nor could a larceny or robbery of their own property relieve them from their debts. Other cases, and all of them that discuss the grounds upon which the liability of the officer is placed, base their conclusions upon the contract, contained in the bond, to keep safely and pay over the funds on proper warrants therefor. In speaking of the official bond as a contract, Mr. Justice Bradley in U. S. v. Thomas, supra, drew a distinction between an ordinary contract or agreement and an official bond. The learned justice said: "So much stress has, in almost every case, been laid upon the bond as forming, either directly or indirectly, the basis of a new rule of responsibility, that it seems especially important to ascertain what are the legal obligations that spring from such instruments. The learned judges, in the great generality of the remarks made in some of the cases referred to, with regard to the liability of a receiving officer, and especially of his sureties, by virtue of his bond, have evidently overlooked what we consider to be a very important and vital distinction between an absolute agreement to do a thing, and a condition to do the same thing, inserted in a bond. In the latter case the obligor, in order to avoid the forfeiture of his obligation, is not bound at all events to perform the condition, but is excused from its performance when prevented by the law or by an overruling necessity. And this distinction, we think, affords a solution to the question involved in this case." In the state of New York, Supervisors v. Dorr, 25 Wend. 440, fully sustains the views we have taken of the liability of a public officer upon his bond. The opinion in that case was written by Chief Justice Nelson and concurred in by Justices Bronson and Cowen, in the supreme court. The case was carried to the court of errors (7 Hill, 583), where the judgment was affirmed by an equally divided court. In People v. Faulkner, 107 N. Y. 477, 14 N. E. 415, the action was upon a surrogate's bond. The general reasoning of the case clearly sustains our conclusion in this case, although a distinction was there drawn between moneys in the hands of a surrogate and moneys received by a treasurer or other public officer of that character. So that, so far as the question here is concerned, there has been no direct adjudication by the court of appeals of that state, and the question is left open. The supreme court of South Carolina, in an able opinion, sustains the view we have taken. There the treasurer deposited money in a bank of good repute, and the money was lost by its failure. The court referred to U. S. v. Prescott, and the other leading cases which lay down the strict rule of liability, and, following U. S. v. Thomas, held that the defendant was not liable. York Co. v. Watson, 15 S. C. 1. In Walker v. Association, 18 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 277, the action was upon the bond of the treasurer of a benefit building society, organized under a statute. The conditions of the bond were that he would faithfully discharge the duties of treasurer, and punctually account to the trustees for all and every sum and sums of money, bills, notes, securities, goods, and chattels, which he, in his office of treasurer, shall receive on the society's account, and being bound by the rules of the society to pay over in a given time the same moneys which he shall receive; and it was held that the treasurer did not violate such obligation if, after receiving moneys, and before he has an opportunity of paying them over, he is robbed of them by irresistible violence, and without fault of his own; such obligation being that only of a bailee. Lord Campbell, C. J., said: "This plea alleges a loss of the money by irresistible violence; and the general doctrine is not denied that, if the subject-matter bailed be lost by vis major, which we translate 'irresistible violence,' the bailee is discharged." In Cumberland Co. v. Pennell, supra, the court cited an unreported opinion of Mr. Justice Story, of the United States circuit court at the May term, 1822. In relation to that case it was said: "The doctrine that the official bond of a public depositary rendered him the insurer of the public funds in his possession is nowhere recognized by Judge Story. On the contrary, he was of the opinion that robbery is a good defense. Col. John L. Tuttle, a United States paymaster, was murdered and robbed of the public funds held in his official capacity, and an action was brought therefor against his administrator. In the trial of the action at the May term, 1822, of the United States circuit court in Boston, the defense of robbery was set up, and the jury, under the instructions of Judge Story, presiding, returned a verdict for the defense,—showing that the court must have ruled that robbery was a good defense. It seems the question was not carried any further, and hence the case was not reported."

We cannot better conclude this opinion than by another quotation from the case of Cumberland Co. v. Pennell, above cited: "Were the law otherwise in this state, and known to be such, faithfulness and honesty, even if they continued to be considered commendable personal qualities, would be held, if not mere abstractions, matters of secondary importance, at best, in candidates. Such qualifications, accompanied by the highest capability, would, in the absence of sufficient property in the principal to secure his sureties, fail to obtain them. For many a responsible person would gladly sign a bond as surety, guarantying the faithfulness, honesty, and capacity of his neighbor which were so potent in effecting his election to the responsible public station of county treasurer, who would long hesitate to insure the public against possible loss happening in spite of such qualities; for to insure against such a loss is not only vouching for the integrity of the officer, but practically for that of the rest of mankind,—that they will not rob him." We therefore conclude that the obligation resting upon Mulligan, as treasurer of the city of Healdsburg, was simply that which the common law imposes upon him as a bailee for hire; that the provisions of the statute to keep safely and pay over the money received by him in his official capacity were duties which would have rested upon him as such bailee in the absence of these provisions of the statute, and did not enlarge his responsibility or that of his sureties; and that, if he were violently robbed of the moneys of the city in his possession, it is a defense to the action. The burden of proving such defense, of course, rests upon him and his sureties. The question here, however, arises upon a demurrer to the second defense, which alleges the robbery, and therefore, as now presented, the fact of robbery is conceded.

As to the effect of the conclusion above stated, little need be said. It is urged, in many of the cases which hold the officer to an absolute responsibility for all moneys coming to his hands, that if robbery or larceny were held to be a defense, it would endanger the security of public funds, and encourage simulated robberies and pretended larcenies. But we cannot assume that courts of justice are unable to protect the public in such cases; and, even if they could not do so in all cases, justice does not require that the public shall be protected by enforcing against its servant, the officer, and his sureties, a liability the law has not imposed upon them, and which they have not assumed. No other question need be noticed. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer to the second defense set up in defendant's answer.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; BRITT, C.

Where a building contract provides that the work shall be done "to the satisfaction of the superintendent of public streets of said city and county," the 60 days within which the contractor may file a lien begin to run from the completion of the work, and not from the time a certificate is made by such superintendent that the work was done to his satisfaction.

Action by George W. Beatty against C. J. Mills to establish and enforce a mechanic's lien. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chadburne & Herrin, for appellant. Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to enforce a lien under the provisions of the Code relating to liens of mechanics and others. Judgment went for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

The premises against which the lien is sought to be enforced are situated in the city and county of San Francisco, and are the property of the estate of Warren F. Mills, deceased; and the respondent, Cecil J. Mills, is executrix—jointly with one Holland Smith, who is executor—of said estate. The lien is based on an alleged written contract for certain street work in front of said premises made by Mrs. Mills alone, and without the concurrence of her co-executor, with Hogan & Burns, contractors, and an assignment of the lien by said contractors to the appellant. The court found (1) that the contract was void because one of said contractors had falsely represented to the respondent, when she was quite sick in bed, that her co-executor, Smith, to whom she intrusted the management of the estate, had sent, by said contractor, a direction that she should sign said contract; (2) that the assignment to appellant was made before the filing of the lien, and therefore of no legal value, as held in Mills v. Land Co., 97 Cal. 254, 32 Pac. 169; and (3) that the lien was not filed within 60 days after the completion of the work. The last of the three findings above stated was clearly right, and therefore we need not discuss the other two. It is beyond doubt that, as a fact, the lien was not filed until more than 60 days after the completion of the work. Appellant contends that this defect in his lien is obviated by a certain certificate of a deputy superintendent of streets. The contract provided, among other things, that the work should be done "to the satisfaction of the superintendent of public streets of said city and county"; and appellant offered in evidence a certificate of the superintendent, by a deputy, that the work "has been done to my satisfaction." Respondent objected, on several grounds, to the admission of this certificate in evidence, and the objection was sustained. Appellant contends that this ruling was erroneous, and that, as the lien was filed within 60 days after the date of said certificate, therefore it was filed in time. But this contention cannot be maintained. Assuming that, as evidence of the work having been done to the satisfaction of the superintendent as provided in the contract, the certificate or written declaration of the superintendent was admissible, and not mere hearsay, and assuming, further, that for the purposes of the contract a certificate of a deputy was a certificate of the superintendent, still such certificate could not change, or in any way affect, the statutory period within which a lien must be filed, and that period commences at the date of the completion of the work. By the contract the superintendent was arbiter, at most, of only the quality of the work; and his certificate only purports to state that the work which had been done was done well, and to his satisfaction. If it had contained a statement of the date of the completion of the work, such statement would have been of no value. The judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial are affirmed.

Davis and others to quiet title to land. From a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. Moore, W. B. Sharp, and James T. Boyd, for appellant. Freeman & Bates and Jos. W. Nougues, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action brought by plaintiff against a large number of defendants for the purpose of quieting plaintiff's title, as against said defendants, to a certain piece of land, covered by water, in the city and county of San Francisco. From the answers, and statements and admissions which appear in the statement on motion for a new trial, it appears that the defendants do not deny the quantity of plaintiff's undivided interest as a tenant in common with the defendants of a large tract of land, of which the tract described in the complaint is a part. But plaintiff contends, and his complaint goes upon the theory, that he is the owner in severalty of the premises described in the complaint, and this defendants deny. The court granted a nonsuit, and entered judgment in favor of defendants; and from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, the plaintiff appeals.

It appears that in 1854 the grantors of the parties plaintiff and defendant were the owners of a certain tract of land, consisting of certain beach and water lots, in the city and county of San Francisco; and it is contended by plaintiff that there has been a partition of said tract of land by which plaintiff has become the owner in severalty of that part of said tract which is described in the complaint. The first step in the process by which said plaintiff claims that said partition was effected is a trust deed made June 7, 1854. In that deed some 15 different persons are named as parties of the first part, or grantors, and one Joseph E. Gary is named as party of the second part. It is shown by the parol testimony introduced by plaintiff that the purpose of said deed was to effect a partition, through the process of all the co-tenants conveying to said Gary with the understanding that said Gary was to reconvey to each of the co-tenants, in severalty, the share to which he was entitled. The deed itself contains this clause: "The object of this conveyance to the party of the second part is for the sole purpose of dividing the pieces or parcels of land hereinafter described, that deeds may come direct from the party of the second part to the parties of the first part, according to their respective interests." The defendants make several objections to the validity of this deed. They say, in the first place, that it was not signed and executed by all of the persons named therein as parties of the first part and co-tenants. It is a fact that several of said parties did not sign said deed. It is claimed, however, by plaintiff, that some of those not signing had no interest in the property; but this question is not necessary to be discussed here, because it is admitted that Samuel Todd was one of the tenants in common of the land of which that mentioned in the complaint is a part, and that he refused to sign the deed, and did not sign it. It is contended also by defendants that this deed to Gary included other lands, to which, as it appeared afterwards, none of the parties to said deed had any title; and it is contended that this vitiated the whole deed, upon the authority of Emeric v. Alvarado, 64 Cal. 529, 2 Pac. 418. It is also contended that the deed was void because it did not describe the quantity of interest of the various parties, and presented no basis upon which a partition could be effected. We deem it necessary to notice only the first objection above stated to the validity of said deed. Todd not having signed the deed, and having refused to sign it, it was, as a deed contemplating partition, void. Gates v. Salmon, 46 Cal. 361; Hill v. Den, 54 Cal. 7; Sutter v. San Francisco, 36 Cal. 112. "A contract which is entered into by several parties for the purpose of effecting a partition of land which they hold in common must be binding upon all the parties, or it binds none." Gates v. Salmon, supra. The plaintiff contends that this difficulty was obviated by the fact that both Gary and Todd afterwards deeded their interest to the grantor of plaintiff; but, waiving all other considerations, the deed to Gary, for the reason above given, was inoperative, and did not confer upon Gary the right to convey the interests of the parties who had signed the trust deed. There is no pretense here that there was any partition of the tract, by actual occupation of different parts of it by the tenants in common, respectively, in accordance with any parol agreement. The whole tract was covered by water, and there was no separate possession of particular parts of it taken by the individual tenants in common. Neither was there any partition by mutual conveyance between all the tenants in common. For the reasons above stated, the court below was warranted in holding that the plaintiff had made out no case for the relief asked in his complaint, as a tenant in severalty of the tract of land therein described, and the nonsuit was therefore properly granted. These views make it unnecessary to particularly notice other positions taken by the respective counsel. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. June 23, 1896.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Where, in malicious prosecution, the evidence as to want of probable cause, and malice, is conflicting, the verdict will not be disturbed on appeal.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Action by Loui Soy Wing against Chung Yick and others for malicious prosecution. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Lyman I. Mowry and Thos. T. Reardon, for appellants. Smith & O'Keefe and F. E. Stranahan, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action brought by plaintiff to recover damages for an alleged malicious prosecution of plaintiff by defendants upon a criminal charge made by defendants against plaintiff in the police court of the city and county of San Francisco. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $500, for which amount judgment was rendered. Defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The record presents no error of law committed by the court below. There are no exceptions to the rulings of the court respecting the admissibility of evidence, or the instructions given to the jury. There is no doubt that the law is as claimed by counsel for appellant,—that in a suit for malicious prosecution the plaintiff must show both a want of probable cause, and malice,—but the instructions of the court were in accordance with this principle. Neither is there any question of law presented as to the proposition that the advice of respectable counsel, given upon a full and fair statement of the facts upon which the prosecution was instituted, and a bona fide acting upon such advice, constitute a defense to the action for malicious prosecution. The appeal in this case therefore rests entirely upon the proposition that the evidence fails to show a want of probable cause, and malice. We have examined the testimony in the case very fully, and while it does not make an exceedingly strong case in favor of the plaintiff, as to want of probable cause and malice, still there is not such a defect in the evidence as to those two points as would warrant us in setting aside the verdict. Nor is the evidence such as would fairly preclude the jury from finding that there was not a full and fair statement of the facts made to counsel of defendants at the time the prosecution was instituted, or from finding that the defendants did not act in good faith upon his advice. We are not called upon to determine whether or not the verdict of the jury was in accordance with the correct balance of closely-conflicting evidence, but whether the character of the evidence was such as to leave the question within the province of the jury. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

VOORMAN v. LI PO TAI et al. (No. 15,927.)[1]

WRITS—RETURN—LIMITATIONS—DISMISSAL OF ACTION—APPEARANCE—WAIVER BY ADMINISTRATOR.

1. In foreclosure, summons was issued and served in 1877, but not returned till 1893. Defendant entered into no stipulation in regard to the case, but plaintiff granted him certain privileges, reserving the right to enter default and judgment in case defendant failed to comply with the conditions. Defendant made payments from time to time, and died in 1893. His administrator urged that the action was barred by limitations under Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 7 (as amended St. 1889, p. 398), which requires that an action in which summons shall not have been issued within one year and served, and return thereon made within three years after the commencement of said action, shall be dismissed, "and no further proceedings shall be had therein." Held, that the statute is mandatory, and that plaintiff's right of action was lost by the failure to return the summons.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 1014, defining an appearance, is exclusive, and defendant can appear only by an answer, a demurrer, or by written notice of his appearance, or by an attorney giving notice of appearance for him, as therein provided.

3. Where a claim against an estate has been barred by limitations, the administrator cannot bind the estate by waiving the defense.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action of foreclosure by Henry Voorman against Li Po Tai, and by substitution against A. C. Freese, administrator of the estate of Li Po Tai, deceased. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

TEMPLE, J. This appeal is from a judgment of foreclosure. The action was commenced July 23, 1877, in the district court. Summons was issued and served on the same day, but was not returned or filed until September 26, 1893 The only question involved in the appeal is whether the right to prosecute the action has been lost under the provisions of section 581, Code Civ. Proc. Li Po Tai never formally appeared in the action, but July 31, 1877, Messrs. Howe & Rosenbaum procured a stipulation from plaintiff's attorney granting an extension of time, which was filed August 6, 1877. Upon this was indorsed, "Howe & Rosenbaum, Attorneys of Defendant Li Po Tai." By whom this indorsement was made was not shown, but, as it is the custom of lawyers to have all papers filed similarly indorsed, it is presumed that it was done by the consent and direction of the persons named. The same custom demonstrates that it was not intended as a signature in any sense. It was shown that the same firm negotiated with plaintiff's attorneys for a stay of proceedings, and procured a stipulation signed only by the attorneys for the plaintiff, whereby plaintiff acknowledged the receipt of all interest due and costs which had accrued, including the fees of plaintiff's attorneys and $1,000 of the principal sum due, in consideration of which an extension of 30 days was granted; and it was stipulated that another extension of 30 days would be given if defendant then paid $1,000 and interest; and, if defendant thereafter paid the interest monthly, monthly extensions would be granted for one year, but if the defendant "shall fail to make any of the payments aforesaid at the time above specified, the plaintiff may take his default in the action, and enter judgment therein for the amount unpaid," etc. Thereupon defendant made payments from time to time,—the last being $500, on the 5th day of December, 1892. And it was doubtless in consideration of these payments that plaintiff delayed his action. On the 3d day of April, 1893, Li Po Tai died. An administrator having been appointed, plaintiff presented his claim against the estate, and procured a substitution of the administrator in the action. He then filed a supplemental complaint setting up the death of defendant and the presentation and rejection of his claim. To the supplemental complaint defendant interposed a general demurrer, which was overruled. He then answered, and in his answer denied that summons had ever been issued or was served on Li Po Tai, and denied that the summons had been returned, or that Li Po Tai had made default. Plaintiff recovered judgment. On the 19th day of March, 1889, section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended by adding subdivision 7. St. 1889, p. 398. It reads as follows: "And no action heretofore or hereafter commenced shall be further prosecuted, and no further proceedings shall be had therein, and all actions heretofore or hereafter commenced shall be dismissed by the court in which the same shall have been commenced, on its own motion, or on motion of any party interested therein, whether named in the complaint as a party or not, unless summons shall have been issued within one year, and served, and return thereon made within three years after the commencement of said action, or unless appearance has been made by the defendant or defendants therein within said three years." This provision is very sweeping, and is expressly made applicable to pending suits. It is mandatory; otherwise it would have no force at all. The courts were already authorized and required to dismiss suits upon motion when there had been culpable failure to prosecute. To hold this statute directory would, therefore, be to repeal it. Then the language could hardly indicate more plainly the intent that it shall be mandatory. Besides being absolute in form, it contains a prohibitory clause,—"and no further proceedings shall be had therein." Such a negative cannot be, and never has been, considered as directory merely.

I see no point in the suggestion, as applied to this case, that such a statute is unconstitutional, so far as made applicable to pending suits. The most that could be claimed would be that in such case a party would be allowed the entire period of three years after the law took effect. Here three years was allowed to pass after the statute took effect before the summons was filed. As authority for this construction we have the following cases in regard to the representative effect of statutes of limitation: Nelson v. Nelson, 6 Cal. 430; Lehmaier v. King, 10 Cal. 373; Scarborough v. Dugan, Id. 305. But it is contended by respondent that by taking and filing the stipulation extending the time to answer, and by accepting and acting upon the agreement to grant successive extensions in consideration of certain payments made, defendant appeared in the action. Section 1014, Code Civ. Proc., defines what shall constitute an appearance. A defendant appears in an action when he answers, demurs, or gives written notice of his appearance, or when an attorney gives notice of an appearance for him; and he can appear in no other way. This statute was intended to settle all disputes upon the subject. There can be no chance for argument about unequivocal acts. State v. McCullough, 3 Nev. 202, seems to be the other way, but the reasoning is far from satisfactory. There was no need of a statute to tell us that the acts specified would constitute appearance. The occasion for a rule was to dispose of questions upon which there might be dispute. There was no such appearance in this case. The defendant entered into no stipulation in regard to the case. Plaintiff granted him certain privileges, reserving the right to enter default and judgment in case defendant failed to comply with the conditions. These facts would constitute a good showing against a motion to dismiss for lack of prosecution if it were not for the mandatory statute. In the case of Kreiss v. Hotaling, 99 Cal. 383, 33 Pac. 1125, the question was whether the amendment to section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure, above referred to, prohibited the court from an exercise of its discretion in dismissing a case for want of prosecution before the expiration of three years. It was held that the new statute did not interfere with the discretion of the court in that respect.

It is next contended that when the administrator appeared and answered the supplemental complaint he waived the objection. It is unnecessary to decide the point made that the court lost all jurisdiction in the case, and that no further proceedings could be had, even by consent of both parties. Here the defendant was an administrator. The claim of plaintiff was barred by the statute of limitations. The administrator is prohibited from allowing or paying any claim which is barred. To waive the objection here would be to allow such a claim to be collected. In other words, the administrator would be voluntarily paying a claim which is barred. No such consent could be given so as to bind the estate. This rule is applicable to all trustees. Emerson v. Thompson, 16 Mass. 428; Bank v. Wright, 8 Allen, 121; Manufacturing Co. v. Barnes, 48 N. H. 25; Rhoads v. Rhoads, 43 Ill. 239; Lenox v. Notrebe, Hempst. 251, Fed. Cas. No. 8,246c. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the suit.

ANDRES v. FRY et al.

(Supreme Court of California. June 4, 1896.)

CORPORATIONS — CONTRACTS—EVIDENCE—AUTHORITY OF EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

1. A contract signed by the president and secretary of a corporation, to which the corporate seal is attached, is prima facie evidence that the contract is a corporation contract.

2. The executive committee of the board of directors of a corporation authorized by the board to make arrangements with a person for "securing the transfer" of patent rights belonging to him to the corporation have authority to execute a contract for the transfer.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by George S. Andres against John D. Fry and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. H. L. Barnes, for appellants. Tilden & Tilden, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The defendants were sued upon their personal liability as stockholders of the Eureka Manufacturing Company, a corporation organized under the laws of this state. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and the court found "that the agreement was duly executed and delivered by the corporation to the plaintiff, and that the officers of said corporation who executed said agreement were duly authorized so to do"; and further found in favor of plaintiff on all other issues, and rendered judgment accordingly. The defendants have appealed from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

At the time of ordering judgment the court filed the following written opinion, which is incorporated in the statement on motion for a new trial: "The Court: The only question presented in this case is whether the contract sued upon was the contract of the corporation. It was signed by the president and secretary, and bore the corporate seal. The production of the contract, therefore, with proof of its signature and of the corporation seal, made out a prima facie case in favor of the plaintiff. The defense is founded upon the claim that the execution of the contract in question was not authorized by the corporation, and was, therefore, without authority. After a careful examination of the evidence, I am of opinion that this defense cannot be sustained. The minutes of the board of directors (page 9) show that upon motion of Garnett the attention of the board of directors was called to the necessity of acting upon the proposition of the plaintiff, and the board then passed a resolution which, in my opinion, authorized the execution of the contract. This resolution, in terms, referred the matter to the executive committee, and empowered them to make the necessary arrangements with Andres for securing the transfer of his right to this company. It would seem, therefore, that in the execution of the contract in question it was entirely satisfactory to the executive committee. They were but carrying out the resolution of the board, which practically authorized and empowered them to close the transaction with Andres, and the sale and transfer of his rights to this company. The power thus delegated to the executive committee was exercised by them. The paper in question was properly signed by the president and secretary, and the corporate seal affixed. I am therefore of opinion that the act was binding upon the corporation, and that plaintiff is entitled to recover. It is therefore ordered that plaintiff recover judgment as prayed for. Hunt, Judge. November 14, 1893." (In denying the motion for a new trial the court filed an additional opinion, which contains a summary of the evidence bearing upon the issue as to the authority of the executive committee, and tending to show that the contract was repudiated by defendants for reasons other than that the committee was not authorized to execute it, and for which plaintiff was not responsible. This opinion is attached to the statement on motion for new trial, and satisfactorily vindicates the finding of the authority of the committee to execute the contract.)

The conclusion of the trial court that the plaintiff made a prima facie case by production of the contract signed by the president and secretary and bearing the corporate seal is warranted by the following authorities: Ang. & A. Corp. § 224; Burrill v. Bank, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 166; Lovett v. Association, 6 Paige, 60; Ditch Co. v. Zellerbach, 37 Cal. 600; Underhill v. Improvement Co., 93 Cal. 314, 28 Pac. 1049. There is no question that the president and secretary signed the contract, nor that the secretary affixed the corporate seal; but appellants contend that they were not authorized so to do by the board of trustees. The minutes of the board show that the terms of the proposed contract were made known to the board by a member thereof (Mr. Garnett) at a meeting held on August 12, 1889, but no definite action was then taken upon it. But at a regular meeting of the board on August 14, 1889, Mr. Garnett again "called the attention of the board to the necessity of acting" upon the proposition of Andres, when "at the suggestion of the president, it was moved and carried that the matter be referred to the executive committee, and that they be empowered to make the necessary arrangements with Messrs. Miller and Andres for securing the transfer of their rights to this company." The proposition of Andres, which had been submitted to the corporation, and which was thus referred to the executive committee, was to sell to the corporation certain patent rights; and the executive committee to which it was referred consisted of the president and two other members of the board of directors, being a majority of the board, and including the secretary. The only ground upon which it is claimed that the execution of the contract was not complete is that the executive committee did not formally report its action to the board, and that the board never formally acted on the matter after having referred it to that committee. It appears that the executive committee was created by the by-laws, but, as the by-laws were not put in evidence, it does not appear what power they conferred upon that committee. However this may be, I think the resolution referring "the matter" to the committee, and empowering it "to make the necessary arrangements with * * * Andres for securing the transfer of his rights to this company," may fairly be construed, under the circumstances, to have authorized the committee to execute the contract. How else could the (then) future transfer of Andres' patent rights have been secured? No doubt Andres was bound by the contract, and that it could have been enforced against him. Nothing was said to him about reporting the contract to the board for further action, or indicating that it was not completely executed. While it is true that corporate powers must be exercised by the board of directors when duly assembled, it is also true that while so assembled such board may authorize a committee or other agent to make a written contract in its name. In Burrill v. Bank, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 167, Chief Justice Shaw said: "We think, therefore, that a board of directors may delegate an authority to a committee of their own number to alienate or mortgage real estate; that an authority to convey necessarily implies an authority to execute suitable and proper instruments for that purpose; and, in case of a corporation, to affix the corporate seal to an instrument requiring it." To the same effect are Gashwiler v. Willis, 33 Cal. 20; Abbott v. Water Co., 87 Cal. 323, 25 Pac. 693. These authorities narrow the controversy to the question: Could the executive committee have secured a then future transfer of the patent rights of Andres to the corporation without an executed contract binding him to do so? I think the answer to this question must be negative; and, consequently, that the committee was authorized to execute such contract. It follows, I think, that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. June 18, 1896.)

TRUSTS — IDENTITY OF TRUST PROPERTY — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE — ADMISSIBILITY — SECONDARY EVIDENCE—CONTENTS OF LETTER.

1. In an action against an administrator to enforce an alleged trust it was alleged that the trust was created by the mother of plaintiffs, and accepted by the intestate; that the trustee received the trust fund, and invested it in a drug store. It appeared that intestate had carried on the business for several years, and upon his death the administrator had continued it, though at a loss; that during the last two years goods had been purchased amounting to the original purchase price; that there were claims against the business to the amount of $1,000, and that the appraised value of the business when closed was only $1,900. Held, that the evidence was insufficient to identify the drug stock and good will as the trust fund. McFarland, J., dissenting.

3. Parol evidence as to the contents of a letter is inadmissible in the absence of proof of its loss.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; John Caldwell, Judge.

Action by Walter W. Byrne and others against B. McGrath, Mary F. Byrne, and others. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant B. McGrath appeals. Reversed.

A. J. Ridge, for appellant. A. D. Mason and F. J. Dennis, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Appeal from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial. Plaintiffs, who are the children of Michael Byrne, Jr., deceased, commenced this action against the administratrix of his estate and the creditors thereof, seeking a decree that certain property which had come into the possession of the administratrix as the property of the estate was in fact property held by their father as trustee in trust for them. The facts averred, sought to be proved, and found by the court, are, generally, that the wife of Michael Byrne, Jr. (the mother of these plaintiffs), died testate, naming Michael Byrne, Jr., her husband, executor of her estate, and leaving all her property to him as trustee for the use and benefit of her children, these plaintiffs, and another child, made defendant in this action. The father, as trustee, accepted the trust, and of the trust property there came into his hands the sum of $2,500. This money he used in the purchase of the stock, fixtures, and good will of a retail drug business in the city of Grass Valley, where the parties resided. He conducted this drug business during his lifetime, and upon his death Mary F. Byrne, defendant herein, and administratrix of his estate under order of court, continued in the conduct and management of the business. It was carried on at a loss, and was finally closed out. The estate of said Michael Byrne, Jr., is admittedly insolvent, and the defendants in interest are creditors of his estate with allowed claims. Plaintiffs, having failed to present their claim against the estate within the time contemplated by law, are here seeking to follow, and claim to have followed, and the court finds that they did follow, the specific property of the trust through its mutations in form, with such certainty as justifies it in saying that the $2,500 received by the father in trust is now represented by the drugs, good will, and fixtures of the retail store.

The evidence upon the part of the plaintiffs to establish the necessary facts—that there was property in the estate of their deceased mother which was the subject of the trust, that this property came into the hands of their father as trustee, that this identical property was by him used in the purchase of the drug business—consists almost wholly of admissions alleged by one or another of the children to have been made to them by the father. This evidence, while not in law insufficient, is to the last degree unsatisfactory, in view of the fact that the father is dead, and cannot be heard upon the question, and in view of the further fact that, as this trust property must have come to the father through proceedings in distribution in the estate of his deceased wife, which estate was probated in the county in which this litigation was prosecuted, there was available to plaintiffs the primary evidence of the records and proceedings in that estate.

But, passing this point with the declaration that there is still sufficient to support the findings in this regard, an alleged error of the trial court in the admission of evidence first invites attention. One of the daughters of Michael Byrne, Jr., being upon the witness stand, testified that her father told her in January, 1883, that he had received $2,500 from her mother's estate. The drug store was bought in December, 1883. Plaintiffs' attorney then offered in evidence the petition for the probate of the will of the deceased wife of said Michael Byrne, Jr., which petition, signed by said Michael Byrne, Jr., declared that the character and probable value of the property of the estate was three 80-acre tracts of land in the state of Indiana, appraised for taxation in said state at $2,640. Objection was made to the introduction of the petition. The court declared that it was "admitted for the purpose of tending to show the existence of the trust." The following discussion then ensued: "Mr. Mason: We offer it for all purposes—all legitimate purposes. The Court: It is proper for the purpose of showing or tending to show the existence of the trust, and when it is in evidence it can be considered for all purposes. Mr. Ridge: I want the court to state what purpose it limits it to. The Court: I state now that it seems to me that it is admissible for the purpose of showing an intention, or tending to show that he accepted the trust. It may be, of course, for other purposes. Mr. Ridge: Now, to that we object on the ground that it is incompetent and irrelevant. There is no denial that M. Byrne, Jr., did accept that trust, whatever it was. Now, to allow it is to give evidence of a fact that is not denied. The Court: It will be admitted for all purposes that it is competent to establish. Mr. Ridge: Note our exception. Counsel for plaintiff then read the said petition in relation to the acres of land situated in Monroe county, Indiana, appraised at $2,640, the reading of balance being waived." It is the fact, as counsel for appellant then objected, that there was no issue joined by the pleadings upon the question of the acceptance by Michael Byrne, Jr., of the trust. The offered evidence, therefore, was immaterial upon that point. It is the undoubted rule that, when evidence is offered generally, and admitted, it is evidence for all proper purposes; but it is also the rule that evidence may be admissible for a specific purpose, and, when so admissible, the trial judge should state the purposes for which it is to be received and considered by him, and particularly should he do this when, as in the case at bar, his attention is directed to the matter, and he is repeatedly asked to declare those purposes. Thus, for example, a letter may be offered merely to prove the handwriting of a party or of a witness. To admit that letter generally, or for all proper purposes, would admit as well the contents of the letter; and unless the court, by its ruling, specifically limits the purpose of the admission, objecting counsel can never know the inner workings of the mind of the court, nor be able to tell for what purpose it was considered. They would thus be deprived of the opportunity of urging upon the attention of this court a valid objection to the introduction of evidence which they had done their utmost to have cast in perfect form. Or, again, a letter might be admissible in evidence to prove the state or condition of mind of the person writing it, as frequently happens in cases of contested wills under charges of undue influence or fraud. In such an instance the contents of the letter would be admissible as tending to show the state of mind of the writer, but it would not be admissible as establishing or tending to establish any facts or recitals or charges which the letter might contain. Yet, if generally admitted, how could objecting counsel know but that the court considered the letter for these purposes?

We come, however, to a much more serious exception taken to the ruling of the court in connection with this very evidence. Counsel for plaintiffs, having read that portion of the petition in relation to the lands in Indiana, asked the following question of the witness: "Q. Is that the property, Mrs. Cartwright, for which this check was sent on, and which he advised with you in relation to the sale of?" The witness, over objection and exception, answers: "A. I do know it was the identical property." Upon cross-examination it is disclosed that she knows it was the identical property, because her father told her so. The following proceedings were then had: "Q. Mrs. Cartwright, did you see the letter your father wrote to Louden & Meyer, instructing them to sell this property for $2,500? A. I did. Q. Did you see the reply Louden & Meyer wrote to your father? A. I did. The Court: State the contents of the letter. (Objection is made to this upon the ground that the letters themselves are the best evidence.) The Court: I will allow the evidence, at least that portion of it showing she saw the letter written by her father. (Exception taken.) Q. Will you state, Mrs. Cartwright, what the letter was, and what it contained, if anything, that came back from Louden & Meyer to your father, in response to his letter directing them to sell the property for $2,500? (Same objection as above. Objection overruled. Exception taken.) A. Well, a letter closing the business and inclosing the proceeds of the property; a check; a folded check." Then, against the same objection and ruling and exception, the following questions were asked and answered: "Q. The transaction was wound up? A. Yes, sir, by this letter. (No proof of loss of any of these letters was made or of any search for them, nor was any attempt made to account for their non-production.)" The admission of this evidence was palpable error. The witness is asked, both by court and counsel, to testify to the contents of letters without any foundation by proof of loss for the introduction of such secondary evidence. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1855, 1937. Moreover, her answers themselves do not fairly state the contents, but under leading questions from her counsel she is permitted to give her own judgment and conclusion as to the meaning of the contents of the letters.

There is finally to be considered the question whether or not plaintiffs followed the trust fund in its mutations, and have sufficiently identified it to avoid the rule laid down in Lathrop v. Bampton, 31 Cal. 17, which places the beneficiary who is unable so to follow the trust funds in the position of a general creditor of the estate. The drug business was bought by Michael Byrne, Jr., in 1883. He conducted it until his death, in 1887. After his death it was conducted on behalf of his estate by the administratrix thereof for a period of something over two years. During that time the estate bought goods and supplies for the store to the amount of $2,469.63. There were outstanding and unsettled accounts due to creditors of the estate who had furnished supplies for the store. For a period, then, of over eight years, a business which had been originally purchased—the stock, fixtures, and good will—for $2,500 had been in active operation. During the last two years of the life of the business there had been purchased goods equaling in value the total amount paid for the property. During all of this time the store was conducted by or on behalf of Michael Byrne, Jr. His credit was used for the purchase of supplies. The approved claims of creditors for goods furnished to the business exceeded the sum of $1,000. Of the stock in the store at the commencement of this action over $1,000 in value represented by these claims were bought; therefore, not by the moneys of the trust, but upon the credit of Byrne. Yet the total value of the business at the time of the action was but $1,900. It is not and cannot be successfully contended that plaintiffs, during all this time, and through all of these mutations, and under these circumstances, can trace the original $2,500 or its proceeds. If they cannot, then they are relegated to the position of general creditors of their father's estate. Had their action been commenced against their father during his lifetime, a court of equity would have imposed upon him the duty of segregating the trust property from any property of his own which he might have commingled with it, but upon his death other rights intervened,—the rights of the creditors here made defendants; and thus comes into application the rule, and thus appears the reason for it, that the plaintiffs, in order that the creditors may not suffer unjust loss, must be able to separate their own property from the general assets of the estate, or, failing to do this, must take their place along with the general creditors, and, like them, look to those assets for reimbursement. While the determination as to whether or not the trust funds have been followed and identified so as to permit of segregation from the general assets is one of fact, yet the uncontradicted evidence in this case clearly fails to establish the required identity. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: TEMPLE, J.; HARRISON, J.

BEATTY, C. J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment, and in so much of the opinion of Justice HENSHAW as deals with the exceptions to rulings of the superior court upon objections to evidence. I concur also in his conclusion that the fund in controversy is not sufficiently identified as the property of the plaintiffs. In respect to this matter, however, I base my conclusion upon grounds different in some respects from those stated in the principal opinion. If the findings of the superior court were in other respects supported by the evidence, the mere fact that at the death of the trustee a part of the stock in the drug store remained unpaid for would not, in my opinion, destroy the identification of the trust property. Assuming that the store and good will were purchased with money of the trustor; that the business was thereafter carried on by the trustee for the benefit of the plaintiffs at a profit; that the stock was kept replenished out of the receipts of the business; that profits were received and appropriated by the trustee to an amount exceeding all expenses of the trust,—in such case it seems clear to my mind that the store and business at the death of the trustee were sufficiently earmarked as the property of the beneficiaries, despite the fact that considerable bills for stock on hand remained unpaid. This circumstance alone could not have furnished a ground for subjecting the fund to the claims of general creditors of the trustee, and, as to those creditors whose claims were on account of stock furnished to the store, they could be protected in this proceeding (to which they are parties) by preferred payment out of the fund, for they are creditors, not of the trustee, the agent, but of the beneficiaries, the principals. But the trouble I find with the case is that there is no evidence to support several material findings attacked by the specifications. There is no evidence sufficient to sustain the finding that the business was conducted at a profit, that the stock was replenished out of the receipts of the business, or that it paid the expenses of the trust, and for this reason I conclude that the stock on hand at the death of the trustee was not earmarked as the property of the plaintiffs.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent. I see no sufficient reason for reversing the judgment. The whole record shows, in my opinion, that the errors for which the judgment is reversed are immaterial, and that the drug store was sufficiently identified as trust property.

Ex parte TURNER. (Cr. 172.)

BAIL—PENDING APPEAL—DISCRETION.

Admission to bail after conviction, pending appeal, is matter of discretion, primarily vested in the trial judge, whose action therein will not be disturbed except in the instance of manifest abuse.

In chambers. Application on the part of J. F. Turner for admission to bail pending appeal. Denied.

Geo. A. Knight, for petitioner.

VAN FLEET, J. The petition shows that the prisoner, Turner, has been convicted of forgery in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, and sentenced to confinement in the state prison (for what term does not appear); that he has taken an appeal to this court from the judgment; and that a certificate of probable cause has been granted by the judge before whom he was tried, and he is now confined in the county jail of said city and county, pending the determination of such appeal. The petition also shows that, since his conviction, application has been made by him to the trial judge for admission to bail, upon the ground that he is in ill health, and his life is endangered by his confinement; and that such application was denied. The present application is now made to me upon the same ground, and has been submitted upon substantially the same evidence and showing as that made before the trial judge. This evidence tends to show that the prisoner was not at the date of his being taken into custody a man of robust health, and that during his confinement his health has further declined, and he has lost flesh and strength, to some extent, and that there is, in the judgment of his physicians, danger arising from his present condition that his health may be permanently and dangerously affected by further confinement at the present time.

Admission to bail after conviction is purely a matter of discretion, and not of right (Pen. Code, § 1272), and it has been several times held by the supreme court of this state that such discretion should not be exercised in favor of the liberation of a defendant pending appeal, except in instances where circumstances of an extraordinary character have intervened since conviction, which make such action obviously proper (Ex parte Smallman, 54 Cal. 36; Ex parte Marks, 49 Cal. 681; Ex parte Brown, 68 Cal. 183, 8 Pac. 829; Ex parte Smith, 89 Cal. 79, 26 Pac. 638). The discretion given in cases of this kind is vested primarily in the court that tried the cause, or the judge thereof (People v. Perdue, 48 Cal. 552; People v. January, 70 Cal. 34, 11 Pac. 326); and the determination of the latter should not be disturbed or ignored except in an instance of manifest abuse. Such an instance is not here disclosed. There is nothing in the case showing the intervention of any such extraordinary circumstance as would justify holding that the application was improperly denied by the judge of the trial court. The evidence does not show that there is such imminence of dangerous results to the life or health of the defendant as to obviously require his removal from the county jail at this time. Should more serious consequences of his confinement hereafter manifest themselves, and such as to render it proper that bail should be allowed, there is nothing to preclude another application for the purpose. Such application should, however, always be made in the first instance, if practicable, to the judge before whom the defendant was tried. Ex parte January, supra. Application denied.

BANK OF CALIFORNIA v. J. L. MOTT IRON WORKS et al. (S. F. 274.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 22, 1896.)

TRIAL — FINDINGS — SUFFICIENCY — GARNISHMENT —APPEAL—PARTY AGGRIEVED.

1. On the issue as to right to the money in dispute between a garnishing creditor of the payee of a note and an assignee thereof, a finding that, in a suit by such creditor against the payee, a writ of attachment was placed in the hands of the sheriff for service, "and thereafter the said sheriff levied and served the said writ of attachment, by notifying" the plaintiff, to whom the note had been sent for collection, "that all the goods, moneys, and chattels of the defendant," the payee of the note, were levied upon in pursuance of the writ, does not sufficiently show that the writ of attachment was served on the defendant.

2. A party in possession of a negotiable note, indorsed in blank by the person to whose order it was made payable, is prima facie the owner thereof, and may question the validity of garnishment proceedings by a creditor of the payee.

3. Where a note is sent by an indorsee to a bank for collection, statements by another bank, to which the note was sent by the first bank, are inadmissible against the indorsee to defeat his title.

Interpleader by the Bank of California against the J. L. Mott Iron Works and others. From a judgment for the defendant iron works, defendant S. A. Monsarrat appeals. Reversed.

R. H. Countryman, for appellant. Thornton & Merzbach, for respondent. Allen & McAllister, for plaintiff.

McFARLAND, J. The plaintiff, the Bank of California, brought this action against the J. L. Mott Iron Works, the West Coast Plumbing Supply Company, and S. A. Monsarrat, defendants. The plaintiff and the two defendants first above named are corporations. The plaintiff alleged that it had on deposit, and held as a banking corporation, $627, which was claimed by each of said defendants hostilely to each other. Plaintiff alleged that it had no interest in said money, and asked to be allowed to pay the same into court, and that said defendants be compelled to interplead and litigate their several claims to said money among themselves. The defendant the West Coast Plumbing Supply Company made default; and the said defendants, the Mott Iron Works and said Monsarrat, filed pleadings in which each claimed title to said money. They consented that plaintiff deposit said money in court, and be relieved from any further liability in the matter. The plaintiff came into possession of said money in this way: A certain firm, called J. L. Barker & Co., had executed its note to the said defendant the West Coast Plumbing Supply Company for $550, payable to the order of said company, and said note had been sent to the plaintiff, the said bank, for collection by one Louis E. Arnold, inclosed in a letter dated at Vancouver, B. C., with directions that said bank should collect the same, and remit the proceeds to said Arnold, at Yokohama exchange. The bank collected the money due on said note, and said money is the subject of this action.

The Mott Iron Works contends that it commenced an action against the said plumbing company, in which it had an attachment issued; and that, by virtue of said writ of attachment, it garnished said money in contest in the hands of the said bank plaintiff; and that it was the money of said company. It also claims that it recovered judgment against said plumbing company in said action. The said defendant Monsarrat contends that said note belonged to said Arnold, and that the said Arnold assigned to said defendant the moneys collected upon said note by said bank. The case does not seem to have been very closely tried, and the record presents the conflicting claims of the parties in a rather unsatisfactory manner. There are findings of the court which are not sustained by the evidence, though most of the findings not thus sustained are immaterial. For instance, the court finds that "all the defendants" claim said money, and demand payment for the same, whereas the defendant the plumbing company does not claim said money, but, on the other hand, made default; but this finding is immaterial. It is also found that "the defendant West Coast Plumbing Supply Company indorsed and delivered said promissory note to the plaintiff, the Bank of California, for collection"; and there is no evidence to support this finding, but this finding is not material, except, perhaps, in one view of the case, which will be noticed hereafter. There are some other findings not sustained by the evidence which are also immaterial. There are also exceptions to rulings of the court about matters which are immaterial. The court rendered judgment in favor of the Mott Iron Works, and Monsarrat appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Appellant objected to the introduction of the judgment in favor of the Mott Iron Works against the said plumbing company, upon the ground that the year allowed for appeal in that case had not expired. It will not be necessary to determine the validity of that exception, because the judgment must be reversed for another reason, and that point will probably not arise upon another trial. The claim of the plaintiff to the money in contest rests upon its allegation that it procured the Bank of California to be garnished in said action which it had brought against the said plumbing company, and the court found that in said action "a writ of attachment in due form of law was issued, and placed in the hands of the sheriff of said city and county of San Francisco for service; and thereafter the said sheriff levied and served the said writ of attachment by notifying the plaintiff, the Bank of California, that all goods, moneys, and chattels of the defendant the West Coast Plumbing and Supply Company were levied upon and attached by him, in pursuance of the terms of said writ." But we are unable to find anywhere in the record any evidence that said writ of attachment ever issued, or was ever served upon the said bank. That being so, we see no basis for a judgment in favor of the said Mott Iron Works, respondent.

Respondent contends that, whether or not the court committed any errors in its favor, or erroneously entered a judgment for it, still the appellant has no cause to complain, because he has shown no right or title whatever to the proceeds of said note. But this position is not tenable. The appellant's assignor, Arnold, was in possession of the note. He sent it to the Bank of California for collection, and it was collected by said bank, and the proceeds placed to the credit of said Arnold. The court found that said note had been indorsed by the said plumbing company, although it erroneously found, without any evidence, that it had been so indorsed by said plumbing company to the Bank of California; and, under these circumstances, it cannot be said that no right at all to the note was shown to be in said Arnold. A party being in possession of a negotiable note, either payable to bearer or indorsed in blank by the person to whose order it is made payable, is at least prima facie the owner of the note, although, of course, such prima facie ownership may be swept away by proper rebutting evidence. If on another trial the respondent shows that it is entitled to said money by virtue of its attachment and judgment against the plumbing company, it will be in a position to attack the claim of the appellant or his assignor to said money; but, not having shown any title itself to the money, it is not now in a position to maintain a judgment in its favor.

It seems that the note sent by Arnold to the Bank of California was forwarded by the latter to the Union Savings Bank of Oakland for collection, and a letter written by the said savings bank to the Bank of California with regard to said note was introduced in evidence by the respondent, over the objection of the appellant. This objection should have been sustained, for we see no ground upon which that letter was in any way evidence in this case as against the appellant.

It seems that there was another note for $87, made by one Brownlie, which was also inclosed in the letter from Arnold to the Bank of California. It does not appear to whom this note was made, and it is not mentioned in the complaint or in the findings; yet its amount seems to have been included in the judgment in favor of respondent. Appellant makes a point in his brief about the Brownlie note; but we cannot discover that the record in any way presents any question whatever about this note, and therefore it cannot be here considered.

The court properly overruled appellant's objections to the affidavit and undertaking on attachment.

There was sufficient evidence that the respondent was a corporation, and the objections to that evidence were properly overruled.

We do not see any other points in the case necessary to be now considered. Questions relating to the validity or admissibility of all judgment rolls and pleadings in other cases offered or received in evidence, and all facts relating thereto, if such evidence shall be offered upon another trial, and all questions relating to other matters not expressly passed upon in this opinion, are to be regarded, if arising on another trial, as open questions. Judgment and order appealed from reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

QUIGGLE v. PROUTY. (S. F. 105.)

REAL-ESTATE BROKER — COMMISSIONS — CONTRACT.

A real-estate broker who makes a contract with a property owner can recover commissions only in accordance with such contract.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Charles Quiggle against Simon Prouty. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Johnson & Johnson, for appellant. Albert M. Johnson, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. The only question involved in this appeal is whether plaintiff is entitled to recover commissions for the sale of a lot at Sacramento. Defendant placed with plaintiff, as broker, a certain lot for sale, to remain in his hands for one year, with the condition that "if a sale of said property shall be negotiated during that time by the said Chas. Quiggle, directly or indirectly, for the amount stipulated, or any less amount which I may accept, * * * I promise to pay the said Chas. Quiggle a commission of five per cent. on the amount of said sale." A broker's contract, like any other, is governed by its terms. There is no evidence showing, or tending to show, that plaintiff negotiated a sale of the property placed in his hands. The judgment is affirmed.

WILCOX v. LUCO. (S. F. 179.)[1]

COURTS—JURISDICTION—CONSUL OF FOREIGN NATION.

Under Const. U. S. art. 3, § 2, providing that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, a state court has no jurisdiction in a civil case over the person of a consul of a foreign government resident in the state.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Alfred A. Wilcox against Juan M. Luco. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Orestes J. Orena (William Rix, of counsel), for appellant. I. N. Thorne, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The only question presented in this case is whether the superior court had jurisdiction in a civil case over the person of the defendant, who is the consul general of Chili for the United States, resident at San Francisco, Cal. The court below held that it had no jurisdiction, and the plaintiff appeals from the judgment. The question was determined adversely to the contention of appellant by this court in the case of Miller v. Van Loben Sels, 66 Cal. 341, 5 Pac. 512. Appellant contends that said case should not be considered as conclusive authority upon the question, because at the time it was decided the ninth section of the judiciary act of 1789 expressly provided that the jurisdiction of the United States over consuls was exclusive, and that since then, on February 18, 1875, the congress of the United States, by an act entitled "An act to correct errors, etc., in the Revised Statutes," repealed the said section of the said act of 1789, and that the court in said case of Miller v. Van Loben Sels assumed that said section 9 was still in existence, and that its attention was not called to the said repeal of said section. The attention of the court in that case was called to such repeal by a petition for rehearing, but it is contended by appellant that the court must be deemed to have not considered a point presented for the first time in such petition. Whether that decision should or should not be considered as final authority upon the question, we are satisfied that the rule there declared was correct, even in view of the fact that said section of the act of 1789 has been repealed. By section 2 of article 3 of the constitution of the United States it is provided that the judicial power of the United States shall extend "to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls." By this provision consuls are put on the same footing with ambassadors. Under our system the government of the United States is the only sovereign having relations with foreign countries under the law of nations, and all dealings with the representatives of foreign nations must be by the courts or other agencies of the government which is alone sovereign in that regard. It is the right and privilege of the foreign government to be thus treated. In Davis v. Packard, 7 Pet. 276, it was contended that Davis, who was consul general of the king of Saxony, had waived his privilege by not setting it up at the proper time in the court below. The supreme court of the United States, however, did not sustain this contention, and said: "If this was to be viewed merely as a personal privilege, there might be grounds for such conclusion, but it cannot be so considered. It is the privilege of the country or government which the consul represents. This is the light in which foreign ministers are considered by the law of nations, and our constitution and law seem to put consuls on the same footing in this respect. If the privilege or exemption was merely personal, it can hardly be supposed that it would have been thought a matter sufficiently important to require a special provision in the constitution and laws of the United States. Higher considerations of public policy doubtless led to the provision. It was deemed fit and proper that the courts of the government with which rested the regulation of all foreign intercourse should have cognizance of suits against the representatives of such foreign governments." We think, therefore, that under the said provision of the constitution of the United States there was no jurisdiction of the case at bar in the superior court of this state. The judgment is affirmed.

GAVIN v. SWAIN et al. (S. F. 64.)

Action to Quiet Title — Pleading and Proof — Ownership.

Ownership or seisin of real property is a fact that may be pleaded, proved, and found as a material, ultimate fact in any case involving title to the property.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Charles J. Gavin, administrator of Ellen Gavin, deceased, against Frank Swain, executor of Mary J. Holmes, deceased, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Dunne & McPike, for appellant. J. M. Whitworth and H. G. Platt, for appellees.

VANCLIEF, C. This action was commenced against Mary J. Gavin, Patrick Gavin, and C. S. Laumeister to quiet plaintiff's alleged title to a piece of land in the city of San Francisco. Pending this action, Mary J. Gavin married, and thereby took the name Mary J. Holmes, and died before judgment, and her executor, Frank Swain, was substituted for her as defendant. The defendant Mary J. Gavin alone answered, denying plaintiff's alleged title and right of possession; and alleging that, at and before the commencement of the action, she was, and still is, the owner of the piece of land described in the complaint, and is entitled to the possession thereof. Upon the issues thus raised, the court below found in favor of the defendant, executor of Mary J. Holmes, and rendered judgment accordingly. The plaintiff brings this appeal from the judgment, upon the judgment roll, and without any bill of exceptions.

The only point made by counsel for appellant is that there is no sufficient finding of facts to sustain the judgment. The court found that plaintiff's intestate, Ellen Gavin, never did, and that her estate does not now, "own or possess or have any right, title, or interest or estate in or to the real property mentioned and described in the complaint, or any part thereof, and never was, and is not now, entitled to the possession of the same, or any part thereof"; and further found that defendant's testatrix, Mary J. Gavin, "was at the commencement of this action, and since the 18th day of March, 1893, up to and at the time of her death (December 7, 1893), the owner and seised in fee and entitled to the possession of said property, and the whole thereof." It is contended that these are not findings of facts, and especially that the findings that plaintiff's intestate never owned or possessed any interest or estate in the land in question, and that defendant's testatrix was, at the commencement of this action and at the time of her death, "the owner and seised in fee" of said land, are mere conclusions, "reached by the application of rules of law to an ascertained fact or collection of facts." There is no merit in this point; and the decisions in this state overruling it are so numerous that it seems unaccountable that it should be relied upon or contended for by counsel at this time. That ownership, or (in technical language) seisin, of real property, is a fact that may be pleaded, proved, and found as a material ultimate fact in all cases involving title to real property, is unquestionable in this state. Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 244; Murphy v. Bennett, 68 Cal. 528, 9 Pac. 738; Daly v. Sorocco, 80 Cal. 367, 22 Pac. 211; Gill v. Driver, 90 Cal. 72, 27 Pac. 64. Indeed, the plaintiff has so, and not otherwise, pleaded it. It is averred in her complaint, simply, that plaintiff is "the owner and entitled to the possession of" the land in question, without any reference to the source of title, or to the manner or means of its acquisition. It follows, I think, that the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PATRIDGE v. BUTLER. (S. F. 57.)

CORPORATIONS—STOCKHOLDER'S LIABILITY—ORIGINAL CONTRACT—ACCOUNT STATED.

In an action to enforce a stockholder's individual liability for a debt due from the corporation, the complaint averred that plaintiff's testator, under contract with the corporation, performed certain labor for it, for which the company agreed to pay the sum of $6,977.16; "that on or about the 10th day of May, 1892, all of said work was completed, and on or about the 1st day of June, 1892, an account of said work was stated," and there was found due to plaintiff's testator the sum of $6,800, which sum defendant agreed to pay; that on June 29, 1892, defendant, as president of the corporation, and for it, paid on account of said sum of $6,800 the sum of $1,500, and that no further payment had been made. Held sufficient, as the cause of action pleaded was on the original contract, and not on an account stated.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Anne E. Patridge, executrix of the last will of H. C. Patridge, deceased, against C. C. Butler, to enforce a stockholder's liability against defendant for his proportionate share of a corporation's indebtedness to plaintiff's testator. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rodgers & Paterson and James L. Robison, for appellant. D. H. Whittemore, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's complaint having been overruled, and his motion to strike out certain portions of the same having been denied, he refused to answer, and takes this appeal from the judgment thereafter entered against him.

Plaintiff, executrix, prosecuted the action to enforce a stockholder's liability against Butler for his proportion of the debt due her testator from the S. S. Construction Company, a corporation. After proper averments showing the number of shares of stock owned by Butler and the total number of subscribed shares of the capital stock, she pleaded that her testator, under contract with the corporation, performed certain labor for it, for which the company agreed to pay the sum of $6,977.16. She then alleged: "That on or about the 10th day of May, 1892, all of said work was completed, and on or about the 1st day of June, 1892, an account for said work was stated between the said S. S. Construction Company and said H. C. Patridge, and upon said statement there was found due to said H. C. Patridge the sum of $6,800, which sum defendants agreed to pay. That on or about the 29th day of June, 1892, defendant, C. C. Butler, as president of said S. S. Construction Company, and for said company, paid on account of said sum of $6,800 the sum of $1,500, and that no part of said sum of $6,800, except said sum of $1,500, has been paid."

The principal argument upon the demurrer, as well as upon the motion to strike out, is that the cause of action here pleaded is not upon the original debt, for which alone there is a statutory liability against the stockholder, but is on a new cause of action under the contract of stated account (Littlefield v. Nichols, 42 Cal. 372; Coffee v. Williams, 103 Cal. 550, 37 Pac. 504), upon which latter the stockholder may not be held. It is true that the stockholder's liability under the statute is primary, and for his proportion of the original indebtedness or liability. Redington v. Cornwell, 90 Cal. 63, 27 Pac. 40; Hunt v. Ward, 99 Cal. 612, 34 Pac. 335; Knowles v. Sandercock, 107 Cal. 629, 40 Pac. 1047. But, without considering the question whether an account stated, since it constitutes a new contract, giving rise to a new cause of action, may not in itself be treated as a new or original liability for which stockholders would be liable, we are of opinion that the demurrer in the case was properly overruled, and the motion to strike out properly denied.

The action is based upon the original contract and indebtedness, which are specifically pleaded. In an action upon an account stated, these averments would have no proper place. An account stated is a mere acknowledgment of the amount of an existing liability between the parties. From it the law implies a promise to pay the admitted amount. Thereby arises a new and independent cause of action, so far that a recovery may be had without setting forth or proving the original contract or accounts, or the separate items of liability from which the balance results. Coffee v. Williams, supra; Throop v. Sherwood, 9 Ill. 92; Chace v. Trafford, 116 Mass. 529; Foster v. Allanson, 2 Term R. 479; Bouslog v. Garrett, 39 Ind. 338; Heinrich v. Englund, 34 Minn. 395, 26 N. W. 122; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 127. In this case the plaintiff, after averring facts establishing the creation and existence of the original indebtedness, proceeded, as was proper, to show a reduction of the amount by way of account stated. Of this reduction the stockholder was entitled to the benefit, as he would have been had there been an actual payment by the company upon the original debt. These averments, then, were not designed to found a cause of action upon the stated account, but were set forth as a transaction between the creditor and the corporation by which the corporation's debt was diminished, and accordingly the stockholder's liability therefor. Thus these allegations amounted to a mere admission by plaintiff that the debt had been reduced from the original amount. Whether reduced by payment or by convention was one and the same thing to the stockholders, who profited by it. Upon both the creditor and the corporation the agreed amount, in the absence of fraud or mistake, was binding. It became plaintiff's duty, in pleading, to show how the debt had been reduced from its original amount. How she could do this in any other or better way than was adopted we do not perceive. The stockholder was still at liberty to repudiate the reduction if he saw fit, and he also had full liberty to assail the primary transaction, and show, if he could, that no indebtedness existed. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

WETMORE v. C. A. WETMORE CO.

(S. F. No. 2.)

CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION — CONSIDERATION FOR SERVICES.

Under a contract, signed by W. and accepted by the W. Company, reciting that, in consideration of the purchase by K. of certain shares of the W. Company, and the payment by K. of $10,000, W. agrees to render certain services to the company for five years, W. is entitled to no other consideration for his services than that stated in the contract.

Action by Clarence J. Wetmore, assignee of Charles A. Wetmore, against the C. A. Wetmore Company, a corporation. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. W. Towle, Jr., and T. C. Van Ness, for appellant. A. A. Moore, J. C. Martin, T. C. Coogan, and J. H. Meredith, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. C. A. Wetmore having been adjudged an insolvent debtor, the plaintiff, Clarence J. Wetmore, was elected assignee, and to him all the insolvent's property was assigned in accordance with the provisions of the insolvent act of 1880. Plaintiff alleges, in his complaint, that at the time of the assignment the defendant was indebted to said insolvent in the sum of $2,500 for personal services of the latter from July 16, until December 21, 1891, in superintending defendant's winery and manufacturing wines; that such indebtedness passed to plaintiff by said assignment, and has not been paid,—and prays that he may have judgment against the defendant for said sum. The answer of the defendant denies that defendant employed Charles A. Wetmore to perform any services whatever, and denies that he performed any services for the defendant, except such as he performed under and in accordance with the following written contract: "San Francisco, July 16, 1891. In consideration of the purchase of thirteen hundred shares of the capital stock of the C. A. Wetmore Company by C. K. Kirby, and the payment of ten thousand dollars by said Kirby, I hereby agree to give my personal supervision to the business of the company, attend to the selection of the materials, the making, blending, bottling, and selling of all wines connected with the wine business for and during the full period of five years from the date hereof, for the sole benefit of said company, and that I will not engage in or use any of my skill or knowledge in the wine business, in any form whatever, for the benefit of myself or any party or parties other than the above named company, or their successors, during the full period of the time above mentioned. [Signed] Charles A. Wetmore. Witness: Maurice Clark." Indorsed across the face of original as follows: "Accepted by the C. A. Wetmore Company by C. K. Kirby, business manager. This is a true copy. Maurice Clark." Admits that Charles A. Wetmore performed such services as required of him by said contract until December 21, 1891, and alleges that on said 21st day of December, 1891, said contract was canceled and annulled, and that each party thereto was then released from all obligations thereby incurred. The findings by the court upon all the material issues of fact were in favor of the defendant, and the judgment was in accordance with the findings of fact. The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment, and also from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

No point is made by appellant on the appeal from the judgment, nor is any error in law specified or complained of, even by implication, except that the court erred in its construction of the contract of July 16, 1891. As to insufficiency of the evidence, the only points made, or specified in the statement, are the following: "(a) There is no evidence to show that said Charles A. Wetmore ever, either with said Kirby as an individual, or with him as business manager of said C. A. Wetmore Co., agreed to render services to C. A. Wetmore Co. without being paid therefor the reasonable value of the same. (b) There is no evidence to show that any agreement was ever made or entered into between said Charles A. Wetmore and the C. A. Wetmore Co., relating to the services of said Wetmore to said company, save the contract of July 16, 1891. (c) That under the contract of July 16, 1891, Charles A. Wetmore is entitled to compensation for services rendered in pursuance thereof." From these specifications, as well as from the brief of counsel for appellant, it is manifest that the only matter in controversy here is the question whether or not the court below misconstrued the contract of July 16, 1891, to the prejudice of appellant. By the plain and unambiguous terms of that contract the appellant agreed to perform the services the reasonable value of which he seeks to recover, "in consideration of the purchase of thirteen hundred shares of the capital stock of the C. A. Wetmore Company by C. K. Kirby, and the payment of $10,000 by said Kirby." It is not questioned that Kirby purchased the stock, nor that he paid the $10,000; and it is admitted that plaintiff performed the services under that contract, and that there was no other contract between the parties relating to the services of the plaintiff. I think the court correctly concluded that plaintiff was entitled to no other consideration for his services than that stated in the contract, and for which he expressly agreed to perform them. Besides, the evidence clearly shows that both parties to the contract so construed and acted upon it until December 14, 1891, seven days prior to the cancellation thereof, and that on December 21, 1891, the contract was canceled and a settlement made with plaintiff by another contract, which, among other things, contains the following: "That certain other agreement between said parties, dated July 16, 1891, relating to the services of the party of the first part [C. A. Wetmore] in said corporation, is canceled, set aside, and annulled, and each of said parties and said corporation is discharged of and from each and every obligation on him or it binding by the terms thereof." I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

JEFFERS et al. v. EASTON, ELDRIDGE & CO. et al. (S. F. 174.)

LEASEHOLD—ASSIGNMENT—IMPLIED WARRANTY—FAILURE OF ASSIGNOR'S TITLE—PAYMENT OF CONSIDERATION.

1. Where there is an assignment in toto of a lease for a number of years, there is an implied undertaking to make out the lessor's title to the demised premises and that of the assignor to the lease itself, and the failure of the title of the assignor to the leasehold attempted to be assigned constitutes a valid defense to an action to recover the purchase money from the assignee.

2. The assignee in possession of a leasehold is not estopped from denying the title of his assignor, and may yield it to a demand of the true owner which he could not legally resist.

Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by M. S. Jeffers and another against Easton, Eldridge & Co. and others to recover moneys for an assignment of a leasehold interest. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Estee & Miller, for appellants. C. F. Hanlon, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action brought by the plaintiffs, Jeffers & Wright, to recover certain moneys alleged to be due upon an assignment by them of a certain leasehold interest to the defendants Easton, Eldridge & Co., a corporation. Certain individual defendants are also sued. Judgment went for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

In 1886 one George Hyde executed to the plaintiffs, Jeffers & Wright, a written lease of certain real property in the city of San Francisco, for a term of eight years and six months, at a monthly rental of $175. Plaintiffs went into possession of the leased premises, and in 1889 they procured from Hyde an extension of the term of the lease until January 1, 1896. On February 1, 1890, the plaintiffs and the said corporation executed a written instrument by which the plaintiffs sold, assigned, and transferred said leasehold interest to said corporation, and said corporation promised to pay to Hyde the said rent of $175 per month, and also to pay plaintiffs, in consideration of said assignment, the sum of $275 per month until the said 1st day of January, 1896. Plaintiffs delivered possession of the said premises to said defendant corporation, and the latter paid the $175 to Hyde and the said $275 to plaintiffs up to and including the month of August, 1890, but since then have refused to pay plaintiffs any money whatever. This action is brought to recover said two sums of money for each of the seven months, commencing with September, 1890, and ending with March, 1891. The lessor, George Hyde, died in August, 1890, and soon afterwards his widow, Ellen J. Hyde, and certain of her children, informed the said corporation that at the time of the execution of said lease, and of said extension thereof, they were the owners in fee of said leased premises, and ever since had been such owners, and that at said times the said George Hyde had no right, title, or interest to or in said premises, and had no right or authority to make said lease or said extension thereof, and they demanded that the corporation give up possession to them, and threatened to put the said corporation out of possession, and employed an attorney to do so. This was the first intimation which said defendant had that said leasehold was not perfectly valid, as it had been represented to be by plaintiffs. The defendant immediately consulted its attorneys, who, after investigation, advised it that the title to the leasehold interest was worthless, and that an action by Mrs. Hyde and her children for possession, or for use and occupation of the premises, could not be successfully defended. There was then considerable negotiation between the defendant and the plaintiffs about the defect in the title, which appears to have resulted in nothing definite. Defendant then told Mrs. Hyde to take possession, and claims that she did it, but defendant did not remove its effects from the premises, and Mrs. Hyde did not take actual possession; but, without going out of actual possession, the defendant took a lease of the premises from Mrs. Hyde and said children, and has since remained in possession as their tenants.

The court found that on or about June 30, 1886, the said George Hyde was seised in fee and possessed of the said leased premises, and on that day executed a certain written instrument marked "Exhibit A," which was recorded August 9, 1866. By this instrument the said leased premises, together with a large amount of other property, were granted and conveyed to Ellen J. Hyde for her life, with remainder to certain children of the parties, therein expressly named. There is also a provision in the conveyance that the said Ellen shall use the rents and profits of the whole property conveyed for the support and maintenance of herself, and also for the maintenance and education of said children, and the latter are therefore named in the findings and evidence as "beneficiaries." The court also found "that Ellen J. Hyde and the beneficiaries in the instrument set forth as Exhibit A in the amended answer were the only persons who, at any time since 1866, held any legal or equitable title to the premises in said instrument described, or any part thereof, and that George Hyde at no time since 1866 was the owner of the whole or any part thereof, or was entitled to make and execute said lease and the extension thereof." The court also found that at the time of the said assignment the plaintiffs represented to said corporation that said George Hyde was the owner of said premises, and that plaintiffs were entitled under said lease to the possession of said premise until January 1, 1896, and that by reason of said representations said defendant was induced to take said assignment in ignorance of the true state of the title. As to the findings above stated, it is sufficient to say that they are supported by the evidence. The court held that the consideration for the promise of the said defendant to pay said sums of money monthly for said assignment had failed, and the question to be determined is whether or not, under the circumstances above stated, the failure of the title of plaintiffs to the leasehold attempted to be assigned constitutes a valid defense to this action. The question must be answered in the affirmative.

Counsel for appellants argued the case mostly upon the theory that the relation of landlord and tenant existed between plaintiffs and the corporation respondent. But there was no such relation. The assignment was of the whole term. There was no underletting,—no interest left in the assignors,—and the relation was simply that of seller and purchaser. Smiley v. Van Winkle, 6 Cal. 605; Wood, Landl. & Ten. p. 145, § 65. Neither do the rules which govern conveyances of real property apply to assignments of estates for years. A term for years is only personal property,—a chattel real. "An estate for life, even if it be per autre vie, is a freehold; but an estate for a thousand years is only a chattel, and reckoned part of the personal estate." 2 Bl. Comm. p. 143. See, also, pages 385-387. "All leases for years are held by law to be of less value, perhaps it would be more proper to say of less dignity, than estates for life; estates for life being freeholds, and for years but chattels, and regarded as part of the personal estate, and cast upon the executor." 1 Wood, Landl. & Ten. p. 143; see, also, page 149, § 73. Under the common law leasehold estates of the wife went to the husband as personal property. Id. p. 223. In the Revised Statutes of New York there was a provision that "no covenant shall be implied in any conveyance of real estate, whether such conveyance contain special provisions or not" (1 Rev. St. p. 738, § 140); and the court of appeals of that state held that the language did not include a term for years, because it is not real estate, and that in a grant of such term there is an implied covenant of quiet enjoyment, not only against the grantor, but against others claiming by lawful title. Mayor, etc., v. Mabie, 13 N. Y. 151. The court there say: "Terms for years fall within the definition of personal property. They go to the executors like other chattels, and although they are denominated chattels real, to distinguish them from mere movables, they are not, when speaking with legal accuracy, considered real estate." The common law upon the subject has not been changed by our statutes. The provision of section 1113 of the Civil Code that only certain enumerated covenants shall be implied in transfers of property is expressly limited to a conveyance by which "an estate of inheritance or fee simple is to be passed"; and by section 765 the common-law distinction between freehold estates and estates for years is followed, and it is declared that "estates for years are chattels real." The same distinction is to be found in section 14, and in sections 657-663 of the same Code. There is a marked difference between things real, and an interest or estate in things real. "The nature of the thing itself, therefore, does not determine the character of any particular estate that may exist in it, whether personal or real, but the extent and duration of the estate." 2 Cooley, Bl. p. 15, note 1.

An assignment of a term for years is therefore governed generally by the rules applicable to the sale of personal property, and on such sale, while as to the quality of the thing sold caveat emptor is the general rule, the seller impliedly warrants the title. Civ. Code, § 1765; 2 Bl. Comm. p. 451; Benj. Sales, p. 631; 1 Pars. Cont. (8th Ed.) p. 573 et seq. And the rule does not depend upon the knowledge, or want of knowledge, of the vendor as to the real state of the title, or upon deceit or fraud practiced by him. Parsons correctly states the rule as follows: "In this country it is now well settled by adjudications in many of the states that the seller of a chattel, if in the possession, warrants by implication that it is his own, and is answerable to the purchaser of it if taken from him by one who has a better title than the seller, whether the seller knew the defect of his title or not, and whether he did or did not make a distinct affirmation of his title." Pars. Cont. p. 574. In the case at bar appellants were in possession, but our Code does not except a seller out of possession, and provides, generally, that "one who sells, or agrees to sell, personal property as his own thereby warrants that he has a good and unincumbered title thereto." Civ. Code, § 1765. In Souter v. Drake, 5 Barn. & Adol. 992, the rule was expressly applied to the sale of a lease, and it was held that in a contract for such sale there is "an implied undertaking to make out the lessor's title to demise, as well as that of the vendor to the lease itself, which implied undertaking is available at law as well as in equity." To the same effect is Farrer v. Nightingal, 2 Esp. 639.

The court below therefore correctly held that the consideration for respondent's promise to pay the monthly installments sued on as purchase money for the term of years had failed, and that therefore appellant had no cause of action. The total breach of a warranty of title—either express, as in case of a sale of real estate, or implied, as in case of a sale of chattels—makes a good cause of action for the purchaser to recover the purchase money if he had paid it, and a good defense against an action by the seller to recover such purchase money. Benj. Sales, pp. 908, 909, and cases cited. In Frisbie v. Hoffnagle, 11 Johns. 50, which was an action to recover the purchase money for land conveyed to the purchaser with an express warranty of title, a nonsuit was sustained, the court saying: "The consideration for the note has therefore failed, for the defendant has no title, it having been extinguished by the sale under the judgment." That case is also pertinent to another point made in the case at bar, viz. that the respondent did not suffer an actual eviction; for the court there say: "Here is a total, not a partial, failure of consideration; for, although the defendant has not yet been evicted by the purchaser under the sheriff, he is liable to be so, and will be responsible for the mesne profits."

One who has received possession of property, either on a sale or any other kind of contract, from a person who has no title to it, may yield it to the true owner on his demand, without waiting for the latter to take it forcibly or by legal proceeding; although, if he do so, he takes upon himself the burden of proving that he to whom he thus yields possession had the paramount title. This principle was quite fully discussed by Mr. Justice Thorton when delivering the opinion of the court in Palmtag v. Doutrick, 59 Cal. 154. That case arose upon a bailment, where the bailor had no right to the property bailed, and the bailee delivered it to the true owner; but, as to the principle there invoked, there is no difference between the relation of bailor and bailee and that of a seller and purchaser. The doctrine of jus tertii applies equally to both. There was also some fraud in that case; but the court quotes approvingly from an English case, in which it is said: "The position of the bailee is precisely the same whether his bailor was honestly mistaken as to the rights of the third person, or fraudulently acting in derogation of them. We think that the true ground on which a bailee may set up the jus tertii is that indicated in Shelbury v. Scotsford, Yel. 23, viz. that the estoppel ceases when the bailment on which it is founded is determined by what is equivalent to eviction by title paramount." The above language which we have italicized shows the principle upon which, in cases like the one here at bar, a party in the possession of property is not estopped from denying the title thereto of the person from whom he received it, and may yield it to a demand of the true owner which he could not legally resist. Justice Thornton refers to Hayden v. Davis, 9 Cal. 573, where the doctrine was applied to the case of a common carrier delivering property to the true owner instead of the consignor, and quotes from King v. Richards, 6 Whart. 418, where the court say: "If the bailee in such a case receives the goods from the bailor innocently, under the impression made by the bailor that he is the owner thereof, or has the right to dispose of them in the manner he is doing, and therefore promises to return the goods to the bailor, it is very obvious that such a promise ought not to be regarded as binding, because obtained through a false impression made willfully by the bailor; and truth, which lies at the foundation of justice, as well as all moral excellence, would seem to require in every such case that the goods should be delivered to the true owner, especially if he demand the same, instead of the wrongful bailor." In that, as in some other cases, there was fraudulent misrepresentation; but, as we have seen, the rule is the same whether the person undertaking to dispose of the property "was honestly mistaken as to the rights of third persons or fraudulently acting in derogation of them." Justice Thornton illustrates the principle by reference to the general relation of landlord and tenant,—a relation certainly as favorable to appellants' contention in the case at bar as that of seller and purchaser,—as follows: "As to eviction of tenant by title paramount, referred to in some of the cases above cited, * * * the rule is thus stated by Wilde, J.: 'If the lessee is disturbed in his occupation by a party having a title paramount to that of his lessor, so that he cannot legally continue his occupation under the lessor without rendering himself liable to the other party, he may yield the possession, and take a new lease under him, or he may abandon the possession; and, in either case, he will thereafter not be liable to pay rent to the original lessor. Such an entry and disturbance are equivalent to an ouster.' 6 Rob. Pr. 364."

In view of the principles above stated, the court below was right in holding that the consideration for the promise to pay the purchase money sought to be recovered in this action had failed, and that judgment should go for respondents. The judgment is not only legally correct, but is also in accordance with general principles of justice. The opposite view would compel respondent to pay, not only the $3,150 demanded in this action, but $275 for each and every month down to January, 1896, for nothing. Appellants have lost nothing. They would have been forced to yield possession to the holders of the paramount title if they had never made the assignment to respondent. We have been considering only the $275 per month to be paid by respondent as purchase money for the assignment. Of course, appellants could not, under any view, recover the $175 per month named in the lease, for there is no pretense that they have paid it. Neither can they ever be legally called upon to pay it, for the lessor is dead, and his legal representatives and successors in interest have repudiated the lease.

Although the briefs of counsel are quite voluminous, there are no other matters necessary to be discussed. It is proper to say, however, that we have considered appellants' points,—that the title of Mrs. Hyde has been extinguished by failure to perform conditions mentioned in the deed to her, and that George Hyde had authority to make the lease for eight years and six months and to extend it for another year,—and that, in our opinion, neither of said points is tenable. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

J. L. MOTT IRON WORKS v. WEST COAST PLUMBING SUPPLY CO.

(S. F. No. 172.)[1]

APPEAL—REVIEW—EVIDENCE—VACATING JUDGMENT.

1. The denial of a motion to set aside a default judgment against a corporation, based on the assertion that defendant had not been served with summons, and depending on the question whether the person to whom summons was delivered was its president, will not be disturbed; the only evidence that he was not president being his affidavit that he had previously resigned, and there being evidence of statements of his to the contrary, and evidence that no one else was elected president, and that, after the time when he claimed to have resigned, he was acting for the corporation as usual, and indorsing notes, made to the corporation, as its president.

2. The question whether a corporation had a defense to a claim on which a default judgment was rendered against it will not be considered on appeal from an order denying a motion to set aside the judgment, the motion being based on the ground that the person on whom summons was served was not an officer of the corporation, and there being evidence to sustain a finding that he was president.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by the J. L. Mott Iron Works against the West Coast Plumbing Supply Company. From an order denying a motion to set aside a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Alexander G. Eells, for appellant. Thornton & Merzbach, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. Each of the parties is a corporation. The action is for the recovery of the possession of certain personal property, or its value; and judgment by default was rendered for plaintiff. Afterwards defendant made a motion for an order vacating and setting aside the judgment, and the default upon which it was entered, upon the ground that the court had never acquired jurisdiction of said defendant. The court denied the motion, and from the order denying it the defendant appeals.

The motion appealed from was not made upon the ground that the judgment was taken against appellant through its excusable neglect, etc., from which it might be relieved under section 473, Code Civ. Proc.; but it was based upon the alleged fact that there had never been any service of summons upon appellant, and that, therefore, there was no jurisdiction in the court to render the judgment. The action was commenced on October 30, 1893; and proof was regularly made that service of the summons was duly made on the appellant at San Francisco, Cal., on December 20, 1893, by delivering a copy thereof, together with a copy of the complaint, to Fletcher F. Ryer, who was then and there president of said defendant corporation. But appellant claims that at said time Ryer was not its president or officer of any kind. The question whether or not said Ryer was president of appellant was one of fact for the court below. The court found that he was such president; and, unless the evidence on the issue was so one-sided against such finding as to show an abuse of discretion, we cannot disturb its conclusion. The case of appellant on this point rests entirely upon two affidavits, made by said Ryer, which were used on the hearing of the motion. In one of these affidavits he stated that on December 20, 1893 (the date of the service), and on October 30, 1893 (the date of the commencement of the action), and on April 17, 1893, he was not president or other officer or director of the appellant, "and had not been for many months prior to said April 17, 1893." In his other affidavit he stated that he "was up to August, 1892, the president of said defendant, at which time he resigned, and since which time he has not been connected with the defendant as president or other officer, or otherwise." But, in contradiction of his affidavits, the plaintiff introduced certain testimony which he gave in December, 1894, in another case, in which he made an explanation of his asserted resignation as president in August, 1892, as follows: "Mr. Freidenrich: Q. How did you resign? Tell us just what you did. A. My impression is that I sent in a written resignation. Q. Sent it in where? A. I directed it to the board of trustees of the West Coast Plumbing Supply Company, and I probably put it on the desk there. I don't know. Q. Were you present at any meeting of the board at which this resignation was presented? A. No, sir. Q. Did you do anything more than write out a resignation, and leave it on the desk? A. Not that I recollect; no, sir. Q. That is all you did? A. So far as I can remember. Q. To whom did you deliver the resignation? A. I don't remember. Q. Did you deliver it to any one? A. I don't remember. I said I don't remember positively whether I had written a written resignation or not; but that is my impression. Q. Then you don't state positively that you ever wrote a resignation? A. No, I am not positive about it. Q. Will you state positively that you ever handed any person a written resignation? A. No, sir." It also appeared that the appellant moved its place of business in 1883 from 657 Market to First street, and that he moved with it. It further appeared from the affidavits of witnesses for the respondent that until late in 1893, when they had their last business with the appellant, Ryer was acting for appellant as usual and, as they understood it, as president. It further appeared that as late as September 12 and 18, 1893, promissory notes made to the appellant were indorsed by Ryer as president. These facts are entirely inconsistent with his statement that he resigned as president in August, 1892, even supposing that the facts testified to by him constituted a resignation. There is no pretense that any other president was ever elected. It is said that Ryer's declarations could not bind or estop appellant. That is quite true; but they were admissible evidence to contradict the statements in the affidavits of Ryer, who was the only witness introduced by appellant on this point. It is a significant circumstance that the appellant did not introduce any record of the proceedings of the corporation to show any proceedings taken upon the alleged resignation of Ryer; and it is still more significant that no other officer, stockholder, or member of the corporation appellant appeared to deny in any form that Ryer was president at the time of the service. Under these circumstances, we cannot say that the evidence as to proper service was not, to say the least, substantially conflicting. And in such a state of the evidence the conclusion of the court below cannot, upon well-established rules, be disturbed.

[1] Rehearing denied.

We need not examine the point, based on the affidavit of C. S. Arnold, that the cause of action set forth in the complaint had been settled and paid by a certain promissory note. Whether the facts stated in Arnold's affidavit would have constituted a defense to the action if appellant had appeared and set them up, is not a question now before us. The position taken by appellant on this appeal is that the court had no jurisdiction to render any judgment whatever in the case. The case of Norton v. Railroad Co., 97 Cal. 388, 30 Pac. 585, and 32 Pac. 452, is not in point. In that case the court below found that Wade, upon whom the service was made, was not the general managing agent of the corporation defendant; and we there said that "the evidence before the lower court was conflicting, and we would not be warranted in disturbing the finding of the lower court as to that fact." The order appealed from is affirmed.

BENNETT et al. v. DAVIS et al. (S. F. 298.)

MECHANIC'S LIEN—MATERIAL MEN—SETTING UP AND COMPLETING FIREPLACE.

One who agrees to furnish certain mantels, tiles, and grates, and the appurtenances thereof, and to deliver and set them in position, is a material man, and not an original contractor.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Mary Bennett and John H. Schutte against Charles A. Davis and others to foreclose a mechanic's lien. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Chas. S. Perry and Gale & Perry, for appellants. Vogelsang & Brown, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. This is an action for the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien. In the complaint it is averred that plaintiffs contracted and agreed with defendants "to furnish, in the addition to, and in the alteration of, the certain building heretofore erected on said premises by said Davis, certain materials, to wit, certain mantels, tiles, and grates, and the appurtenances thereof, and also the labor required in the addition of the same to, and the erection of the same in, said building, as a part thereof," etc. The mantels and other materials were furnished and were erected in the house of defendant Davis, and the only question presented here is whether plaintiffs, in the purview of the mechanic's lien law, are material men or original contractors. As the court found in favor of the lien, the inquiry resolves itself into this: Is there evidence upon which the conclusion can be sustained? One was a wooden mantel, and the other what the witness called a "tiling mantel." Schutte testified that a tiling mantel is composed of numerous parts, from 150 to 10,000. "The tiling is placed in the building by attaching it to the brickwork and to the chimney. It is not nailed. It is a material part of the chimney,—an integral part of the chimney itself. It is attached to the brickwork surrounding the mantelpiece. We cement it to the brickwork. It is put there permanently, and not for temporary use. They are part of the mantel proper, as much as a door is to a house." He further said that the contract was to furnish the materials and the labor necessary to put them up. They kept the mantels in their store for sale, put together as they would appear when finally put up. The brickwork was done by the contractor, but they set up the mantels, built the fireplaces, and inclosed them. They agreed upon the price of the mantels with the regular grate set up.

The question is somewhat similar to that which sometimes arises under the statute of frauds, the precise issue being whether a contract is one of sale or for the manufacture of goods. Numerous decisions have been rendered in such cases, and, so far as I know, no rule universally applicable has been formulated. The cases seem generally to turn upon the relative value of the work and goods, or how far the article was modified by the work. In Bates v. Coster, 1 Hun, 400, it was said that "when the article existed in its entirety, but something is to be done to fit it for use, it is a sale." In Flint v. Corbitt, 6 Daly, 429, it was said: "When an article is exposed for sale in an unfinished state, that the finish may be done to suit a customer, it is a sale, and not a manufacture." In Fitzsimmons v. Woodruff, 1 Thomp. & C. 3, a marble mantel was sold to be set up. It was held that putting it up was a part of the delivery. In Cooke v. Millard, 65 N. Y. 353, in relation to mechanics' liens the criterion is said to be whether the work is simply done on the materials to complete a delivery of them in a finished condition, the cost of the labor being included in the price of the things sold. It must be confessed that no satisfactory rule can be deduced from these cases. Each seems to assume the question at issue. The main consideration, after all, is whether the labor bestowed upon the article was merely trifling in comparison to the price. The same thing appears in the two cases decided by this court, one of which is relied upon by the appellants, and the other by the respondents. Hinckley v. Cracker Co., 91 Cal. 136, 27 Pac. 594, was a case where plaintiff contracted to furnish "and to deliver and put in place, upon foundations prepared by said Arthur Field in said structure, building, and factory, a steam plant, consisting of boilers, engine, heater, feed pipes," etc. Plaintiff was held to be a material man only, and it was said: "The work done by them on the premises of defendants, in placing them in position, was only the completion of their contract to deliver such finished machinery, and did not convert them into contractors for the erection of the factory, or any part of it, within the true intent of the statute." In La Grill v. Mallard, 90 Cal. 373, 27 Pac. 294, it was held that a person who contracts to paper and decorate several rooms in a building and furnishes the material, is an original contractor. I see little difference in the cases save in the relative amounts of material and labor. In the last case the contract was to decorate as well as to hang paper, and, further, the defendant promised to pay for the labor in decorating the building. The material used in decorating a room may be very trifling in comparison to the labor. The main point discussed in La Grill v. Mallard was whether an implied contract to pay was such a contract as is specified in the mechanic's lien law. The labor required to place the engines and machinery in proper position in the case of Hinckley v. Cracker Co., was evidently much greater than the labor performed in La Grill v. Mallard, but, relatively to the material furnished, it was much less. In the one case the material was not only the principal thing, but, compared to it, the work was trifling. In the other the work was the important matter. One of the defendants testified that some tile mantels are composed of more than 10,000 pieces, and that it sometimes requires two days to put one up. He did not say that it required two days or two hours to put up the one in question. Even had it taken two days, the labor would still have been comparatively trifling. I think the case directly within the decision of Hinckley v. Cracker Co., and therefore the judgment and order are reversed.

VON ARX v. SAN FRANCISCO GRUETLI VEREIN. (S. F. No. 148.)[1]

VOLUNTARY BENEFIT ASSOCIATION—EXPULSION OF MEMBERS—NOTICE AND OPPORTUNITY FOR DEFENSE.

Where no provision is made in the constitution or by-laws of a voluntary benefit association for a mode of procedure in expelling members for nonpayment of dues, or for notice and opportunity to be heard, mandamus will lie for the reinstatement of a member expelled without reasonable notice of the proceedings which resulted in his expulsion, and a fair opportunity of presenting his defense.

[1] Rehearing denied.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawells, Judge.

Mandamus by Joseph Von Arx to compel the San Francisco Gruetli Verein to restore plaintiff to his rights as member of defendant's society. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Shadburne & Herrin, for appellant. Clitus Barbour, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by the Gruetli Verein from a judgment of the superior court in a mandamus proceeding, by which appellant was commanded to restore the respondent, Von Arx, to all the rights, etc., of a member of said appellant; and also from an order denying a new trial. The Gruetli Verein is a society organized for intellectual intercourse and mutual aid and benevolence. The respondent was for many years prior to December 5, 1893, a member in good standing of said appellant, but on said last-named day he was expelled, and he brought this proceeding to be reinstated. It is perhaps unfortunate that the general law takes notice of the rights of persons as members of voluntary associations organized for such purposes as those contemplated by the appellant herein. It would perhaps be better if a person joining such a society should be forced to look alone to the society itself for the protection of his rights as a member of it. But our Code recognizes such associations, and courts have felt compelled to listen, reluctantly, to complaints of their members in certain cases. This is particularly so where, as in the case at bar, ordinary property rights are involved. The appellant, in its character as a mutual aid society, has a fund of $15,000. It maintains sick members at the rate of $10 each per week, and it insures the life of each member to the extent of $300. The respondent has contributed $1,000 to the resources of the association. We do not deem it necessary to discuss at any length the cases in which courts will listen to complaints of members of such associations, or the principles by which courts in such cases will be governed. They can be found in the text-books upon the subject, and are quite fully stated in the opinion of Searls, C. J., in Otto v. Benevolent Union, 75 Cal. 308, 17 Pac. 217. Where the society has by-laws, not unreasonable in their character, which are applicable to the difficulty out of which the litigation arises, and the asserted rights of the parties have been determined by the society in accordance with such by-laws, a court will not ordinarily interfere. But, where there are no such by-laws, a court will inquire whether or not an expelled member has had a reasonable notice of the proceeding which resulted in his expulsion, and a fair opportunity of presenting his defense in accordance with general principles of law and justice.

It is not necessary to notice the full findings of the court, all of which, we think, are supported by the evidence, nor to give here a full statement of the facts in the case. It is only necessary to notice the findings and facts which show the theory upon which the case was decided by the court below.

A committee of 15 of the appellant, which is composed of Swiss people, issued a circular letter to kindred societies, suggesting a federation of all the Swiss societies of the Pacific coast. This letter was sent to a society called the "Helvetia Verein," of which respondent was also a member. The latter society, through a committee of 8, of which respondent was a member, sent a reply to the appellant, declining the proposition of said circular letter. This reply was referred by appellant to the same committee of 15 who had issued the circular letter. This committee considered that said reply contained objectionable matter, and so reported to a meeting of the appellant held on November 7, 1893. Of the committee of 8 of the Helvetia Verein who signed said reply, there were 4 others besides respondent who were also members of appellant; and in the report of the said committee of 15 to appellant, on said November 7th, it was recommended "that judicial proceedings be instituted against the five signers" of said reply of the Helvetia Verein, "upon the grounds of undermining the best interests of the society, and, if found guilty, to punish them according to our constitution." Respondent and the other 4 were present, and there was a "heated discussion of the circulars, in which plaintiff [respondent here] participated." After a good deal of wrangling, the president ordered respondent and the other 4 to leave the room, which they did; and, after they had left, a motion was made, and carried by a two-thirds majority, that respondent be fined in the sum of $20, and that he be given until the 1st day of December, 1893, to pay the same. On December 5th, said fine not having been paid, the financial secretary of appellant reported that the respondent owed the society more than $12, and he was expelled. He did not owe $12, nor more than $1, exclusive of said fine. Before his expulsion, "plaintiff [respondent here] delivered to defendant [appellant here], and defendant received from plaintiff, a protest against its threatened action, and a demand for a hearing upon any accusation that might be made against him. The defendant ignored said protest, and denied said demand." The constitution and by-laws provide that "a member owing more than $12 to the society, who, in spite of repeated warnings, neglects to pay, is to be expelled"; but the court found that "no provision is made in such constitution or by-laws for a mode of procedure in imposing fines or expelling members for misconduct or nonpayment of dues, or for specific charges to be served on them, or for notice of time or place of trial, or for time or opportunity to prepare for or make their defense to any accusations that may be made against them," etc. The court further found that "plaintiff was never informed or given to understand, and did not understand, at or before the time when he was excluded from the room as aforesaid, that any charges had been preferred against him, and plaintiff did not, at said meeting, defend himself against said charges, or against any charges." On December 9, 1893, respondent offered to pay to the financial secretary of appellant all dues from him to appellant, and demanded that his name be replaced on the list of members; and on December 19, 1893, at a regular meeting of appellant, respondent delivered to it his demand to be restored to membership, but appellant wholly neglected and refused to comply with said demand.

We cannot see that, upon the foregoing facts, the court erred in holding that respondent had been unlawfully expelled. The proceedings which resulted in his expulsion were not in accordance with any procedure established by the constitution or by-laws of appellant; and the court was justified in concluding that they were, in the language used in the Otto Case, "lacking in the essential elements of fairness, good faith, and candor, which should characterize the action of men in passing upon the rights of their fellow men." The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

HARNEY v. BENSON. (S. F. 87.)[1]

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — CONSTRUCTION OF SEWER—ASSESSMENT OF COST.

1. The fact that the power of a board to order and construct a sewer was unwisely exercised, and the sewer was at the time of its completion impossible of use, does not affect the validity of the proceedings, nor relieve a property owner of liability to pay a tax therefor.

2. Where the action of a municipal body in ordering and contracting for the construction of a sewer is within its powers, a property owner who does not protest and follow the special remedies given by statute cannot be relieved by the courts of the tax levied therefor.

3. An assessment of the cost of a sewer made in accordance with the statute is not illegal because based on an estimate of benefits in which the frontage of lots on the street in which the sewer was built, and also on lateral streets, were both taken into account; and it will not be reviewed except for want of jurisdiction, where no appeal was taken.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Action by Daniel Harney against John Benson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edward J. Pringle, for appellant. D. H. Whittemore, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is a street-assessment case, and the appeal is from the judgment, and was taken within 60 days after its rendition. The charge is for the construction of a trunk or main sewer on Fourteenth avenue. In the resolution of intention it was declared that the work was of more than local or ordinary benefit, and the expense was made a charge upon a district which was defined by and in the resolution. On October 20, 1890, the board had adopted plans for the sewerage of that locality, and had made a map of a system of sewers, of which the sewer in question constituted a part. The scheme contemplated a drain to the Pacific Ocean through the Presidio, and it was found, and is admitted, that the board had no power to lay out streets or to construct sewers through the Presidio reservation. The resolution of intention was passed November 19, 1890, and the work ordered constitutes but a small part of the system which had been adopted. The portion let had no outlet, and the plan of which it is a part cannot be completed. By that method the city cannot furnish an outlet. It was open to the board, however, to adopt other plans, and at the time of the trial it was shown that the plans had been changed, and contracts actually let, which, when completed, would furnish an outlet for this sewer. In the specifications and contract it was provided that connections should not be made with the sewer until there was an outlet. The sewer was still unused at the time of the trial, some four years after the completion of the work. It is charged that the supervisors well knew that the work would be of no value to the property in the district, and that there was fraudulent collusion between the board and the contractor. The court found, however, against all charges of fraud, and against the claim that the work had not been done according to contract.

It is contended that since the structure has no outlet, and since, as counsel claim, it is legally impossible (or was so impossible at the time the work was done) to procure an outfall, it is not a drain, and cannot be made one, and therefore is not a sewer, and the board had not the power to contract for its construction. It may have been very unwise and even reckless on the part of the board to order work done under such circumstances, but, conceding it to be so, I cannot see how that would affect their power. It is their duty to provide the means of disposing of the sewage. If there can be no outlet provided into the ocean or some other permissible place, the board must dispose of it in some other mode, and may gather it for that purpose. It is their province to determine whether sewers are needed, and what districts will be benefited thereby. Upon these points their judgment is ordinarily final. And there may have been, in the judgment of the board, other reasons why this sewer should be thus constructed, although it would not be at once utilized. The cases cited from New Jersey (State v. City of Elizabeth, 37 N. J. Law, 335, and 40 N. J. Law, 276) do not seem to me to hold that this cannot be done. In that state the law was different. The city constructed the street, and paid for it, and then reimbursed itself by an assessment upon the property benefited. It was held that, under the law, this could not be done until the streets could be used. Besides, the property owners should have protested against the work on that ground, if their complaints are well founded. As we have seen, the work was within the general power of the board, though to construct this sewer may have been an improvident use of the power. Possibly, if, as matter of law, we could see that the structure could not be useful, the conclusion of the board would not prevent the courts from giving relief. But the aggrieved owner should exhaust the special remedies provided before he applies to the court. The board could have afforded him all the relief he required. If he had protested in time, the contractor might not have expended his money and labor in the improvement of the property. Since the law provided that he should object, and he did not, he should not now be heard, unless there was a total absence of the power in the board to do the work, or the procedure has been materially departed from. A property owner should not thus sit by and see his property improved, and expect to escape the expense.

[1] Rehearing denied.

Defendant also objects to the assessment, and claims that his property is twice assessed, or that the assessment is on two inconsistent theories. The assessment is entered in the following form:

| No. | Direct Frontage. | Names of Owners. | Beneficiary Frontage. | By Whom Paid. | Amt. for Direct Frontage. | Amount for Beneficiary Frontage. | Total. |

The method is described in finding 45: "That on the 17th day of August, 1891, the said superintendent of streets estimated upon the lot and lands within said district the benefits arising from said work and received by said lots or portions of land, and thereupon assessed the same upon said lots, to wit, in the sum of $49,293, in proportion and according to the estimated benefits received by each lot; that, in so doing, he did assess said sum of $49,293 in different amounts upon the lots fronting upon the streets in which said sewer was constructed, and upon the lots within said district fronting upon streets other than those in which said sewer was constructed, and, in assessing said lots, assessed the same at different rates per front foot, deeming the lots benefited to the amounts so assessed; that said proposed assessment showed the direct frontage of said lots of the defendant upon the line of said sewers, and the rate per front foot of all of the lots fronting on the line of said sewers, and a beneficiary rate of assessment for each foot fronting within said district, and the total sum so assessed on each lot, and the amount of the direct and beneficial frontage assessment, and that such assessment is not invalid or void; that such assessment was made upon the lots described in the complaint as therein alleged." The averments in the complaint referred to in the finding follow the statute, and show the performance of all the acts required in making an assessment for benefits. The statute required the superintendent to estimate the benefits to each parcel of land, and then to assess upon the lots the entire expense in proportion to benefits. The judgment of the superintendent is called into action only in making the estimate of benefits. If he first made a tabulated statement of his estimates, the assessment would be a mere mathematical calculation. But, if the burden has in fact been distributed as the statute requires, the particular process by which the calculation was made is not material. It was not necessary that the superintendent should show his method. The presumption is that he has done his duty, and, if the assessment does not show that he has not followed the law, it is sufficient.

Does the assessment, then, show that the burden was not distributed as the law requires? That this may have been done, and that the assessment does not show the contrary, I think conclusively appears. The superintendent concluded that the different parcels of land would all be benefited in proportion to frontage by a main sewer. The district was in an unsettled part of the city. It does not appear that any lots had been improved, or that any holdings were otherwise than entire blocks. It does not appear that any holding had much frontage and small area, or the reverse. The superintendent had diagrams showing each parcel, and made his estimate upon the land. If there had been irregular lots, he probably would have made a different estimate of benefits. Now, the facts being as suggested (as, if necessary, we must suppose), the estimate seems a very fair one. At all events, it is a rational one; and it is not for us to say whether it is the best. If the superintendent so thought, the method does show what, in his opinion, was the relative benefit to each lot from the construction of a main sewer. But some of the lots fronted upon the avenue upon which the sewer was constructed. The superintendent thought these received a special benefit, from the fact that they were thereby saved the expense of connecting sewers, whereas on the other streets branch or lateral sewers would be required. He therefore assessed against those lots what he thought it would cost to build sewers. For such sewers they would have been assessed per front foot. Upon this theory, each of these lots would be benefited according to their frontage, and it was so calculated. If the superintendent believed that this method did show the relative benefits to the different parcels, he would have used these precise calculations had he made a tabulated statement of relative benefits. Can we say that the assessment shows two assessments, or an illegal method, because it shows how he reached his conclusion? I think not. I think, also, that, if the method was wrong, the defendant should have appealed to the board. They could have afforded any relief to which he was entitled. He was not in the position of a defendant in an ordinary suit upon whom a summons had been served, but who makes default. In such case the judgment must be warranted by the notice contained in the summons. The defendant is not supposed to be in court, but to have consented to the relief demanded. In such a proceeding as this a property owner is not expected to appear by counsel, but he is supposed to be aware of the steps taken, and is authorized and required to make known his grievances. Unless he does so, he is precluded, unless the board is wholly without jurisdiction, or the procedure has been departed from in some vital matter. The judgment is affirmed.

PAINTER v. PAINTER et al. (S. F. 100.)[1]

APPEAL—REVIEW—EVIDENCE—WILLS—RIGHTS OF POSTHUMOUS CHILD—COMMUNITY PROPERTY —RIGHTS OF WIFE AND LEGATEE.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 939, provides that an exception to a decision as not supported by the evidence cannot be reviewed on appeal unless the appeal is taken within 60 days after the rendition of the judgment. Held, that the "rendition of the judgment" takes place when findings are filed and judgment ordered, and not when the judgment is entered.

2. Under Civ. Code, § 1306, a son born after the execution of a will, and not having been provided for or mentioned therein, takes the same portion of his father's estate that he would have succeeded to if the testator had died intestate, and his right to do so will not be affected by a reference in the will to the testator's sons then living and who are specially mentioned.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Action by J. Milton Painter against Theodore P. Painter and others, to determine plaintiff's interest in partnership property devised to him, and for further relief. From the judgment entered plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. J. Pringle, for appellant. Fox, Kellogg & Gray, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. The deceased, Jerome B. Painter, was a brother of the plaintiff and also of the defendant Theodore P. Painter. At the time of his death, in February, 1883, the deceased and the defendant Theodore P. Painter were co-partners in a firm called Painter & Co., engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling printing presses, type, and other printers' materials. On March 11, 1864, the deceased made his will; and at that time plaintiff was also a co-partner in said firm, but he afterwards withdrew from the co-partnership. The firm owned a large stock of machinery, type, materials, and fixtures necessary to carry on its business, and also some real property, which was worth at the time of the death of the deceased about $6,600. The first clause of the will is as follows: "(1) I give and bequeath to my brothers, J. Milton Painter and Theodore P. Painter, all my share, right, title, and interest of and in and to the co-partnership of Painter & Co., the stock thereof, its business, good will, and all interests, of whatever nature, connected with them as partners (except real estate), debts due us, and moneys out at interest, for their own use and benefit, upon the express condition that they assume all debts standing against the concern, and pay off that certain mortgage on property, S. W. cor. of Washington and Sansome streets." The only interests or rights of plaintiff which are involved in this action are those which belong to him as legatee under said first clause of said will. These embrace only his claim to his share of the personal assets of the co-partnership. He has no proprietary interest in the real property of the firm, for he is not a partner, and by the will said real property is not devised. It appears that, down to the time of the withdrawal of plaintiff from the firm, the interest of the deceased in the co-partnership was one-half, and the interest of each of the other two one-fourth; and it does not appear whether or not his interest was increased after said withdrawal.

The averments of the complaint necessary to be noticed are, in brief, these: It is averred that the deceased in his lifetime borrowed, from time to time, large sums of money from said firm, and paid and agreed to pay interest thereon, and that, at the time of his death, on account of such borrowed money and some other items of account, he was indebted to said firm in the sum of $33,534.62. It is further averred that the share of the deceased in the personal assets of said firm are not sufficient to repay his said indebtedness; that the executors and executrix, or some of them, claim that the deceased was not indebted to said firm in any sum of money whatever; that the defendant Theodore P. Painter, as surviving partner, is engaged in liquidating the affairs of said co-partnership, and claims that it is necessary for him to sell all of the stock on hand, machinery, type, materials, fixtures, general assets, and good will of the business, in order to repay the said amount due from the deceased to said firm, and to settle the accounts of the deceased with the firm, and threatens so to do; and that, if he be permitted to do so, the legacy to plaintiff will be wholly defeated. It is further averred that plaintiff, as such legatee, is entitled to demand that the real property of said firm should be first sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of the said alleged indebtedness of the deceased to said firm, and that, after such application, the said surviving partner should recover from said executors and executrix sufficient moneys to repay any unsatisfied balance of said indebtedness.

[1] Rehearing denied.

The defendant Theodore P. Painter, executor and surviving partner, filed a short answer in which he substantially made default; but the other defendants, including the widow and children of the deceased, answered, and denied all the material averments of the complaint. They specially deny that deceased, at the time of his death, owed said firm any borrowed money, or that he was indebted to said firm for any cause in any sum of money whatever; and they deny that the share of deceased in the personal property and assets of such firm, including large amounts due it upon bills receivable, is not sufficient to pay all partnership obligations. The court found all the issues of fact in favor of defendants; and found particularly that the deceased was not indebted to said firm for borrowed money, or for any other cause, in any sum of money whatever. Judgment was rendered for defendants, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

The transcript includes a bill of exceptions which contains evidence introduced at the trial, and appellant contends that some of the findings are not sustained by the evidence; but he cannot be heard on these points because the appeal was not taken within 60 days after the rendition of the judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 939. The cause was tried in 1887, and the findings of fact and conclusions of law were made and filed on December 3, 1887, and judgment ordered for defendants, although the judgment was not entered until October 18, 1894. The notice of appeal was not given until after the entry of the judgment, to wit, on November 19, 1894, which was nearly seven years after the filing of the findings. The "rendition of the judgment," within the meaning of section 939, as has been frequently held by this court, took place when findings were filed and judgment ordered for defendants. Schurtz v. Romer, 81 Cal. 244, 22 Pac. 657, and cases there cited; Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 487, 488, 26 Pac. 1074. Therefore, as the appeal was not taken within 60 days after the rendition of the judgment, we cannot consider the evidence. Under these circumstances, the evidence could have been reviewed here only after a motion for a new trial. This makes it unnecessary to consider respondents' contention that there is no bill of exceptions here, because the proposed bill itself was not prepared and served within the time prescribed by section 650 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Looking at the judgment roll alone, we see no good reason for reversing the judgment. The plaintiff is the sole appellant, and the findings and judgment are important here only so far as they affect him and his interests. In his complaint he asks, among other things, "that a construction be made by this court of the terms of the said will making the said bequest to the plaintiff and the said Theodore P. Painter." We assume for the purposes of this decision, without closely examining or determining the question, that appellant can, in this action, have the will construed, so far as a construction thereof may determine the quantity of his interest as legatee in said partnership property. Now, upon this point the respondents aver that all the property in which the deceased had any ownership at the date of the will and at the time of his death was community property, and that he could not and did not bequeath or devise any more than his half interest in said community property, and that therefore the bequest of the said property to appellant and said Theodore did not carry the interest of the surviving wife, Caroline H. Painter, therein. It is also averred that the respondent, Eugene Painter, who is a son of the deceased and said Caroline, was born subsequently to the execution of the will (and a certain codicil thereto), and is therefore entitled, as heir, to such share of his father's estate, including the said property bequeathed to appellant, as he would have been entitled if no will had been made. If the appellant can have the will construed in this action for the purpose above stated, then these two last-mentioned averments of respondents are pertinent to that matter; and the court found in favor of both of said averments, and decreed accordingly. As to the second of these averments the court was certainly right, for Eugene, having been born after the execution of the will, and not having been provided for or mentioned therein, succeeds to the same portion of his father's estate "that he would have succeeded to if the testator had died intestate." Civ. Code, § 1306. The words in the codicil, "my sons," refer to his sons then living and who are specially named and enumerated; and they certainly do not include an after-born child, whether a son or a daughter. Neither do we see how, upon the record before us, the conclusion of the court that the will disposed of only one-half of the community property can be successfully attacked. Here there is no evidence and there are no extrinsic facts to be considered. Of course, as a legal proposition, a husband cannot, as against the wife, dispose of more than one-half of the community property; and the cases where wills undertaking to do more have been upheld have been cases which turned upon the point that the widow was put to her election either to take under the will or to stand upon her rights as surviving wife and repudiate it. No such question arises in the case at bar. We see no other question in the case which it is necessary to discuss. The judgment is affirmed.

AGENT — RELEASE OF CARRIER'S LIABILITY — EXPLOSIVES—VALIDITY OF CONTRACT.

1. A drayman employed to haul powder from one depot to another, and ship it for plaintiff to its destination, had authority to sign a shipping order conforming to Civ. Code, § 2176, releasing defendant carrier from liability for loss occasioned by fire from any cause whatsoever.

2. As it is optional with a carrier to accept or refuse powder for transportation, if it chooses to accept it, it can do so with such limitation of its common-law liability as it sees fit.

3. A contract releasing a carrier of powder from liability for fire from any cause whatsoever is not void, as unconscionable or unreasonable.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by the California Powder Works against the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company to recover the value of a car load of powder destroyed while in transit on defendant's road. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. S. Pillsbury and F. D. Madison, for appellant. C. N. Sterry and Wm. F. Herrin, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff brought its action to recover from defendant the value of a car load of blasting powder, destroyed while in transit upon defendant's railroad. The findings are not attacked. It is claimed, however, that they do not support the judgment. It is also contended that the court erred in admitting in evidence a certain shipping order.

The facts disclosed by the findings are the following: Plaintiff was a manufacturer of powder. Its factory was situated at Santa Cruz, Cal. It had for many years been in the habit of shipping its products over the line of the Southern Pacific Company, and of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, defendant herein. When the shipment was designed for a point upon the line of the defendant company, the powder was received by the agent of the Southern Pacific Company at San José, acting for the defendant company, and by this agent a shipping order was taken, and a bill of lading returned therefor. Santa Cruz, the place of manufacture of the powder, is connected with San José by a narrow-gauge railroad, owned or controlled by the Southern Pacific Company. At San José the depots of the narrow-gauge railroad and of the broad-gauge railroad (over which the powder was shipped for exportation without the state) were some distance apart. By reason of the haul upon the streets of San José from one depot to another, thus necessitated, the Southern Pacific Company declined to accept a through shipment of the powder from Santa Cruz; and, under special contract with plaintiff, the powder was shipped to San José, there transferred by an agent under the control of the plaintiff from the narrow-gauge depot to the broad-gauge station, and by this agent placed upon suitable cars provided, and shipped to its ultimate destination. "At the time of the shipment of the powder in controversy, and for several years prior thereto, the plaintiff had always employed one John McNally, who was a common drayman at San José, to haul all the powder which the plaintiff had transported to San José over the narrow-gauge railroad, and which was destined for points on the Southern Pacific or the Atlantic & Pacific, from the narrow-gauge railroad to the Southern Pacific, and to there ship it for the plaintiff to its destination; the course of business being that the secretary of the plaintiff company at San Francisco, who had charge of the shipping business of the plaintiff, would, in the case of each of said shipments, write to McNally that the shipment was made from Santa Cruz, and for him to transfer it to the broad-gauge depot, and there ship it to its point of destination, instructing him to what point and the name of the consignee, and sending him with his instructions a directed envelope within which to inclose the bill of lading, and mail it to the company at San Francisco, or to hand the envelope to the railroad agent, and have him mail it to the company." "McNally, on receiving such instructions, would receive the powder from the narrow-gauge railroad, and haul it upon his drays to the broad-gauge depot, and there load it himself into such car or cars as the Southern Pacific agent would designate, and, upon its being loaded, would fill out a shipping order upon printed blank first furnished by the agent of the Southern Pacific for such purpose. These blank forms were all exactly alike for all kinds of goods. * * * Upon delivery of such shipping order to the agent of the Southern Pacific, filled out and signed, such agent would have the property checked, and, if correct, would ship bill of lading, which would either be delivered to McNally, and by him sent to the company at San Francisco, or McNally would deliver to the agent an envelope directed to plaintiff company, and the agent would inclose bill of lading in the same, and forward it to plaintiff. Each of these methods was pursued indiscriminately. The shipping order was retained by the agent of the railroad company, and kept in his office, and neither it nor a copy of it would be delivered to the agent or McNally, but would always be signed in the name of the plaintiff by McNally." For several years previous to the shipment in question, plaintiff had shipped over the Southern Pacific in this manner a great deal of powder, on an average from one to two or more car loads per month. The defendant never in any way objected to taking the powder, on the ground that it was a dangerous article, and that it was not bound to carry it; nor did the defendant at any time, in any way, declare to plaintiff or to the said drayman that it would take the powder only as a private carrier. It required McNally in each instance to sign the shipping order. The plaintiff, in the case of each of said shipments, would advise McNally of the same, and direct him where to ship the powder; and the secretary would, in due course of time, receive the bill of lading. None of the officers of plaintiff's company ever authorized McNally to sign any shipping orders, or ever had any actual knowledge of the fact that he was signing such orders, nor had it actual knowledge that the defendant ever claimed that there was any different contract between them than that contained and expressed in the bill of lading. The conditions in the bill of lading are identical with those of the shipping order. Defendant's agent at San José had no authority to receive the goods, except upon the signing of such a shipping order, and such agent would not have received or accepted the goods unless such a shipping order was delivered to him, properly signed. There was during all of the time but one rate on powder, and no one could have procured the shipment of any powder over either of said railroads without such shipping order signed, and such bill of lading issued; the agents of both companies being furnished with but one form of shipping order and one form of bill of lading for all goods and merchandise, and having no authority to receive goods for shipment on any other terms.

The preceding quotations are from the findings, which are not attacked. The powder in question was shipped in the manner indicated. It exploded while in transit, in the territory of Arizona, entirely destroyed the car in which it was placed, partially destroyed two other cars and their contents, and killed two men upon the train. The immediate cause of the explosion is unknown, but it is found that the defendant was not guilty of any negligence or misbehavior in the matter.

The views which we take, and which will hereafter be expressed, render unnecessary the consideration of many questions ably and elaborately presented by respective counsel. They will be passed by, not as being unimportant, but as being unnecessary to this determination. Thus, we will not consider whether the bill of lading issued by the defendant to plaintiff, and by the plaintiff retained without protest, constitutes a unilateral contract, binding upon plaintiff. Nor will we consider the question whether section 2176 of the Civil Code, defining the mode in which common carriers' liability may be limited, is or is not applicable to contracts with defendant, or is or is not applicable to any contract not wholly to be performed within the state as being an unwarranted and illegal interference with and restriction upon the exclusive right of congress to regulate interstate commerce; for we are of the opinion that the shipping order signed in the name of the plaintiff by McNally as its agent was a contract within the scope of his authority to make, and therefore binding upon the plaintiff. This order conformed to the requirements of section 2176 of our Code; and, as it released the defendant corporation from liability for loss occasioned by "fire from any cause whatsoever," its admission in evidence was proper, and its proof relieved the defendant of liability.

The finding of the court, as above quoted, is to the effect that McNally was the authorized agent of plaintiff, not merely to haul the powder as a common drayman, but "to ship it for the plaintiff to its destination." The circumstance that he was in fact a common drayman, and that defendant's agent knew him to be such, does not militate against the force of this declaration. There was nothing inconsistent in the agency to haul as a drayman with the agency to ship as representative of the consignor. Any competent person, regardless of his profession or business vocation, might have been employed by plaintiff to ship for it. There is here no question of ostensible agency, or of a failure of defendant to make due inquiry as to the scope of the powers of the agent. The finding expressly declares that McNally was employed to ship. Having this power, he was entitled to make a special contract of shipment, as was done in this case. An agent who is employed by the owner or consignor of goods to procure them to be transported by a common carrier has a general and implied authority to make an agreement with the carrier as to the terms upon which the goods are to be transported. Christenson v. Express Co., 15 Minn. 270 (Gil. 208); New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. 344; Nelson v. Railroad Co., 48 N. Y. 498; Zimmer v. Railroad Co. (N. Y. App.) 33 N. E. 642; Van Schaack v. Transportation Co., 3 Biss. 394, Fed. Cas. No. 16,876; Aldridge v. Railway Co., 15 C. B. (N. S.) 582; Jennings v. Railway Co., 127 N. Y. 438, 28 N. E. 394; Railroad Co. v. Jonte, 13 Ill. App. 424; Squire v. Railroad Co., 98 Mass. 239; Hutch. Carr. § 265; Wheeler, Carr. c. 13, § 2.

Nor are the exemptions contained in the contract of the shipping order void for lack of consideration. The defendant was not obliged to receive and transport the powder at all. A common carrier is not bound to receive goods which are so defectively packed that their condition will entail upon the company extra care and extra risk; nor dangerous articles as nitroglycerin, dynamite, gunpowder, aquafortis, oil of vitriol, matches, etc. 3 Wood, Ry. Law, § 426; Hutch. Carr. § 113; 2 Rorer, R. R. § 1231; Pfister v. Railroad Co., 70 Cal. 169, 11 Pac. 686; Railroad Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357; Railroad Co. v. Perkins, 25 Mich. 329. It was thus optional with the defendant to accept the powder for transportation or not; but, if it chose to accept it, it could accept it upon such terms and with such limitation of its common-law liability as it saw fit. Piedmont Manuf'g Co. v. Columbia & G. R. Co., 19 S. C. 353. And, from the nature of the goods, the consideration expressed was sufficient to support the entire contract. York Co. v. Central Railroad, 3 Wall. 107.

The term of exemption releasing the carrier from liability for fire from any cause whatsoever will not be held void, as unconscionable or unreasonable. It is well settled that a common carrier may not relieve itself from any liability imposed upon it by law under the dictates of public policy; but, upon the other hand, upon any question of private right, or the right of private property, it may, for a consideration, lessen the degree of responsibility which attaches to it as an insurer, by any contract not in itself unreasonable. Any one may waive the advantage of a law intended solely for his own benefit, but a law established for a public reason cannot be contravened by private agreement. Civ. Code, § 3513. If necessary, the condition above referred to would be construed as an exemption from liability by fire occasioned by any cause, other than that of defendant's negligence. Hooper v. Wells, Fargo & Co., 27 Cal. 12; New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. 344; Bank of Kentucky v. Adams Exp. Co., 93 U. S. 174; Wells v. Navigation Co., 8 N. Y. 375.

The conclusion having been thus reached that the contract of the shipping order made by plaintiff's agent McNally was authorized, that it was based upon a consideration, and that its terms were reasonable, the other considerations urged, as above stated, are rendered unnecessary of determination. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

DALY v. HINZ. (S. F. 149.)

NEGLIGENCE—FAST DRIVING—INJURY TO CHILD ON STREET—NEGLIGENCE OF PARENTS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. In an action for injuries to a child run over by defendant's buggy, where the evidence was clear as to defendant's negligence, the burden of proving contributory negligence on the part of the parents in allowing it to go out on the street rests on defendant, if contributory negligence does not appear from plaintiff's evidence.

2. Evidence that defendant, while intoxicated, was driving at a reckless speed along a street, where plaintiff, a child of seven years, was playing, and that the child was run over, is sufficient to support a verdict for plaintiff, where the only evidence of negligence on the part of the child's parents was in allowing him to go out on the street.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by James Daly, an infant, by guardian, against Adolph F. Hinz, for damages for personal injuries. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Eugene F. Bert, for appellant. M. C. Hassett, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries. At the time of the injuries plaintiff, then about seven years of age, was upon a public street in the city of San Francisco, and was playing tag with his sister and another girl, each of the age of about eleven years. They were in front of the house where plaintiff and his parents resided. Defendant was driving a horse attached to a buggy, which passed over the plaintiff, breaking his left thigh bone and otherwise injuring him. Plaintiff had been going to school for about a year, at some distance from his home, crossing two railroad tracks in going and returning. He generally went alone in the morning. Sometimes little girls would be with him coming home. On these occasions he always safely took care of himself. The cause was tried with a jury. At the close of plaintiff's evidence in chief the defendant moved for a nonsuit on the ground of contributory negligence of the child's parents in allowing him to go upon the street without any person exercising proper care or control over him. The court denied the motion. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff, awarding him $1,000. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and he appeals from the judgment and from the order refusing a new trial.

There is no question that the evidence tended to prove negligence on the part of the defendant. Therefore, the burden of proving contributory negligence of the parents of the child devolved upon the defendant, unless it had been made to appear by the evidence for plaintiff. But there was no evidence of negligence of the parents, except the facts above stated. In the case of Schierhold v. Railroad Co., 40 Cal. 447, the court, speaking of the negligence of parents in a case like this, said: "The fact of negligence is generally an inference from many facts and circumstances, all of which it is the province of the jury to find. It can very seldom happen that the question is so clear from doubt that the court can undertake to say, as matter of law, that the jury could not fairly and honestly find for the plaintiff. It is not the duty of the court in such cases, any more than in any other, to usurp the province of the jury and pass upon the facts. And the nonsuit should only be granted in such cases where the evidence of the misconduct on the part of the injured party is so clear and irresistible as to put the case on a par with those cases where a nonsuit is granted for a failure to introduce evidence sufficient to go to the jury upon some point essential to the plaintiff's case. * * *

The question whether there was negligence on the part of the parents of the child in allowing him to be in the streets unattended ought to have been submitted to the jury. This depended, not only upon his age, but his intelligence and physical ability, and we cannot say, as matter of law, there was negligence in this particular case." In Huerzeler v. Railroad Co., 139 N. Y. 494, 34 N. E. 1101, the court held: "It was not negligence, as matter of law, for the mother of a child a little over five years of age to permit her to be in the street." That was a question of fact for the jury to determine. See, also, Kline v. Railroad Co., 37 Cal. 400; Meeks v. Railroad Co., 52 Cal. 602; McQuilken v. Railroad Co., 64 Cal. 464, 2 Pac. 46; Higgins v. Deeney, 78 Cal. 578, 21 Pac. 428. I think the court did not err in denying the nonsuit.

The only other point presented by appellant is that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. Upon all the issues as to which the evidence is claimed to be insufficient, it was substantially conflicting. It clearly tended to prove negligence of the defendant. It tended to prove that he was intoxicated, and, under the circumstances, was driving at a reckless speed, and that with proper care he might have avoided the accident. There was no other evidence of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff or his parents than that above stated, and there is no pretense that the case was not fairly submitted to the jury. I think the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

GEORGE H. FULLER DESK CO. v. McDADE, Sheriff, et al. (S. F. No. 84.) [1]

CONVERSION—ACTION AGAINST OFFICER—PLEADING —DEMAND—JOINING SURETIES.

1. To state a case against a sheriff for the conversion of property seized by him on an attachment against another, facts should be alleged showing that, after being advised of plaintiff's ownership, he refused to surrender the property.

2. A complaint which states material facts by way of recital, instead of direct allegation, will be held sufficient, where objection is not raised by special demurrer.

3. A formal demand, as prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 689, providing for a special proceeding by the officer to determine the ownership of property levied on under execution and claimed by another, is not essential to the maintenance of an action against a sheriff for the conversion of property seized under an attachment.

4. An action for the conversion of property seized on process may be maintained against a sheriff and the sureties on his bond.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Action by the George H. Fuller Desk Company against John J. McDade, sheriff, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Matt. J. Sullivan, for appellants. H. R. Wiley, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Action against McDade and the sureties on his official bond given to qualify him for the office of sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, to which he was elected in November, 1892. The condition of the bond was that he would perform the duties of his office according to law. Plaintiff alleged in its complaint that it was on May 25, 1893, and is now, the owner of certain goods described, of the value of $1,132, at that date in the possession of the Carnall-Hopkins Company, a corporation; that on said May 25th McDade, in his capacity of sheriff aforesaid, and acting in virtue of a writ of attachment against the property of said Carnall-Hopkins Company, levied upon and took from its possession the said goods of plaintiff, and detains the same against plaintiff's will, "and notwithstanding that immediately thereafter plaintiff notified said defendant McDade that plaintiff was the owner thereof, and demanded possession thereof; * * * that by reason of the wrongful conversion" of said goods plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $1,200, for which it prayed judgment. Defendants appeal from the judgment entered on a verdict in plaintiff's favor for the sum of $1,132.

Appellants insist that the complaint, at best, makes a case for the recovery of the property seized, and that the judgment for its value—not as an alternative if delivery cannot be had—is erroneous, for they say no conversion of the property is alleged in the complaint. We agree with them that the taking from the possession of the Carnall-Hopkins Company, the defendant in the writ of attachment, was not of itself a conversion of the property taken. "When an officer proceeds to execute an attachment, he is authorized to seize any personalty found in the defendant's possession, if he have no reason to suppose it to be the property of another." Drake, Attachm. § 199. We conceive this to be the correct rule, and in accord with most of the cases in this court touching the subject (Ledley v. Hays, 1 Cal. 160; Daumiel v. Gorham, 6 Cal. 43; Killey v. Scannell, 12 Cal. 73; Paige v. O'Neal, Id. 483, 495; Babe v. Coyne, 53 Cal. 261; Brichman v. Ross, 67 Cal. 601, 8 Pac. 316; Black v. Clasby, 97 Cal. 482, 32 Pac. 564; Murfree, Sher. §§ 964, 965), though a different doctrine seems to be taught in Boulware v. Craddock, 30 Cal. 190, and Wellman v. English, 38 Cal. 583. In order, therefore, to make out that the sheriff committed an actionable wrong, when, as in this instance, it is not charged in terms that he converted the property to his own use, facts should be stated to show that upon notice of the true owner's claim he refused to surrender the property. We think it must be held that such facts appear in the complaint here (Arzaga v. Villalba, 85 Cal. 191, 196, 24 Pac. 656, and cases cited); true, rather by way of recital, when they should have been alleged directly; but the demurrers interposed by defendants do not include this fault among the grounds they specify, and, under the rule requiring objections based on such defects to be taken by special demurrer, we are not at liberty to treat the complaint as bad on that account. San Francisco v. Pennie, 93 Cal. 465, 29 Pac. 66; Santa Barbara v. Eldred, 108 Cal. 294, 41 Pac. 410.

[1] Rehearing denied.

Appellants claim further that the complaint is bad in that it does not allege a demand for the property in the manner and form prescribed by section 689, Code Civ. Proc., as amended in 1891, and in that a cause of action against McDade for a tort is misjoined with a cause of action against his sureties, based on their contract. These points have been ruled adversely to their contention in recent decisions of this court. Brenot v. Robinson, 108 Cal. 143, 41 Pac. 37; Bell v. Peck, 104 Cal. 35, 37 Pac. 766. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

WILSON et al. v. HIND et al. (S. F. 259.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—MATERIAL MEN—PLEADING—VARIANCE.

1. A person contracting to furnish material for a building, such as doors, sashes, blinds, etc., which, instead of manufacturing to order, he purchased ready made, is a material man only.

2. In an action to enforce a lien for material furnished contractor, the complaint alleged the contract to have been for the payment of the reasonable value of the material furnished, by order given on the owner of the building, whereas the evidence showed that the contractor purchased on his own credit, for a fixed price. Held, that there was a variance.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Wilson & Bro. against Robert R. Hind and another to enforce a material man's lien. There was a judgment refusing to foreclose the lien, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Lincoln Sonntag, for appellants. John C. Hughes, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. This appeal is from the judgment, and was taken within 60 days after its rendition. The action was to foreclose a material man's lien. The court held that plaintiffs had no lien on two grounds: First, because they did not furnish material to the owner or his agent, or to a contractor or subcontractor; second, because there was a fatal variance between the contract proven and that stated in the claim of lien.

Henry Behrens was the contractor. He contracted with W. R. Johnston to furnish all the mill work for the house, and to deliver it at the building. Mr. Johnston was called as a witness for plaintiffs, and testified that the mill work included certain manufactured material, such as front door frame, door, top light, recess panels, portico (columns or bracket or cap, balustrade, put together), window frames, sashes, etc. Witness further said: "I generally bought all my doors and sash and blinds and all stock material, you know, from Wilson & Brother." The court: "Stock material means material that is kept in stock?" Answer: "Yes, sir; manufactured. Yes, sir; all stock, doors, sashes, blinds, and transoms, and such like. We did not manufacture these in our mill; nothing only hard work." These extracts sufficiently show the nature of the contract both between Behrens and Johnston, and between Johnston and plaintiffs. It is very evident that Johnston was a material man only. Hinckley v. Biscuit & Cracker Co., 91 Cal. 140, 27 Pac. 594.

There was also a material variance between the contract set forth in the claim of lien and that proven. In the notice of lien it was stated that the contract was that the corporation was to be paid what the goods were reasonably worth, and that the subcontractor was to deliver to said Wilson & Bro. immediately upon the acceptance of the building, an order for the amount due to said plaintiff by said subcontractor, signed by the original contractor, Henry Behrens, and indorsed by the said Robert R. Hind, etc. The evidence was that Johnston bought the goods at a fixed price, and on his own credit; and there was no agreement in regard to an order upon Hinds, or that plaintiffs were to be paid from the contract price at all.

If these conclusions are correct, other points suggested need not be noticed. The judgment is affirmed.

AUBURN OPERA-HOUSE AND PAVILION ASS'N v. HILL. (Sac. 110.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 22, 1896.)

CORPORATIONS — SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK — CONTRACT—VALIDITY—IMMATERIAL ISSUES.

1. Matters which have no proper place in the pleadings, and, whether correctly found upon or not, can make no difference to the judgment, are wholly immaterial.

2. In an action by an opera-house company to recover a subscription to its capital stock, it appeared that a "prospectus" recited in detail the objects of the intended corporation, the amount of stock, etc.; that the subscriptions were to be called in on installments; and that defendant signed the prospectus for a certain number of shares. Held, that the prospectus constituted a contract under which defendant was liable for the amount of his subscription. 32 Pac. 587, affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; W. H. Grant, Judge.

Action by the Auburn Opera-House & Pavilion Association against George M. Hill on a contract of subscription to stock in such association. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John M. Fulweiler, for appellant. Jo. Hamilton and Geo. W. Hamilton, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. This is a second appeal. On the former appeal a judgment in favor of the defendant was reversed. Association v. Hill, 32 Pac. 587. Judgment was in favor of plaintiff at the second trial, and defendant now appeals therefrom, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. There is nothing substantial in the claim that certain of the findings are not sustained by the evidence. Of the material facts in the case,—that defendant signed the prospectus which is the basis of the plaintiff's action; that demand was made upon him for the amount of his subscription; and that he has not paid it, or any part of it,—the first and last are not denied, while the evidence is uncontradicted in support of the second. The other matters about which there is some controversy in the briefs—whether defendant participated in all the meetings of the board of directors of plaintiff down to the time of his resignation therefrom; whether he consented to the purchase of the Lardner lot; and as to the manner in which the proposed amount of the capital stock of plaintiff was raised from $20,000 to $30,000; and others not necessary to enumerate—are things wholly immaterial to the merits of this action, had no proper place in the pleadings, and, whether correctly found upon or not, can make no difference to the judgment.

2. The defendant's contention that the prospectus did not constitute a contract, and that he cannot be held liable thereon as such, that his only liability is as a stockholder of the corporation, to be proceeded against by the method of levying and collecting assessments provided by the Civil Code, is concluded by the judgment of this court on the former appeal, where it is said: "Under defendant's contract of subscription for the stock of plaintiff as contained in the prospectus signed by defendant, and upon the facts alleged in the complaint as to plaintiff's calls or demands for the amount agreed to be paid for such subscribed stock, the plaintiff is entitled to maintain this action." The pleadings remaining unchanged, the construction given them in the former opinion of this court becomes the law of the case.

The other points demand no special notice. We have examined them, and are satisfied they involve no material error. Judgment and order affirmed.

MACKAY et al. v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 214.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 22, 1896.)

TAXATION—BONDS—NONRESIDENT CORPORATION—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—ASSESSMENT—UNAUTHORIZED INCREASE—DELINQUENCY—PENALTIES.

1. Bonds of a railroad corporation organized in Arizona, payable in New York, and secured by a mortgage in Arizona, may be taxed in California as the property of a permanent resident of California, under Const. 1879, art. 13, § 1, which defines property for the purposes of taxation, and expressly declares it to include, among other things, moneys, credits, and bonds.

2. The constitutional and Code provisions authorizing the taxation of bonds held by a permanent resident within the state, though issued by a nonresident corporation, and secured by a mortgage on property outside the state, are not in contravention of the fourteenth amendment of the federal constitution, which guaranties to all persons the equal protection of the laws.

3. Where the constitution has provided that certain specific things shall be taxed as property, the legislature cannot exempt them.

4. Where railroad bonds, secured by a mortgage on the corporation's property, have been assessed at their face value, the state board of equalization cannot raise the assessment, in violation of Const. art. 13, § 9, which provides that "no board of equalization shall raise any mortgage, deed of trust, or other obligation by which a debt is secured, * * * above its face value."

5. A local assessment of railroad bonds was increased without authority by the state board of equalization, and the taxes became delinquent before Act 1893 (St. 1893, p. 32; Pol. Code, § 3819), authorizing a payment of taxes under protest, took effect. Under the then-existing law, payment under protest could not be made until a sale was threatened. The taxes were not paid till after delinquency, and, on payment subsequently under protest, the statutory penalties were added. Held, that, to entitle the taxpayers to recover the penalties, there should have been a tender, before delinquency, of the taxes due according to the local assessment, where the excess was susceptible of exact calculation.

6. That a holder of bonds refused and failed to pay the taxes thereon under the erroneous conclusion that the bonds were not taxable is not a defense to the statutory penalties for delinquency.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William R. Daingerfield, Judge.

Action by John W. Mackay and R. V. Dey, executors of the will of Theresa Fair, deceased, against the city and county of San Francisco, to recover taxes levied and assessed against certain railroad bonds and other personal property, and paid under protest. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. F. Herrin, Byron Waters, Eugene R. Garber, and Isaac Frohman, for appellants. H. T. Creswell and Rhodes & Borden, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This action is prosecuted by appellants, as the executors of the last will and testament of Theresa Fair, deceased, to recover from the city and county of San Francisco the sum of $31,687.90, the amount of state and city and county taxes for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1892, levied and assessed upon certain railroad mortgage bonds and other personal property belonging to said estate, which said sum was paid by appellants to the tax collector of said city and county, under protest, on June 13, 1893. The action is prosecuted, under the provisions of section 3819 of the Political Code, a new section, approved February 27, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 32). The action was tried by the court upon an agreed statement of facts, which was adopted by the court as its finding of fact, pursuant to stipulation of counsel, from which the court found as a conclusion of law that plaintiffs were entitled to recover from the defendant the sum of $1,911.55, with interest from June 13, 1893, and costs, and judgment was entered accordingly. James N. Block, as tax collector, was made a party defendant, but the action as to him was dismissed. This appeal is by the plaintiffs from the judgment upon the judgment roll.

The city assessor assessed the personal property of said estate as of the first Monday in March, 1892, as follows: 1,915 6 per cent. bonds of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of Arizona, of the denomination of $1,000 each, assessed or valued by said assessor at $1,915,000; $3,593 in money; furniture, $3,000; one vehicle, $300,—making a total of $1,921,893. The rate of taxation for city and county purposes was duly fixed by the board of supervisors at $1 on each $100 of the valuation of the taxable property of said city and county. The state board of equalization, for the purposes of state taxation, raised the entire assessment of said city and county, except as to money, 20 per cent., and fixed the rate of the state tax to be levied for that fiscal year at 43.4 cents on each $100. By the local assessment, said bonds were assessed at their face value; and, by the raise made by the state board of equalization, they were assessed for purposes of state taxation at $2,298,000, or $383,000 above their face value. No part of the taxes, either state or local, were paid until after they became delinquent, when the whole of the taxes, both state and local, were paid, with the penalty of 5 per cent. on the local tax, and 15 per cent. on the state tax, and $1 in addition to cover the cost of advertising. Upon said railroad bonds the city and county tax levied upon their face value amounted to $19,150, and upon the valuation as increased by the state board of equalization the state tax amounted to $9,973. As a consequence of the delinquency, 5 per cent. was added to the city and county tax, amounting to $957.50, and 15 per cent. was added to the state tax, making an addition thereto of $1,495.99. If the state tax had been levied upon said bonds at their face value, the amount thereof would have been $8,311.10, instead of $9,973.32,—a difference of $1,662.22. The penalty for delinquency upon said difference, 15 per cent., is $249.33; and this, added to said difference, makes $1,911.55, for which, with interest from the date of payment, and for costs, the court gave judgment in favor of the plaintiffs; the court holding that the increased valuation by the state board was unauthorized, but that the tax and penalty thereon, being capable of separation, and the bonds being taxable, the plaintiffs should have paid the remainder of the taxes, both state and local, and gave judgment only for the amount so found to be illegally assessed, with the penalty thereon, adding thereto interest and costs. The bonds in question were made by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of Arizona, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of that territory, are payable in the city of New York, and are secured by a mortgage executed by said corporation to Henry M. Newhall and Charles Mayne, residents of San Francisco, upon the railroad and telegraph lines, rolling stock, stations, fixtures, and appurtenances of said corporation situated in the territory of Arizona.

Appellants make the following points, upon which they contend the judgment should be reversed: (1) "These bonds are not taxable, because they are not tangible property, and do not inhere in tangible property situated in this state; and it is incompetent for the constitution or statute of the state to make that property—and therefore taxable—which is not property in fact." (2) "The law of California, contained in the constitution as well as in the Code, relating to the taxation of such credits as those taxed in this case, is void, because in contravention of the fourteenth amendment of the federal constitution, which guaranties to all persons the equal protection of the laws." (3) "The legislature of California, at its last session, assumed to correct this evil, by declaring that railroad bonds are not property for the purposes of taxation."

Section 1, art. 13, of the constitution of 1879, is as follows: "All property in the state, not exempt under the laws of the United States, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law. The word 'property,' as used in this article and section, is hereby declared to include moneys, credits, bonds, stocks, dues, franchises, and all other matters and things, real, personal and mixed, capable of private ownership; provided that growing crops, property used exclusively for public schools, and such as may belong to the United States, this state, or to any county or municipal corporation within this state, shall be exempt from taxation. The legislature may provide, except in the case of credits secured by mortgage or trust deed, for a reduction from credits or debts due to bona fide residents of this state." Section 4 of said article provides that "a mortgage, deed of trust, contract or other obligation by which a debt is secured, shall, for the purposes of assessment and taxation, be deemed and treated as an interest in the property affected thereby. * * *" Railroads and other quasi public corporations are excepted from the above provision. The constitution not only provides that all "property" shall be taxed, but defines the word "property," and expressly includes "bonds" in that definition; thus placing it beyond the power of the legislature or the courts to say that bonds are not property within the meaning and intent of the constitution.

The bonds in question were held here. Their situs was the city and county of San Francisco. City and County of San Francisco v. Lux, 64 Cal. 481, 2 Pac. 254. They could not be taxed in Arizona, where the property mortgaged to secure them is situated. State Tax on Foreign-Held Bonds, 15 Wall. 300. In the case last cited, it was said: "But debts owing by corporations, like debts owing by individuals, are not property of the debtors in any sense. They are obligations of the debtors, and only possess value in the hands of the creditors. With them they are property, and in their hands they may be taxed. To call debts 'property' of the debtors is simply to misuse terms. All the property there can be in the nature of things in debts of corporations belongs to the creditors to whom they are payable, and follows their domicile, wherever that may be. Their debts have no locality separate from the parties to whom they are due." In Illinois it is held that their statute requiring credits to be taxed is not obnoxious to any constitutional objection, even if the property for which the credit was given is also taxable. Goldgart v. People, 106 Ill. 25. The case of Kirtland v. Hotchkiss, 100 U. S. 491, is in point, and we refer to it somewhat fully, because it also answers appellants' second contention, based upon the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States. In that case, Kirtland, a citizen of Connecticut, brought an action to restrain the enforcement of certain tax warrants levied upon his real estate in the town where he resided, which taxes were assessed upon certain bonds executed in Chicago, and made payable in that city, and secured by deeds of trust upon real estate there situated. The statute under which the tax was levied declared that personal property in that state or elsewhere should be deemed, for purposes of taxation, to include all moneys, credits, choses in action, bonds, notes, stocks (except United States stocks), chattels, or effects, or any interest thereon. The supreme court of errors of that state held that the assessments were in conformity to the state law, and that the law itself did not infringe any constitutional right of the plaintiff. Kirtland thereupon sued out a writ of error to the supreme court of the United States, and his counsel contended that said tax was not only repugnant to the sovereignty of the state of Illinois, but violated the constitution of the United States in several specified particulars. The supreme court of the United States, restricting its remarks to the facts of the case, and quoting from McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 428, said: "It is obvious that it [the right of taxation] is an incident of sovereignty, and is co-extensive with that to which it is an incident. All subjects over which the sovereign power of a state extends are objects of taxation; but those over which it does not extend are, upon the soundest principles, exempt from taxation." And quoting from State Tax on Foreign-Held Bonds, 15 Wall. 300, said: "Unless restrained by provisions of the federal constitution, the power of the state as to the mode, form, and extent of taxation is unlimited, where the subjects to which it applies are within her jurisdiction." Applying these principles to the special facts before it, the court further said: "The creditor, it is conceded, is a permanent resident, within the jurisdiction of the state imposing the tax. The debt is property in his hands constituting a portion of his wealth, from which he is under the highest obligation, in common with his fellow citizens of the same state, to contribute for the support of the government whose protection he enjoys. That debt, although a species of intangible property, may, for purposes of taxation, if not for all others, be regarded as situated at the domicile of the creditor. * * * Nor is the debt, for the purposes of taxation, affected by the fact that it is secured by mortgage upon real estate situated in the state of Illinois." The only case cited by appellants in support of their first proposition is that of People v. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Soc., 51 Cal. 244. That case arose under the constitution of 1849, which did not define the word "property" (article 11, § 13); and the court was dealing with a definition given it by the legislature. But the principal distinction is based upon the facts involved in the case. In that case the bank was assessed upon a large amount of money, all of which was loaned upon mortgages upon real estate; and it was conceded that the taxes upon the real estate, which was the basis of the credit, had been paid. The theory of the court was that a credit had no value apart from property in the hands of the debtor which is the basis of the credit, and that if such property is taxed, and the credit which derives its value from such property is also taxed, it is double taxation. Here the debtor is a nonresident, and the property upon which these bonds are secured is in another jurisdiction, and therefore beyond the taxing power of this state. In a case arising shortly after the adoption of the new constitution, there was no question made but that credits were taxable. There the estate of Lux had on general deposit in several banks in San Francisco a large sum of money. The controversy was as to where these credits should be taxed. They were treated, not as money, but as credits, the court saying: "It is a settled rule that a general deposit is, in effect, a loan, the relation of the bank and depositor being that of debtor and creditor. Where, then, should the credits—the amounts due from the banks to the estate—have been assessed?" City and County of San Francisco v. Lux, 64 Cal. 481, 483, 2 Pac. 254. Appellants' first point cannot be sustained.

2. Appellants' second point involves a federal question, our judgment upon which may be reviewed by the supreme court of the United States. There is nothing in the case before us to distinguish it from Kirtland v. Hotchkiss, supra, where the constitutional question was expressly decided against the contention of appellants.

3. Appellants' third point is based upon section 3617 of the Political Code, as amended in 1895 (St. 1895, p. 310). Said amendment consists in the insertion after the word "bonds," in the first subdivision, the words "except of railroad or quasi public corporations." This amendment was not in force at the time this cause was tried. It is cited by counsel with the remark that the legislature "assumed to correct this evil by declaring that railroad bonds are not property for the purposes of taxation." Touching this statute, it need only be said that, if the constitution did not require the taxation of the bonds of railroad and other quasi public corporations, the amendment in question was wholly unnecessary; and, if the constitution did require such bonds to be taxed, it was not in the power of the legislature to exempt them.

The only other question made by appellants relates to the penalty for delinquency. It is contended that, as the act of 1893 (St. 1893, p. 32, which constitutes a new section of the Political Code, numbered 3819) was not in force when these taxes became delinquent, they are entitled to recover the whole of the penalty paid, for the reason, as they claim, that prior to the passage of said act they could not pay under protest until a sale was threatened, and cite Williams v. Corcoran, 46 Cal. 556. If the illegal part of the tax had been incapable of separation from the legal part, this contention should be sustained. The written protest made by appellants to the tax collector, however, shows the facts upon which such separation could readily have been made. It showed that said bonds were assessed at $1,915,000; that the state board of equalization increased that assessment 20 per cent., or $383,000; and, the rate of taxation for state purposes as well as for county purposes being known, there could have been no difficulty in ascertaining the amount legally assessed, and we think it was appellants' duty to have tendered that amount; and under the plain provisions of section 9 of article 13 of the constitution, which provides "that no board of equalization shall raise any mortgage, deed of trust, contract, or other obligation by which a debt is secured, money or solvent credits, above its face value," it would have been the duty of the tax collector to have received it. If such tender had been made before delinquency, and the tax collector had refused to receive the amount so tendered, and the penalty for delinquency had been afterwards added, and paid under protest, for the protection of the property of the estate, the case would have been different. It is true that appellants, in their protest, claimed that the bonds were not taxable at all; but they also inserted a separate clause alleging the raise made by the state board, the amount of it, and that it was unauthorized under the above-quoted provision of the constitution. In De Fremery v. Austin, 53 Cal. 380, it was held that, if a tax levy contained an illegal item, such item will not invalidate the levy as to other items, if the levy is so made that the illegal items may be separated from the others; and in Bank v. Chalfant, 51 Cal. 369, it was held that under like circumstances the tax collector should receive the legal portion of the tax if tendered to him; and it has been frequently held that an injunction to restrain the collection of a tax partly legal and partly not will not be granted except upon condition that the legal part shall be first paid. See, Cooley, Tax'n (2d Ed.) p. 763, and cases there cited. That appellants erred in their conclusion that bonds were not taxable cannot relieve them. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

KENNY et al. v. KELLY et al. (S. F. 72.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS —ASSESSMENT OF BENEFITS.

When an assessment for paving the intersection of streets shows on its face that a greater proportion of the expense has been assessed against the property than is authorized by the statute, the property owner may, without appealing to the city council, resist the enforcement of the assessment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Edward Kenny and others against

Joseph P. Kelly and others. There was a judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellants. Jas. P. Kelly, for respondents.

BRITT, C. Action to enforce an assessment against certain lots of land, for work done in the improvement of D street, in the city and county of San Francisco. Twenty-Fourth avenue in said city terminates in said D street, and the lots in question, having a frontage on said avenue, were assessable for the expense of the work done on the intersection of the two streets, according to the rule prescribed by subdivision 4 of section 7 of the act to provide for work upon streets, etc., as amended. St. 1891, p. 202. This allows only one-half of the expense of the work on the intersection to be charged upon the two quarter blocks cornering thereon. The court found, however, that the whole expense of the work done on the intersection was, in this instance, assessed upon such two quarter blocks, one of which included the lots of defendants, and that the lots were thus assessed for double the amount legally chargeable thereon; also, that the work done on intersections was assessed and apportioned separately from that done on the main street. The assessment upon said lots for the work on the intersection was held to be void, and defendants had judgment.

Appellants contend that the illegal assessment found by the court is no defense to this action, and that the owners should have had the same corrected by appeal to the board of supervisors, as provided in section 11 of the act. But if the form of the assessment followed the statute (section 8), it must have appeared on the face thereof that the lots of defendants could not, under any circumstances, be liable for a portion of the expense assessed against them. Counsel does not claim, indeed, that the illegality was not thus apparent. The case, then, is within the principle, several times declared or assumed, that the owner may, without appealing to the city council, resist the enforcement of an assessment void on its face. Ryan v. Altschul, 103 Cal. 174, 37 Pac. 339; Buckman v. Landers (Cal.) 43 Pac. 1125; McDonald v. Conniff, 99 Cal. 386, 390, 34 Pac. 71. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

HEIDT v. MINOR. (S. F. 44.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. July 22, 1896.)

APPEAL—EFFECT OF REVERSAL—LAW OF THE CASE—ACTION ON BOND OF NOTARY.

1. Where a judgment on appeal is simply reversed, the effect is to remand the cause for a new trial.

2. After the reversal of a judgment the parties have the same rights as to amendment of pleadings as before a trial, and amendments may be permitted by the court in its discretion.

3. The decision in an action where the judgment is reversed on appeal becomes the law of the case as to the issues then involved, but as to issues thereafter formed, and facts found thereunder, it has no more effect than if rendered in another case.

4. A recovery may be had on the official bond of a notary for the full amount of a mortgage purchased by plaintiff in reliance on the genuineness of the notary's certificate of acknowledgment, which was in fact false and fraudulent, where the purported maker was solvent and able to pay the mortgage debt, though he did not own the property described in the mortgage.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Action by Louise Heidt against Peter O. Minor. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Rhodes and Archer & Bowden, for appellant. S. F. Leib, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. This is an action against one of the sureties on the official bond of a notary public, to recover damages alleged to have been caused by a certain false and fraudulent certificate of acknowledgment. On the first trial a judgment was rendered for plaintiff, which, on appeal to this court (26 Pac. 629), was reversed, on the authority of Heidt v. Minor, 89 Cal. 115, 26 Pac. 627. That appeal was on the judgment roll only, and the facts were precisely similar to those in the case cited. On the return of the case to the court below, plaintiff, by leave of the court, amended her complaint. The case was then tried before a jury, and plaintiff had a verdict and judgment, and defendant appeals on the judgment roll only. The points made by appellant are that the court below should have rendered judgment in favor of defendant on the coming down of the remittitur, and without a new trial; that the court erred in allowing the amendment to the complaint, and that the facts on the second trial were substantially the same as on the first trial; and that, therefore, the rule of "the law of the case" entitled the defendant to a judgment.

1. The judgment of this court on the first appeal was simply that "the judgment * * * in the above-entitled cause be, and the same is hereby, reversed, with costs." The effect of this unqualified reversal was to remand the cause for a new trial. Falkner v. Hendy, 107 Cal. 49, 54, 40 Pac. 21, 386. It may also be remarked that the reversal of a judgment on the ground that it is not supported by the findings does not necessarily imply that any judgment ought to have been rendered on those findings. The reversal in this case was based on the proposition that there was no finding at all upon a certain material fact. In the absence of such finding, no judgment could properly have been rendered. But appellant contends that the original complaint contained no allegation as to the fact in question, that the findings covered all the issues made by the pleadings, and that, therefore, the reversal was really based on the ground that the complaint stated no cause of action. No such point was made on that appeal, or mentioned in the opinion; and, had it been made, it would have been proper, on remanding the case, to give the plaintiff an opportunity to amend.

2. After the reversal of the judgment the parties in the court below had the same rights which they originally had, and that court therefore had discretion to permit any proper amendment to the pleadings. Phelan v. Supervisors, 9 Cal. 15; Gould v. Stafford, 101 Cal. 32, 35 Pac. 429. The only objection urged to the substance of the amendment is that it did not cure the defect in the original complaint, or make it state a cause of action. This question will most conveniently be considered with the next point.

3. On the first trial the findings showed that the mortgage to which the certificate of acknowledgment in question was appended had never been executed or acknowledged by the person therein named as mortgagor; that the certificate was false, and was made for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiff out of certain money; and that the plaintiff had actually parted with that money on the faith of that certificate. But the findings did not show whether the mortgage, if it had been genuine, —if it had in fact been duly executed and acknowledged by the mortgagor,—would have been of any value. And it was therefore held that upon those findings it could not have been ascertained whether or not plaintiff had suffered any loss by reason of the false certificate. The decision upon that point, of course, became the law of this case, and must control the determination of the present appeal, unless the facts disclosed upon the second trial differ in some material particular from those upon which the former decision was based. The amendment to the complaint, among other things, alleged that the supposed mortgagor did not own, or claim to own, any part of the lands embraced in the mortgage, but that he was solvent and able to pay the note set forth in the mortgage, and that, had said mortgage been genuine, he would have paid that note. The truth of these allegations is established by the verdict in favor of plaintiff. Respondent contends that these new facts make the case substantially different from that presented on the former appeal, and that they supply the defect in the findings for which the former judgment was reversed. Her contention is that, had the mortgage been genuine, the recital therein setting out the note would have been conclusive, against the mortgagor, of the due execution of the note (Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 2; Waldrip v. Black, 74 Cal. 409, 16 Pac. 226; Alvord v. Gold Co., 106 Cal. 547, 40 Pac. 27), and that in a suit to foreclose the mortgage, the mortgagor being solvent, plaintiff would have been able to collect the full amount of the note,—if not upon the sale of the property, at least upon a deficiency judgment. She therefore claims that it now appears that the mortgage, if genuine, would have been of the value of $1,515.82 (for which amount judgment has been rendered in her favor), being the amount of the principal and interest of the note recited in the mortgage, and that she has been damaged in that sum by the false certificate of acknowledgment. We think this contention sound. It is certain that when a notary certifies that the mortgagor duly acknowledged the execution of a mortgage which in fact is a forgery, the measure of damages, in an action against the notary or his sureties, brought by one who has parted with value on the faith of such certificate, is, in cases of this impression, the amount which would be the value of the mortgage if genuine. The value of a mortgage is the amount which can and will be collected thereon, and it matters not whether that amount is obtained by a sale of the mortgaged premises, or by the enforcement of a deficiency judgment. If the mortgagor has no interest in the mortgaged premises, the property may bring nothing, or only a nominal amount, on the sale; but in that case the plaintiff has an absolute right to a judgment for the deficiency against the maker of the note, and if he is solvent that deficiency will be collected. The value of the mortgage, therefore, depends, not merely on the value of the mortgaged property, but, in case of the insufficiency of that property, upon the solvency of the mortgagor. When it appears, as it does in this case, that the plaintiff, had the mortgage been genuine, would have been able to collect the whole amount named therein, he is entitled to recover that amount, without regard to the value of the mortgagor's interest in the mortgaged property. But appellant contends that, in the opinion on the former appeal, it was decided that the value of this mortgage, if valid in every respect, would have depended upon the value of the mortgaged property, and that that proposition thereby became the law of this case. It is true that that opinion does contain such language. But the "law of the case" consists, not in the reasoning of the court, or the illustrations given, but in the propositions of law actually decided, and applicable to the facts in judgment. The only propositions of law decided on that appeal (so far as this matter is concerned), and the only ones which, on the facts then before the court, could have been decided, were that the defendant is liable only for what would be the value of the mortgage if valid; that the court had not found that it would be of any value, if valid; and that, therefore, the proper basis for determining the liability of the defendant was wanting. See 89 Cal. 122, 26 Pac. 627. All beyond this was mere reasoning and illustration. It is true that ordinarily the value of a mortgage does depend upon the value of the mortgaged property, and in discussing this question that aspect of the matter was the only one considered. But as neither the pleadings nor the findings then contained anything as to the value of the property, or the extent of the mortgagor's interest therein, or his solvency, no statement as to the respective force of those different facts was intended to be made, nor, if made, would it have had the force of a decision. Moreover, the rule of the law of the case only applies when, on a subsequent trial, the issues and the facts found remain substantially the same. On this last trial the facts alleged and found are materially different from those considered on the former appeal. On that appeal the court did not consider, and could not properly have considered, what the rule would be where the supposed mortgagor, though not the owner of any interest in the mortgaged premises, was nevertheless entirely solvent and able to respond to the full amount of the mortgage debt. That question arises for the first time upon the present record, and its decision in favor of respondent is in no wise opposed to anything actually decided upon the former appeal. The true rule is as stated by one of the learned judges of the court below in this case: "When new issues are made, involving the finding of facts which could not be found under the pleadings which went to the supreme court, as to such new fact the opinion stands upon the same footing as if given in another case." The judgment is affirmed.

McDONALD v. POOLE et ux. (S. F. 78.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. July 23, 1896.)

PAROL EVIDENCE—WRITTEN CONTRACTS—COUNTERCLAIM—ASSIGNMENT—PLEADING—DENIAL.

1. Where the written contract provides for a certain payment for the work to be performed, it cannot be varied by proof of a prior parol agreement for a less price.

2. In an action by an assignee of a contract, against two defendants, one cannot set up a counterclaim consisting of an individual claim by him against the assignor.

3. In an action by the assignee of a contract, the failure to deny under oath the allegation of assignment contained in the sworn complaint dispenses with the necessity of proof of the assignment.

Action by John W. McDonald against John P. Poole and wife. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellants. Ash & Matthews, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This action was brought to recover $907.50 and interest, as follows: $756.25 thereof upon a written contract entered into July 23, 1892, between James Casey and defendants, whereby the former agreed to grade, sewer, curb, macadamize, etc., Laidley street, between Fairmount and Harry streets, San Francisco; defendants agreeing to pay therefor $2.75 per foot for 275 front feet by them owned on said street. The complainant avers the assignment in writing of the contract by Casey to plaintiff on the 3d day of October, 1892, and the completion of the work on the 22d day of March, 1893, to the satisfaction of, etc. A second count of the complaint demands $151.25 for work, labor, and services performed and materials furnished to the defendants between January 1, 1892, and April 6, 1893, by said Casey, and avers the assignment of the demand therefor to plaintiff on the 17th day of April, 1893. The answer of defendants does not deny the making of the written contract, or its assignment to plaintiff, but avers that the price to be paid was $2 per front foot, and not $2.75, as alleged by plaintiff. To the second count, defendants answer, denying any indebtedness, and aver payment of $151.25, the amount claimed, prior to the commencement of the action, and deny that the contract therefor was assigned to the plaintiff. They further claim by way of answer and counterclaim: (1) That defendant John P. Poole was employed by Casey to procure the execution of the contract for the improvements by other parties on the street, and was to receive a commission of 5 per cent. therefor upon the aggregate proceeds of the contract, and also a deduction of $206.25, to be deducted from the contract price upon the lands of defendants. As a further counterclaim, defendants claim the sum of $787.70 as due them, as follows: $393.88, the amount agreed upon for services of defendant in procuring contract; also $151.25, paid to plaintiff's assignor, and being the amount specified in the second cause of action; the sum of $75.72, paid on written order of plaintiff's assignor to C. J. Wesson; and the further sum of $318.10, cash, paid to said assignor at different times on account of the contract. The court found there was due plaintiff on account of the written contract the sum of $360.75 as a balance after deducting a lumber bill of $75.75 paid by defendants, and an offset of $317.75 settled upon and agreed to by plaintiff on account of payments made by defendants to the assignor of said plaintiff. Upon the second count the court found in favor of plaintiff for $151.25, less $35 paid on account thereof, leaving a balance due of $116.25.

Upon the motion for a new trial the court required plaintiff to deduct this sum of $116.25, and interest thereon, from his judgment, which was done. This was all that defendants were entitled to claim, and had they been allowed less the result would have been justified by the evidence. John P. Poole, one of the defendants, testified as follows: "The aggregate amount of payments which I made him is $545.07. That includes the cash advanced at different times, in the account, of $315; lumber bill of $75.72, and bill of $151.25; extra work and notary's fee of $2.50." Deduct this aggregate of $545.07 from the sum of $907.50, the contract price of the grading, etc., and the $151.25 due for extra work, and, with interest added, we have substantially the sum for which the judgment now stands.

[1] Rehearing denied.

The claim that there was a verbal agreement that the work for defendants was to be performed for less than $2.75 per front foot was properly rejected, for the reason that the subsequent written agreement fixing the price superseded all the previous oral negotiations. Civ. Code, § 1625.

The counterclaim of defendant John P. Poole on account of commissions claimed for procuring the signature of other property holders to the contract was properly denied. Conceding that it was properly proven, it was an individual demand against Casey, the assignor of plaintiff, and, as such, was not properly interposed in a joint action against the two defendants. Code Civ. Proc. § 438.

No evidence or finding as to the assignment of the written contract was required, for the reason that such assignment was averred in the sworn complaint, and not denied by the answer.

The findings cover all the material issues. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; HAYNES, C.

RAPP et al. v. WHITTIER et al. (S. F. 99.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 23, 1896.)

CREDITORS' BILL — WHEN LIES — SUIT TO SET ASIDE FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—REMEDY BY SUPPLEMENTAL PROCEEDINGS—FINDINGS.

1. A creditors' bill to reach property transferred by defendant to his co-defendant, and which is claimed by the latter adversely to defendant, will lie, since the remedy by proceedings supplemental to execution (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 717–720) would in such case be inadequate.

2. In a suit to subject to payment of a judgment against defendant property transferred by defendant to his co-defendant in fraud of plaintiff, in violation of Civ. Code, §§ 3449, 3457, an assignment that the court failed to make a sufficient finding as to the consideration for the transfer will not be reviewed, since the consideration therefor was immaterial.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Charles Rapp and another against W. F. Whittier and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant Whittier appeals. Affirmed.

Vincent Neale, for appellant. Mullaney, Grant & Cushing, for respondents.

BRITT, C. Appeal by defendant W. F. Whittier from a judgment whereby a transfer of personal property, evidenced by a bill of sale executed June 22, 1893, to said appellant by Henry F. Robbers and Charles Reck, who are also defendants here, was declared void, and plaintiffs were adjudged to recover of appellant the net proceeds in his hands of a sale of said property made by him subsequently to such transfer. It appears from the allegations of plaintiffs' complaint that Reck had no interest in the property described in the bill of sale. At the date of such instrument, plaintiffs had an action pending in the superior court against said H. F. Robbers, in which they sought to recover a debt owed to them by him. The said bill of sale was intended by Robbers, and accepted by Whittier, as an assignment of all the assets of the former, pursuant to an understanding between them and various creditors of Robbers, other than the plaintiffs, whereby Whittier was to hold and dispose of the property for the benefit of such other creditors, to the exclusion of plaintiffs. On September 5, 1893, in the course of their said action against Robbers, plaintiffs recovered judgment. Execution issued thereon, and, under the writ, the sheriff garnished Whittier in respect of all credits and effects in his hands belonging to Robbers. The garnishee denied the possession or control of any credits or other property of Robbers, and asserted title to said assets in himself. There was no other leviable property of Robbers, and the execution was returned unsatisfied. These allegations of the complaint were either not denied by defendant Whittier (who alone contested this action) or were found by the court to be true. It was further stated in the complaint that said transfer was without consideration. By the answer, issue was made on this averment.

The complaint being in the nature of a creditors' bill to subject property of Robbers, claimed by Whittier, to the satisfaction of plaintiffs' judgment against the former, appellant contends that the action does not lie; that with us the provisions of the statute for proceedings supplementary to execution (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 717–720) totally supplant any action of this character. Since appellant asserted title under the transfer from Robbers, and adversely to him, it would have profited plaintiffs nothing to pursue the course provided by the statute. In the face of that claim, they could not, by supplemental proceedings, reach the fund held by appellant. In such a case those proceedings do not supersede the remedy by action, for the reason that they are not adequate to accomplish the purpose of the action. Swift v. Arents, 4 Cal. 390; Lewis v. Chamberlain, 108 Cal. 525, 41 Pac. 413; Herrlich v. Kaufmann, 99 Cal. 271, 33 Pac. 857.

It is urged, also, that the court made no sufficient finding upon the issue of consideration for the transfer; but as it clearly appears that such transfer was an attempted assignment for the benefit of creditors of Robbers, and void under the statute governing that subject (Civ. Code, §§ 3449, 3457), the question of consideration therefor was immaterial. Sabichi v. Chase, 108 Cal. 81, 85, 41 Pac. 29. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

CHETWOOD v. CALIFORNIA NAT. BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 177.) [1]

(Supreme Court of California. July 22, 1896.)

TORT—SUFFICIENCY OF FINDINGS—RELEASE OF JOINT TORT FEASORS.

1. In an action against three directors of an insolvent bank by a stockholder in behalf of the corporation, the complaint alleged that the defendants were the executive committee; that it was their duty to supervise the business of the bank; that it was the duty of each, concurrently with his associates, to exercise diligence in performing his duties; that defendants, "contriving together to injure and deceive the said corporation, neglected and omitted" to exercise care, etc.; and that, by such negligence, the money of the corporation was lost. Held that, under the complaint, the defendants were charged as joint tort feasors, and findings of fact which failed to find that the committee, or any member of it, as such, was guilty of conspiracy, but found that one defendant was negligent as president, were fatally variant.

2. Where several defendants are charged as joint tort feasors, a release of any one of them, by withdrawal of the action against him on the payment of a sum agreed upon between him and the plaintiff, operated to release other defendants from all further liability.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. Murphy, Judge.

Action by John Chetwood, Jr., against the California National Bank of San Francisco, R. P. Thomas, and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendant Thomas appeals. Reversed.

J. A. Stephens and Mr. Van Ness, for appellant. Thompson & Thompson, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal from the judgment alone. Plaintiff, as a stockholder of the California National Bank, prosecuted this action against certain directors of the bank, to recover from them, and for the use and benefit of the corporation, the sum of $400,000, alleged to have been lost to the corporation by their negligent misconduct in the management of its affairs. The bank had become insolvent before the commencement of the action, and a receiver was in charge of its affairs. Plaintiff made demand upon the comptroller of the currency, upon the receiver, upon the corporation, and upon its board of directors to prosecute the action; and, upon their refusal, it was instituted in his name as plaintiff. The complaint, while it is entitled a bill in equity for an accounting and settlement of a trust, contains, as will hereafter be made manifest, nothing more than a charge ex delicto against certain directors for a breach and nonperformance of their duties. The three directors whose conduct is attacked, and who are the defendants against whom a judgment is sought, are Richard P. Thomas, president of the corporation, Robert R. Thompson, vice president, and Robert A. Wilson, a director; the three constituting the executive committee which is created, and whose powers are defined by the by-laws. The president and vice president were under the by-laws ex officio members of this executive committee. The third member, Wilson, was selected by the board. The complaint sets forth the section of the by-laws defining the powers of the president, and also that section specifying the duties and powers of the vice president. It contains likewise a by-law defining the duties and powers of the executive committee, which is as follows: "Sec. 7. There shall be appointed by the board of directors a committee known as the 'executive committee,' consisting of the president, vice president, and one or more directors, to continue to act until succeeded, who shall have and exercise immediate supervision of all the officers and business of this bank, who shall audit all bills for current and other expenses, who shall have power to discount and purchase bills, notes, and other evidences of debt, and to buy and sell bills of exchange, coin, and bullion, and loan money on personal security, and who shall at each regular meeting of the board of directors make a report of all bills, notes, and other evidences of debt discounted or purchased by them for the bank, and of concurrent and other expenses audited since their last previous report." The complaint then avers: That the three defendants named "were duly elected and by said board appointed the executive committee of said corporation and board of directors; * * * and the said three persons have constituted and been the said executive committee under said by-laws; and thereupon each of said defendants, Thomas, Thompson, and Wilson, duly accepted said office, to which they had as last herein aforesaid been elected and appointed; * * * and that, upon their said election and appointment as such officers, the said three defendants severally, and as such president, vice president, and executive committee, duly accepted the positions of the respective officers, and as provided in the above-mentioned code of by-laws and the above-quoted sections thereof, and duly accepted the trusts and obligations to perform each and all of the duties therein prescribed with due skill, care, attention, prudence, diligence, and fidelity." "That, as such executive committee, said three persons, Thomas, Thompson, and Wilson, as such committee, assumed the discharge of the duties thereof, and, in due performance of their duties, had from said date of their first appointment continuously, until the failure of said corporation, the immediate supervision of all the officers and business of said corporation. * * * On the said three said persons, the above-named defendants, Thomas, Thompson, and Wilson, as such executive committee, devolved, and continuously remained throughout all of said time, the duty to exercise immediate supervision of all officers and business of said bank for said corporation," etc. "That it was the duty of each of said members of the executive committee to exercise, concurrently with his associates on said committee, diligence and fidelity in performing the duties of said committee, as above detailed. That, well knowing each and all of said facts above recited, said three persons above named, defendants Thomas, Thompson, and Wilson, severally being fully aware of the nature and extent of said trust and the duties thereof, accepted and retained said trust, and unto the said corporation promised faithfully to discharge the same, and each and all of the said duties thereof in a proper, careful, and judicious manner." "That the business of said banking corporation was commenced shortly after October, 1886, but afterwards, and for a long space of time, the defendants above mentioned, Thomas, Thompson, and Wilson, not regarding their aforesaid duties, nor their respective and concurrent promises in that behalf, but wholly disregarding the same, and contriving together to injure and deceive the said corporation, neglected and omitted, without any reasonable excuse, to exercise their own skill, care, judgment, and discretion in the making of loans and discounts out of the moneys in the possession of said bank, and otherwise directing the business of said bank; but they negligently permitted the cashier of said bank to control and manage the whole business of the said bank as he saw fit, and without consulting or in any wise informing said defendants, or any or either of them, to lend the moneys of the said bank according to his own pleasure, by bills of exchange, without any consultation with said defendants, or any or either of them, in such manner as he (the said cashier) elected, to dispose of all the moneys of said bank." "That, by such negligence, worthless loans, and the various transactions above mentioned, the moneys of the corporation were wasted, misused, and lost." Then follow averments of specific instances of loss occasioned by improvident loans and purchases made by the cashier without the knowledge of these defendants; averments of demand upon the corporation, the receiver, and the comptroller to commence suit. It is then averred "that the defendants Thomas, Thompson, and Wilson are financially responsible, and able to make good the losses which have resulted to said corporation by reason of their said negligence"; and, in conclusion, a prayer "for a decree that the said trustees, the above-named defendants, Thomas, Thompson, and Wilson, be held to an accounting of their said trust; that they restore unto said corporation the sum of $400,000, with legal interest; that a joint and several money judgment against them, the said Thomas, Thompson, and Wilson, for the sum of $400,000, with legal interest thereon from the time of such loss, and costs herein, be rendered and entered by this court in this case in favor of said corporation, the California National Bank of San Francisco."

[1] Rehearing denied.

For reasons which will hereafter appear, we do not consider it necessary to meet and dispose of many of the objections raised by appellant to this complaint. Therefore it will be assumed, without deciding, that the complaint is sufficient to state a cause of action in its averments of misconduct, and that its averments of a demand and refusal to prosecute upon the comptroller, the receiver, and the corporation itself are sufficient; and so, as to other points of objection raised by appellant, the silence of this opinion is not to be construed as a determination of them.

There is no room for argument upon the question as to whether this complaint is upon a cause of action ex contractu, or upon one sounding in tort. It demands a joint and several money judgment against three men, constituting an executive committee, and charged with the performance of certain duties, for "contriving together to injure and deceive the corporation," and for injuring and deceiving it, by neglecting their duties, in the sum of $400,000. These defendants are charged throughout as joint tort feasors. If they were not, they could not be made defendants in one action. Their contrivance to injure was their joint contrivance. Their neglect is pleaded as their joint neglect to perform, not duties individually imposed upon them, but collectively undertaken as members of the executive committee. It is as members of the executive committee that they are alleged to have done the wrongs and permitted the losses. It is true that the complaint sets forth the by-laws relative to the duties of the president and of the vice president, but no charge of loss incurred by negligence is made against the president as president. If there were, then, as the other two defendants would not be chargeable with the president for his individual misconduct as president, it would be the subject-matter of a separate action, and have no place in this complaint. The prayer of the complaint, which may be looked to for aid in determining the nature of the proceeding, asks for a joint and several money judgment in the sum of $400,000, with legal interest, against the three defendants. No claim is anywhere made that there is a several and separate liability upon any one of the three, and not upon the others, for any of the acts charged against. To the contrary, from the beginning of the complaint to its prayer for a judgment, it is averred that the loss sustained was suffered through the common and collusive negligence of the three. It is alleged that the three defendants are "financially responsible and able to make good the losses which have resulted by reason of their said negligence." If the negligence did not arise in their failure to perform a common duty, they could not and would not have been made joint defendants. The trial court, moreover, found them to be jointly liable, and ordered a judgment against the three in a single amount.

The gravamen of the charge is the injury to the property of the bank by reason of the wrongful acts of the defendants. For these wrongful acts defendants are liable in tort, and the fact that there might be another cause of action ex contractu is a matter entirely apart. It frequently happens that the negligence complained of is the breach of a duty originating in contract, and in such cases the cause of action for tort may co-exist with a liability upon the contract. The negligence of a common carrier gives rise to an action ex contractu, or to one of trespass on the case. Historically, the action for tort is the older. "If a smith prick my horse with a nail, I shall have my action upon the case against him, without any warranty by the smith to do it well; * * * for it is the duty of any artificer to exercise his art rightly and truly as he might." Fitzh. Nat. Brev., 94, D. Even an intention to violate another's rights of property is not necessary to give one his action for trespass regarding his lands or goods. With or without contract, the duty is imposed upon all not to injure the property of another; and, for a failure to observe that duty, the right of action in trespass for the tort exists. Such is the cause of action here set up. The averments that defendants "promised faithfully to discharge their trust with due care and attention," etc., are unnecessary, and do not affect the cause of action. The law imposed upon them the duty of using due care when they agreed to discharge their duties as members of the committee. Their failure to use due care was a wrong, for which plaintiff is seeking redress. This wrong is charged, not to have been committed inadvertently or carelessly, which would amount to negligence pure and simple, but to have been wrought against the corporation through contrivance and collusion, with a design to injure it,—a charge which establishes that the pleader must have considered that he was dealing with a case of willful tort, partaking of the nature of a fraud.

It is claimed by appellant that the findings are not responsive to the issues joined by the pleadings, and to the understanding of this contention some explanation becomes necessary. The three defendants answered this complaint, making denial of the charges against them, and trial was had. The court, upon April 27, 1894, made and filed what it entitled an "Order of Judgment," as follows: "This cause having been heretofore submitted to the court for consideration and decision, and taken under advisement, and the court having fully considered the same, and being fully informed, it is ordered by the court that judgment be, and the same is hereby, entered in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendants Richard P. Thomas, Robert R. Thompson, and Robert A. Wilson, and in favor of the other defendants herein; and inasmuch as the testimony is unsatisfactory, the court being unable therefrom to determine the amount for which judgment should be entered, it is ordered by the court that a referee be appointed to take proof on that subject," etc. The referee was appointed, and directed to ascertain and report to the court the amount of the indebtedness due to the bank by certain named debtors thereof, for whose debts the defendants were to be held responsible. Upon August 17, 1894, the referee made his report, and found that there was owing to the bank from these debtors a sum of money in excess of $190,000. After this report had been filed, plaintiff accepted from two of the defendants, to wit, from Thompson and Wilson, the sum of $27,500, and, for and in consideration of said sum, renounced and withdrew his cause of action against these defendants, and dismissed the same, causing a formal judgment of dismissal to be entered therein. The judgment of dismissal follows the language of the stipulation which the parties entered into, and which declared that the plaintiff "hereby renounces and withdraws his cause of action herein as against the said defendants, and that he will not further prosecute the same"; "that, pursuant to the foregoing renunciation and withdrawal by the plaintiff of his said cause of action, this action be, and is hereby dismissed, against the said defendants." The order for a dismissal was filed September 24, 1894, and the judgment was formally entered upon the same date. The stipulation for dismissal was, however, entered into upon September 13, 1894. Upon the 20th day of November, 1894, the court made and filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law. Throughout these findings no mention is made of any dereliction of duty upon the part of Thompson and Wilson. It is not found that the executive committee, or that any member of the executive committee, or that Thompson, or that Wilson, was or was not negligent, did or did not contrive together or with Thomas to injure and deceive the corporation. The findings are absolutely silent upon all of these material averments. In them, however, is set forth the by-law defining the duties of the president; and the findings proceed to charge the appellant herein, as president, with having himself individually committed acts of negligence, by allowing the cashier to make loans which resulted in a loss to the corporation of the sum of $166,919. It is then found that "from the defendants Robert R. Thompson and Robert A. Wilson, of, for, and on account of said loss, there has in this action been collected the sum of twenty-seven thousand five hundred ($27,500) dollars; leaving a net loss to the bank of the sum of one hundred and thirty-nine thousand four hundred and nineteen ($139,419) dollars." And, under these findings, a judgment is entered that the California National Bank of San Francisco have and recover from the defendant Richard P. Thomas the sum of $139,419, with interest.

There is here an absolute failure by the court to find upon the most material issues of the case,—the joint negligence of the three defendants, which alone it is alleged has occasioned loss to the bank. Such is the cause of action pleaded in the complaint. The findings, if it be conceded that they give evidence of a meritorious cause of action against defendant Thomas, do so because of a showing that he was negligent, not with the other defendants and as a member of the executive committee, but that he was individually and separately negligent in the performance of his duties as president. But this is not the cause of action pleaded against him, and it is well settled that, where the case made out by the findings is a different case from that presented by the pleadings, the judgment will be reversed; for the relief decreed must be the relief sought, and the variance, even if it be such as could have been cured by amendment, is fatal to the validity of the judgment (Bryan v. Tormey, 84 Cal. 126, 24 Pac. 319); and the point may be raised upon appeal from the judgment alone (Putnam v. Lamphier, 36 Cal. 151).

But, while this error would necessitate a reversal, there is yet a more serious objection to be considered. This action, while in form pertaining to equity, is in its cause and substance a legal action to recover damages for tort against the three defendants pleaded as joint tort feasors. "A suit of this character," says Morawetz (Priv. Corp. § 271), "is brought to enforce the corporate or collective rights, and not the individual rights, of the shareholders. It may therefore properly be regarded as a suit brought on behalf of the corporation, and the shareholder can enforce only such claims as the corporation itself could enforce. Moreover, the essential character of a cause of action belonging to a corporation remains the same whether the suit to enforce it be brought by the corporation or by a shareholder. Thus, a legal right of action would not be treated as an equitable one, or become governed by the rules applicable to equitable causes of action as to limitations, etc., because a shareholder has brought suit in equity to enforce it on behalf of the company." In Hun v. Cary, 82 N. Y. 70, just such an action as the one at bar was brought by the receiver of the Central Savings Bank of the City of New York against defendants, who were trustees of the bank, to recover damages which it is alleged they caused the bank by their misconduct as trustees. Objection was made in the appellate court that the cause pertained to equity, and should have been tried before the equity branch of the court, instead of before a jury. The court of appeals used this pertinent language in disposing of the contention: "The receiver in this case represents the bank, and may maintain any action the bank could have maintained. The trustees may be treated as agents of the bank, and for any misfeasance or nonfeasance causing damage to the bank they were responsible to it, upon the same principle that any agent is for like cause responsible to his principal. It has never been doubted that a principal may sue his agent in an action at law for any damages caused by culpable misfeasance or nonfeasance in the business of the agency. The only relief claimed in this complaint was a money judgment, and, we think, was properly tried as an action at law. No equitable rights were to be adjusted, and there was no occasion to appeal to an equitable forum. * * * In actions ex delicto, the plaintiff may sue one, some, or all of the wrongdoers. * * * This claim was purely for unliquidated damages occasioned by a tort." While plaintiff may sue one or all of joint tort feasors, and while he may maintain separate actions against them, and cause separate judgments to be entered in such actions, he can have but one satisfaction. Once paid for the injury he has suffered, by any one of the joint tort feasors, his right to proceed further against the others is at an end. Where several joint tort feasors have been sued in a single action, a retraxit of the cause of action in favor of one of them operates to release them all. The reason is quite obvious. By his withdrawal, plaintiff announces that he has received satisfaction for the injury complained of, and it would be unjust that he should be allowed double payment for the single wrong. It matters not either whether the payment made was in a large or in a small amount. If it be accepted in satisfaction of the cause of action against the one, it is in law, a satisfaction of the claim against them all.

In the case at bar it is disclosed that, after the court had awarded a single judgment, not in separate amounts, but in a lump sum, against the three defendants jointly charged, who were thus found to be jointly liable, the plaintiff accepted from two of them the sum of $27,500 for and on account of the injury and loss which the corporation had sustained, and a judgment of dismissal in their favor was accordingly entered. That this judgment, entered under the stipulation of the parties, was a retraxit, there can be no doubt. Merritt v. Campbell, 47 Cal. 542. The findings disclose that payment was made by the two defendants upon account of the judgment ordered against the three jointly, and the release was doubtless in consideration of that payment. Where a joint action is brought against two or more for trespass done, and all are held liable, the judgment must be for joint damages. All legal consequences of a joint judgment must follow. Each is liable for all the damage which the plaintiff has sustained, without regard to their different degrees of culpability, and a release to one discharges all. The plaintiff in this case, by accepting $27,500 from the two defendants for and on account of the joint trespass of the three, and by releasing them, has released his claim against the third. In Urton v. Price, 57 Cal. 270, an action for personal injuries occasioned by the explosion of chemicals was brought against Price, the demonstrator at a lecture. The charge was negligence. Thereupon plaintiff added the Mechanics' Institute, under whose direction the lecture was given, as a defendant. Subsequently plaintiff filed a stipulation discontinuing and dismissing the action as to the defendant the Mechanics' Institute. Thereafter the defendant Price filed an amended answer, setting forth that, after the commencement of the action, plaintiff had accepted $500 from the Mechanics' Institute for and on account of the injury he had received, and had dismissed the suit as to the institute. Judgment was entered in the trial court that plaintiff had received satisfaction for his injuries, and, upon appeal to this court, it was held that this constituted a release of plaintiff's claim against Price. In Tompkins v. Railroad Co., 66 Cal. 163, 4 Pac. 1167, plaintiff sued the Sutter Street Railroad Company and the Clay Street Hill Railroad Company for damages for personal injury, alleging that it was occasioned by their joint negligence. The court refused to instruct the jury as follows: "The defendant Clay Street Hill Railroad Company, by its supplemental answer, avers that plaintiff has released and discharged the Sutter Street Railroad Company. If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff has received any sum of money whatever from the defendant Sutter Street Railroad Company, as compensation for the injuries received by her, and has released and discharged the defendant the Sutter Street Railroad Company from all claim for damages arising out of this action, then you are instructed to bring in your verdict for the defendant the Clay Street Hill Railroad Company." This court reversed the case for the refusal to give this instruction, holding it to be proper, and laying down the rule, as here set forth, and as universally accepted, that the release and discharge of one alleged tort feasor is a bar to further proceedings against the others. In this case it is true that the release is not pleaded by defendant Thomas in any supplemental answer, but the release itself was given after the court, by its order for judgment, had fixed the responsibility and the liability of the three defendants; and the record in this case and the declaration of the findings show that the money was paid for and on account of the loss which the court determined had been sustained by reason of the acts of the defendants. It clearly establishes the release, and the reason for it. Intolerable fraud and oppression could be worked if a judgment such as this, and so obtained, could stand. The circumstances of this case make that manifest. Three men are charged with having committed acts resulting in a loss to the company of $166,000. The complaint avers that these men are each and all financially able to make good the loss. The case is tried, and the court finds them jointly liable. Upon the announcement of the judgment, two go to plaintiff, and purchase their release for a small sum of money, and go free, while the third, who is adjudged by the court to be no more guilty than his fellow defendants, is cast for the whole amount of the loss. Even if the authorities were not, as they are, unanimous upon the subject, the injustice of such a procedure would be reason enough for the creation of a rule. There is no necessity for creating a rule, however, for we are called upon only to announce that which has long been established and universally followed. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to enter a judgment in favor of the defendant Thomas.

PEOPLE v. DE WINTON. (Cr. 108.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 22, 1896.)

ARSON—WHAT CONSTITUTES—OWNERSHIP.

Pen. Code, § 447, defines arson as the willful burning of a building with intent to destroy it. And section 452 provides that it is not necessary that a person other than the accused should have had ownership in the building set on fire; it is sufficient that, at the time of the burning, another person was rightfully in possession. Held, that the owner of a building who was in possession thereof could not be convicted of arson for the burning the same, though the building was so situated as to endanger the lives of the inhabitants of other buildings.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

William W. De Winton was convicted of arson, and from an order arresting judgment the people appeal. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People. Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. This is an appeal by the people from an order arresting the judgment upon a conviction of arson, the question being whether the indictment sufficiently charges the offense. The material part of the indictment is that "the said William W. De Winton on," etc., "at," etc., "did willfully, maliciously, and feloniously, in the nighttime, set fire to and burn a building, namely, a house then situate," etc., "the property of William W. De Winton, with the malicious, willful, and felonious intent then and there to destroy said building." Then follows an averment that said house was situated in such immediate proximity to inhabited buildings, occupied by human beings, as to endanger life, etc., and did then and there threaten the lives of said human beings from said fire, etc. Giving effect to the presumption which the law raises, of identity of person from identity of name (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 25), and it will be observed that the indictment charges the defendant with a burning of his own building. At common law, a man was not guilty of arson in willfully burning his own house, unless the house of his neighbor was thereby also burned; and this even though the burning was with intent to destroy his neighbor's house. 4 Bl. Comm. (Wend. Ed.) 221. Arson has always been regarded as essentially an offense against the security of the dwelling or habitation, rather than against the property (1 Whart. Cr. Law, § 825; 2 Bish. Cr. Law, § 24; People v. Fisher, 51 Cal. 319); and the right to destroy his own dwelling was doubtless founded upon the right which the law accords to a man of making such use of his property as he may see fit, so long as others are not thereby injured (1 Bish. New Cr. Law, § 514). In charging arson, therefore, it was always necessary, at common law, to aver the ownership of the building burned in another; and such is the rule in this country where not changed by statute. For this purpose, one in possession or occupancy of the premises at the time of the offense was deemed the owner, but it was essential that this should be averred and shown to be other than the defendant. State v. Keena (Conn.) 28 Atl. 522. If these principles are to be applied to the present indictment, it is quite obvious that it does not charge arson. It describes the building burned as the property of the defendant, and fails to aver its occupancy or possession by any one; and, being silent, the presumption is that it was in possession and occupancy of the owner. Nor is the pleading in any way aided in this respect by the averment that the house was so situated as that the burning thereof endangered the lives of inhabitants of other dwellings. It may be that this matter would make the indictment good as a charge of attempt to commit arson, but it does not help out the statement of the principal offense. The question, therefore, arises whether our statute has so changed or modified the definition of arson as to avoid this requirement of the common law; and this, we think, must be answered in the negative.

Section 447 of the Penal Code provides: "Arson is the willful and malicious burning of a building with intent to destroy it." If this section stood alone as a definition of the offense, there might be strong ground for holding the statement of the offense in the indictment sufficient, as substantially following the language of the statute. Under that section, literally construed, the burning of any building, of whatsoever character, maliciously and willfully, whether owned or occupied by the defendant or another, would constitute the offense; and the rule of the common law that a man could not be held guilty for burning his own house would be effectually abrogated. But that this result was not contemplated, and no such radical change in the law of arson intended, is, we think, made quite clear from a consideration of section 452, which relates to the same subject. That section provides: "To constitute arson it is not necessary that a person other than the accused should have had ownership in the building set on fire. It is sufficient that at the time of the burning, another person was rightfully in possession of or was actually occupying such building, or any part thereof." This section is manifestly a limitation upon the sweeping terms of section 447, and implicitly contemplates that, to be the subject of arson, the building must be at least the qualified property of another,—must be at least rightfully in the possession or occupancy of another at the time of the offense. And we think that, obviously, this fact was intended to remain, as at common law, a substantive feature of the offense, which is an essential feature of its description, and must be alleged in order to charge the offense. People v. Myers, 20 Cal. 76. In that case, which arose under the statute as it existed prior to the Code (Hitt. Gen. Laws, § 1557), where the definition of arson in the first degree was, like section 447, wholly silent as to the ownership of the burned building, the court, in considering an objection to the sufficiency of the averment as to the ownership of the property, say: "It is essential that the indictment should show that the building burned is the property of another. East, P. C. 1034. And this was so held where the statute, like ours, did not say so in terms. People v. Gates, 15 Wend. 159. The allegation of the ownership of the building burned is a part of the description of the offense. It is a general rule of criminal pleading, as well as a provision of our statute (Cr. Prac. Act, § 239), that the indictment must be direct and certain as it regards the offense charged. In this indictment it is altogether uncertain whether the building burned was the dwelling house of Lemon or the Chinaman. It may be conjectured that it is intended to assert that the general property was in Lemon, and the special property or the possession with an interest was in the Chinaman, and the statement that the Chinaman was then in the dwelling house would aid this conjecture. But the meaning of such an averment, if it were admissible to make such an averment in this form, cannot be left to rest upon conjecture or to be made out by an argument. The defendant must be distinctly informed whose dwelling house he is accused of burning. It is urged in reply that surplusage may be rejected. But no allegation which is descriptive of the identity of what is legally essential to the charge in the indictment can be rejected as surplusage." In People v. Gates, 15 Wend. 163, cited in the last case, it is said in construing the statute of New York defining arson: "The statute does not say in terms that the house, the burning of which in the nighttime constitutes arson in the first degree, shall be the house of another, but such must necessarily be the construction. In defining arson in the third degree, the language is this: 'Every person who shall willfully set fire to or burn in the nighttime the house of another, not the subject of arson in the first or second degree,' shall be adjudged guilty of arson in the third degree. 2 Rev. St. p. 667, § 4. The legislature did not intend to require greater particularity in the offense in the third degree than in the first and second, in both of which the punishment is more severe than in the third. According to the literal construction of the section defining the offense of arson in the first degree, a man might be punished with death for burning his own house in his own possession. I apprehend such was not the intention of the legislature, but that the common law may be called in aid of the definition of the offense, particularly when taken in connection with the section above referred to, defining arson in the third degree. If this qualification should be annexed to the offense of arson in the first degree, it must be equally applicable to the same offense in the second degree; and, testing this indictment by the rules laid down in the books which have been cited, it will be found defective." In People v. Russell, 81 Cal. 617, 23 Pac. 418, this court would seem to have taken the same view of the provisions of the Code. In that case the information charged and described the building as the property of another than the defendant; and, in passing upon an objection to the sufficiency of the pleading in another particular, it is suggested that the information is drawn in accordance with the statute and is good. See, also, People v. Fisher, 51 Cal. 320, where impliedly the same construction was sustained.

From these considerations, we are of opinion that the indictment in this case did not charge defendant with arson, and that the judgment was therefore properly arrested. Order affirmed.

OWENS v. McNALLY. (S. F. 50.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 23, 1896.)

PAROL CONTRACT TO MAKE WILL—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE — CERTAINTY IN PROVISIONS — INTERVENING RIGHTS — STATUTE OF FRAUDS — PART PERFORMANCE.

1. Part performance of a parol contract to make a will in consideration of services, by rendering such services, is sufficient to take it out of the statute of frauds, if the services are of such a peculiar nature that it is impossible to estimate their value in money, and it is evident that the parties did not intend that their value should be so measured.

2. A parol contract by decedent to leave to plaintiff all his property, real and personal, if she would leave her home and thereafter "live with him and care for him," is not so vague and uncertain as to preclude specific performance in an ordinary case; but such performance will not be decreed as against a wife who was married to decedent without notice of such contract, and who was his only heir at law.

3. Plaintiff's remedy in such case is by an action on quantum meruit.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by Maria B. Owens against Alice McNally, administratrix of the estate of Lawrence McNally, deceased. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Buck & Cutler and Frank McGowan, for appellant. Chamberlain & Wheeler and Geo. D. Murray, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal from a judgment, the evidence being brought up for review by a bill of exceptions. The action is prosecuted by Maria B. Owens against Alice McNally, as administratrix of the estate of Lawrence McNally, deceased, and against Alice McNally individually, with whom are joined as defendants all the other heirs at law of said Lawrence McNally. The action was to compel specific performance of a contract averred to have been entered into by and between plaintiff and Lawrence McNally. In the year 1881 plaintiff was 18 years old, and was living with her parents, in the state of Michigan. Lawrence McNally was the brother of plaintiff's mother, and at that time resided in the city of Eureka, in Humboldt county, state of California, where he continued to reside until his death. "In 1881 said Lawrence McNally had never been married, and was fifty-four years old, and in said year he went to the state of Michigan, and then and there represented to plaintiff and to her parents that he was possessed of money and property worth more than $20,000, and that he had no one to care for him, and that he desired that plaintiff should leave her home and parents, and accompany him to California, and thereafter live with him and care for him; and then and there said Lawrence McNally promised and agreed to and with plaintiff that if she would accompany him to California, and live with him and care for him, he would give or bequeath to her all property which he might own at the time of his death." Under this agreement, plaintiff left her home and parents, accompanied Lawrence McNally to California, and from that time until his marriage, in 1893, "lived with him, took care of him, and devoted her time, labor, and energy to caring for his health and comfort, and duly performed all the conditions of said contract on her part to be performed by the terms thereof." The complaint then avers the marriage of Lawrence McNally, his death intestate, and that he left separate estate in real and personal property in the county of Humboldt of a value in excess of $20,000. The court found the contract exactly in the terms of the complaint, as above quoted. It further found that plaintiff had duly performed all the conditions of the contract upon her part to be performed, in accordance with the terms thereof. It found that the contract was in parol, and that it had never been declared or acknowledged by Lawrence McNally in any note or instrument signed by him, or by any person thereunto authorized by him in writing so to do. As matter of law, it concluded that, as the contract was in relation to real property, it was within the statute of frauds; that the services rendered and the care bestowed by the plaintiff under the contract were not of so peculiar or exceptional a nature as that they could not be compensated for in money, and that her performance of these services and her bestowal of this care did not operate as such a part performance as would take the contract out of the operation of the statute of frauds; that the contract was in relation to both real and personal property, and it was therefore to be regarded as an entirety, and could not be enforced as to the personal property. Judgment for defendants properly followed these conclusions of law.

In view of the multitude of cases which have arisen in other states over contracts such as this, it is indeed curious that in nearly 50 years of juridical life these questions should be presented to this court for the first time. The result is, however, that the determination of them is not made difficult by an absence of authority, but rather is made troublesome from a superabundance of cases not always harmonious. Without entering upon any extended review of the authorities, there is, and has been from a very early date, a general concurrence among them upon the proposition that a man may make a valid agreement binding himself to dispose of his property in a particular way by last will and testament, and a court of equity will enforce such an agreement specifically, by treating the heirs as trustees, and compelling them to convey the property in accordance with the terms of the contract. The earlier cases in which this question arose were of two general classes, the one being those cases in which there was an agreement to the making of mutual wills, as the case of Durour v. Perrara, in which Lord Camden, in 1769, decreed that an agreement to make mutual wills, when properly proved, is binding on the parties, and will be enforced by a court of equity. 2 Hag. State Trials, 304. So, in the similar case of Lord Walpole v. Lord Orford, 3 Ves. 402, while Lord Chancellor Loughborough denied specific performance because of the uncertainty and vagueness of the particular contract, the rule and doctrine previously announced by Lord Camden was never questioned, and has continued to be the accepted law to this day. The other class of early cases grew out of promises to make testamentary settlements in consideration of marriage, in consideration of compromises and the like, and such promises, upon clear proof of their execution, have been uniformly enforced. Jones v. Martin, 3 Anstr. 882; Fortescue v. Hennah, 19 Ves. 66; Logan v. Wienholt, 7 Bligh, 1, 53; Goilmere v. Battison, 1 Vern. 48. In Rivers v. Rivers' Ex'rs, 3 Desaus. Eq. 190, the chancellor says: "It appears to me that to make a will in a particular way, on proper considerations, is as much a subject of contract as any other, and he who makes a contract on this subject is as much bound thereby as he would be by any agreement on any other subject. To be sure, the court would be more strict in examining into the nature and circumstances of such agreements than any others, and would require very satisfactory proofs of the fairness and justness of the transaction. I conclude, therefore, that the party had a right to bind himself to make his will in a particular way by an agreement, and the court has the power to enforce the agreement." And in the leading case from New Jersey (Johnson v. Hubbell, 10 N. J. Eq. 332), it is said: "There can be no doubt but that a person may make a valid agreement binding himself legally to make a particular disposition of his property by last will and testament. The law permits a man to dispose of his own property at his pleasure, and no good reason can be assigned why he may not make a legal agreement to dispose of his property to a particular individual, or for a particular purpose, as well by will as by conveyance, to be made at some specified future period, or upon the happening of some future event. It may be unwise for a man to embarrass himself as to the final disposition of his property, but he is the disposer by law of his own fortune, and the sole and best judge as to the manner and time of disposing of it. A court of equity will decree a specific performance of such an agreement, upon the recognized principles by which it is governed in the exercise of this branch of its jurisprudence."

This rule, it may be said without further quotation, is supported by the overwhelming weight of authority. It is so declared in New York, in Parsell v. Stryker, 41 N. Y. 480; Gall v. Gall (Sup.) 19 N. Y. Supp. 332; in Missouri, by Gupton v. Gupton, 47 Mo. 37; in Michigan, in Faxton v. Faxton, 28 Mich. 161; Wright v. Wright, 99 Mich. 170, 58 N. W. 54; in Ohio, in Shahan v. Swan, 26 N. E. 222; in Utah, in Brinton v. Van Cott, 8 Utah, 480, 33 Pac. 218; in Nebraska, in Kofka v. Rosicky, 59 N. W. 788; in Georgia, in Maddox v. Rowe, 23 Ga. 434,—while by the federal courts it is said in Jaffee v. Jacobson, 1 C. C. A. 24, 48 Fed. 24, "We concede the law to be that a court of equity will specifically enforce a promise to leave to another the whole or a definite portion of one's estate, as a reward for peculiar personal services rendered or other acts done by the promisee, which are not susceptible of a money valuation, and were not intended to be paid for in money, provided the consideration has been substantially received at the promisee's death." And the supreme court of the United States, in Townsend v. Vanderwerker, 160 U. S. 171, 16 Sup. Ct. 258, enunciates the same doctrine. Under these authorities it is held—and it is the generally accepted rule—that while the payment of the purchase price, or the rendition of services, where a contract is within the statute of frauds, is not usually such a part performance of a verbal agreement as will relieve the contract from the operation of the statute, nevertheless, if the services are of such a peculiar character that it is impossible to estimate their value by any pecuniary standard, and it is evident that the parties did not intend to measure them by any such standard, and if the plaintiff, after the performance of the services, could not be restored to the situation in which he was before the rendition of the services, it is such a part performance of the verbal agreement as will remove the contract from the rule, and equity, where other objections are not present, will decree specific performance. But in such cases the reason for the interposition of equity is quite obvious. Plaintiff has rendered service of extraordinary and exceptional character,—such service as, in contemplation of the parties, was not to be compensated for in money, and, as in contemplation of law, cannot be compensated for in money. Therefore by no action at law could a plaintiff be restored to his original position. It would be in the nature of a fraud upon him to deny him any relief, and, the law failing by reason of its universality, equity, to promote justice, makes good its imperfections. Wat. Spec. Perf. Cont. § 41; Pom. Spec. Perf. § 114. But the question whether relief should be granted or denied in a particular case addresses itself peculiarly to the conscience of the chancellor, and, before a plaintiff entitles himself to it, many considerations enter, and are to be weighed. The specific performance must not be objectionable upon other grounds. The contract, therefore, must be definite and certain, and the remedy asked for must not be harsh or oppressive, or unjust to innocent third parties, or against public policy, or equity will, with propriety, withhold its assistance.

We are justified in considering the terms of this contract to be as pleaded by plaintiff, and as found by the court. As to the services to be rendered by plaintiff, those were that she should leave her home and parents, accompany McNally to California, "and thereafter live with him and care for him." There is here much vagueness and uncertainty as to how long she was to live with him; as to what kind of service she was to render to him. Where a contract such as this, resting in parol, and sought to be enforced after the death of the other party to it, comes before a court of equity for review, it is scrutinized, and should be scrutinized, with particular care, and only upon a satisfactory showing that it is definite and certain and just will it be enforced. The proofs of the contract should be clear, and the acts of the claimant referable alone to the contract. Ackerman v. Ackerman's Ex'rs, 24 N. J. Eq. 587. Neither the length of time which plaintiff was to spend in living with and caring for the intestate is made certain, nor the kind or character of the services which she was to render. What position she was to occupy in his household is not made plain. Whether she was to remain there in the capacity of daughter, housekeeper, or menial servant, is in doubt. In the very similar case of Lisk v. Sherman, 25 Barb. 435, the contract was that the plaintiff was to live with and take care of the testatrix as long as the latter lived, and at her death plaintiff was to have all her property. This case arose in New York, which recognizes the rule as we have given it. The court said that the uncertainties connected with the agreement forbade the idea that any pecuniary amount of compensation for the plaintiff's services could have been in the mind of either of the parties, but that the services to be rendered were uncertain, both in respect to the time they were to continue, and as to their character and extent. For these reasons the court refused specific performance, and left the plaintiff to her action at law upon quantum meruit. So, also, in Shakespeare v. Markham, 10 Hun, 311, affirmed in 72 N. Y. 400, personal services were to be rendered upon an oral contract, and to be compensated for by a devise of all the property. The court held the services to be so uncertain in their character, not only with respect to the time of their continuance, but in regard to their nature and character, and the compensation to be made for them to be so uncertain, that the contract was one which a court of equity would not be under the necessity of compelling specific performance of. On the other hand, it must be said that, looking to the evidence which supports the finding as to the nature of the services to be rendered, it fairly appears that the plaintiff entered the household of Lawrence McNally, and took and occupied the station which would have belonged to his daughter. There is thus in plaintiff's bill an omission of a term favorable to herself, which her evidence makes out; and for this reason, if this were the sole objection, the court might not be justified in withholding relief. Pom. Spec. Perf. § 137.

But we pass to a much more serious question,—whether specific performance, if decreed in this case, would not be harsh and oppressive and unjust to innocent third parties. As was well said in the leading case of Johnson v. Hubbell, supra: "The complainant has a right to the protection of this court, and its aid in enforcing and protecting his rights; but if that protection and aid cannot be afforded him without invading and disregarding the rights of others, this court may not, in its anxiety and desire to relieve one party, inflict a wrong and injury upon another, entirely innocent in the transaction." This is the precise situation presented by the peculiar facts of this case. Lawrence McNally married, and at his death left surviving him his widow, one of the defendants in this action. Marriage is a contract viewed by the law with such especial favor, and the family relation is one so deep seated at the root of our institutions, that contracts in restraint of marriage are void as against public policy, while anything which tends to prevent marriage, or to disturb the marriage state, is viewed by the law with suspicion and disfavor. The defendant widow married McNally in ignorance of the contract, and, it appears, continued in ignorance of the contract until after his death. She acquired distinct rights of heirship and succession. There might have been children born of the marriage, with similar rights. It it true that these rights vested after the contract was made, but, where a bill is brought for the specific performance of a contract, the after-acquired rights of third parties are equitable considerations to be regarded in adjudicating the questions. Curran v. Water Power Co., 116 Mass. 90; 5 Wait, Act. & Def. 775. A specific performance of this contract cannot, therefore, be decreed without sweeping aside, as of no moment or avail, the rights of the wife and widow, vested under a contract most strongly favored by the law. Specific performance, as we have said, is not to be decreed under strict rule and formula. Every consideration which may properly be urged upon the court is to be weighed and passed upon, and it will be decreed only when no other adequate relief is available to plaintiff, and even then it will be denied if it operates by way of a hardship upon the innocent. So, while this contract was not void, as against public policy, at the time it was entered into, it must be held that the parties to it contracted in view of the fact that a subsequent marriage by Lawrence McNally might be consummated, and that the effect of this marriage would be to compel a court of equity, in justice to the widow or children, to deny specific performance. Or, viewed in another way, it must have been within the contemplation of the parties that Lawrence McNally might marry; for the contract could not have been designed as a restraint upon his marriage, or it would be void. If it was within their contemplation, and the contract embraced the taking of the deceased's entire estate to the exclusion of any future wife or child, then we have no hesitation in saying that the contract was void as against public policy. The only permissible conclusion is, therefore, that the parties contracted in contemplation of that event. Upon its happening the rights of innocent third parties intervened, and a decree of specific performance could not be awarded. Gall v. Gall (Sup.) 19 N. Y. Supp. 332. The trial court, as has been said, found that the contract in question rested in parol. It is claimed that this finding is error, and that the trial court likewise committed error in rejecting offered evidence of a letter written and signed by Lawrence McNally, and containing the contract here in suit. Whether or not the court committed error in its ruling need not be considered. The statute of frauds and perjuries requires a writing to evidence the making of certain kinds of contracts, but, if this particular contract were in writing, the position of appellant would not be bettered. A written contract, such as this, for the reasons we have discussed, would not strengthen appellant's position, nor entitle her to the relief sought. The court by its decree denied plaintiff specific performance. We think the decree was just, and that plaintiff, for her recovery, must resort to an action on quantum meruit. The judgment is affirmed.

BUCKLEY v. SILVERBERG. (S. F. 156.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 7, 1896.)

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—OSTENSIBLE AGENCY—TRIAL.

1. Plaintiff sold cattle to one claiming to be acting as agent for defendant, and paying by draft drawn on defendant. He had made similar sales previously, and the defendant had paid, and before the one in question the buyer had telegraphed defendant as to the price to be paid for a portion of the cattle, the message and answer being shown plaintiff. The cattle were received, and used by defendant, who refused, however, to pay the draft. Held, that without regard to the actual relations between defendant and the buyer, under Civ. Code, § 2300, providing that "an agency is ostensible when the principal intentionally, or by want of ordinary care, causes a third person to believe another to be his agent," defendant was liable for the price of the cattle.

2. It is not competent for a party to go into a collateral matter on cross-examination, and afterwards rebut the testimony so called out.

3. Either party is entitled to have an instruction given on his theory of the case, if there is any evidence to support it.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by C. F. Buckley against S. Silverberg. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. M. Osmont, for appellant. Mullaney, Grant & Cushing, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This action was brought to recover from the defendant the sum of $1,032, the price of certain calves and beef cattle sold by plaintiff to defendant. A jury trial was had, and plaintiff obtained a verdict and judgment for said sum, with interest from March 5, 1894; and from said judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant appeals.

Defendant is a wholesale butcher doing business in San Francisco; and plaintiff also resides in said city, but owns a ranch at Goshen, in Tulare county, and had cattle thereon. Con O'Neill was plaintiff's manager and agent at the ranch, which is distant from the city about 240 miles. On February 28, 1894, L. D. Whitt, whom plaintiff alleges was the agent of defendant, called at the ranch, and proposed to buy a lot of 36 calves. O'Neill asked $10 per head for them. Whitt said, "I cannot pay that much, but I will go down and telegraph to Mr. Silverberg, and see what he can pay for them." He thereupon sent to Silverberg the following telegram: "Can give you car calves, average two hundred and thirty, ten dollars. Wire me. L. D. Whitt,"—and received the following reply: "You can pay only nine dollars. They must be fat. S. Silverberg." Whitt then offered nine dollars per head for the calves, and O'Neill accepted the offer. The next day, Whitt looked at some steers, for which O'Neill wanted 5½ cents per pound. Whitt again telegraphed Silverberg as follows: "March 1, 1894. Will ship car calves to-night. What can I pay for car fat steers? Will average five hundred and fifty. Answer here at once." Under same date, Silverberg replied: "Market low. Cattle must be prime and fat to pay five cents. If not fat, do not buy." Mr. O'Neill testified that he saw the first telegram and the reply, and, as to the second, Whitt told him that he got a message that he could only pay 5 cents for good beef, and after looking at the cattle a second time he said he would give $29.50 per head for the steers, and this offer was accepted, and Whitt gave him a draft on the defendant for $1,032, the full amount of both purchases. O'Neill further testified that in making these sales he acted as agent for the plaintiff, and that Whitt "said he was buying the cattle for Mr. Silverberg," the defendant. Mr. Whitt notified the defendant by telegram, on March 2d, of the shipment of both lots, and they arrived on the 3d, and were received by the defendant, who saw them as they were being driven to his stock yards. Mr. Whitt came with the cattle to Oakland, and later in the day came to defendant's office, and was informed by telephone from the stock yards by the defendant that the cattle were not worth the amount of the draft drawn in favor of the plaintiff, and he would not pay it. Mr. Whitt then said he would go and see the plaintiff, "and see what could be done;" but he did not find the plaintiff, and left town without seeing him. Later, on the same day, the defendant called on the plaintiff, and plaintiff's version of the interview is as follows: "Silverberg called at my office on the 3d of March, and informed me in very strong language that this man Whitt had about played the devil with him. I said, 'What about it?' He said he had been buying cattle for him (Silverberg), and that he had bought them entirely too high. And I wondered why he should tell me about the matter. I said, with some surprise, 'Whose cattle were they?' And he said, 'They are your cattle.' I said I had not heard a word.

about it. Neither had I then. Then he told me these cattle had been bought by Mr. Whitt contrary to his instructions, and that he would not pay the draft. I said, 'I guess you will have to pay the draft, if they are my cattle.' He then said that my man and Whitt were, no doubt, in 'cahoots'; and I got angry then, and told him my man would not do anything of the kind." The plaintiff further testified, on cross-examination, that there had been some little transactions between O'Neill and Mr. Whitt which were paid by drafts on defendant, which were duly honored; and, referring to the interview above quoted, he further testified that defendant said that Mr. Whitt never was his agent, and plaintiff then asked him why he had honored his drafts previously. On March 4th, defendant wrote Mr. Whitt, at Tucson, Ariz., in relation to other matters, and added: "I saw Dr. Buckley to-day, and explained matters to him. He said, however, the draft must be paid. Now, I do not want to quarrel with him, and so will pay the draft. In this connection, will say, when you return I want you to call and see me; and in the meantime do not draw any drafts on me, as I will not pay them. There is nothing in it, either for you or for me, in buying cattle and paying more than they are worth. These cattle and calves will, I am sure, fall short about $150. When I see you, we will see what arrangements can be made, as I would like to see you make a little money, but you cannot do it the way matters stand now." On the 5th, defendant commenced slaughtering the cattle, and, not finding them as good as he had thought they were, refused to pay the draft,—which was payable that day,—but went on and slaughtered and disposed of all of them, and has paid nothing on account of them except the freight, which was to be paid by the purchaser. The deposition of Mr. Whitt was read by the plaintiff, in which he testified that he acted for defendant in making the purchase. "I considered I was acting for Mr. Silverberg. Q. 'Considered' does not answer the question. Were you, or were you not, acting for Mr. Silverberg? A. I certainly was." From the cross-examination of Mr. Whitt, it appears that he commenced shipping cattle to the defendant in November, 1893; that defendant knew that witness did not have a dollar to pay for cattle, and defendant was to advance liberally on cattle that were shipped. Defendant was then slaughtering cattle on commission; that is, he would retain the hides, tallow, tongues, and offal, and account for the proceeds of the carcasses. No instance appears in which Whitt paid any money for cattle, but payments were made by drafts drawn on defendant, and usually made payable on a day named, allowing sufficient time for the shipment to reach defendant on or before the day of payment. In two or three instances, however, the cattle were paid for by defendant at once by draft, without giving time for their arrival. Defendant charged Whitt, upon his books, with the drafts paid, and the freight, and credited him with the sales of the beef; and in case of calves, which were sold with the hides on, a commission of one dollar per head would be charged. The practical result of this arrangement, so far as compensation to each was concerned, was that defendant had the hides, tallow, tongues, and offal, and Mr. Whitt had any profit that should remain after deducting drafts and freight paid by defendant; and the form of the account was the same as it would be in case the owner had sent his cattle to be slaughtered on commission, the only difference being that in Whitt's account the amount paid for the cattle became a charge in the account. The evidence on the part of the defendant is in sharp conflict with the evidence on the part of the plaintiff as to an agency in fact, and also as to the conversation between the plaintiff and defendant, plaintiff's version of which has been given. The telegrams sent to Whitt in relation to the purchase of the calves and cattle from plaintiff's agent were explained by saying that the object was to inform Mr. Whitt of the state of the market, and were such replies as he sent to any one desiring information, and that the object of having drafts made payable at a date which would enable the shipment to arrive was that defendant might inspect the cattle, and see whether they were of sufficient value to justify the payment of the draft.

The principal question presented is whether the evidence justifies the verdict. There is no conflict in the evidence as to the facts immediately connected with the sale made by plaintiff's agent. As to whether Whitt was in fact the agent of Silverberg, there is a direct and material conflict, if the conclusions of Whitt, upon the one hand, and Silverberg, upon the other, drawn from the same circumstances, are considered. There was no misunderstanding between them as to what each was to do, but, as to what relation between them was thereby constituted, they came to opposite conclusions. In the view we take of the case, it is not necessary to consider whether Whitt was in fact defendant's agent. It is sufficient to say that, so far as third parties were concerned, that part of the business open to their observation was consistent with the existence of an agency; and, as to the transaction in question, plaintiff's agent was fully justified in believing that Whitt was dealing with him as defendant's agent. "An agency is ostensible when the principal intentionally, or by want of ordinary care, causes a third person to believe another to be his agent who is not really employed by him." Civ. Code, § 2300. The fact that Whitt, before purchasing either the calves or the cattle, telegraphed the defendant to know what he could pay, and received in reply instructions or information so worded as to clearly show that defendant was not only interested in the purchase in some way, but that he controlled the price to be paid, would naturally lead any one to believe that he was in fact the purchaser; and, though the defendant may not have intended to hold Whitt out as his agent, he certainly did not exercise ordinary care to prevent O'Neill from believing that he was the principal, and Whitt merely his agent. He knew that Whitt, on two previous occasions, had given O'Neill drafts for purchases, drawn in favor of the plaintiff, which he had paid without question, and that Whitt had neither money nor credit to make the purchase on his own account, and that a draft would be drawn upon him by Whitt for the full amount of the purchase. As a business man, the defendant must have known that a draft upon him would not be received, and the property delivered, if the seller knew that its payment depended upon his estimate of the value of the cattle after their arrival in San Francisco, and therefore was only an advancement to Mr. Whitt, and that the natural inference of the seller would be that Whitt was the agent of defendant, and purchasing for him. If anything further were necessary to put the defendant on his guard, the wording of the telegrams sent him by Whitt should have led him to an explicit statement in reply, to the effect that it made no difference to him what Whitt paid for the cattle, but he would not pay drafts for more than he thought, upon inspection, would be realized from sales of the beef.

The defendant was not prejudiced by the rulings of the court in excluding the letter of Mr. Whitt to the defendant in regard to the cattle bought of Wright, nor in excluding the letter of defendant to Whitt of November 30, 1893. The first of these letters directed the defendant to deliver to Mr. Wright the account of sales and net returns of the cattle "shipped by me to you on commission, and which arrived here on January 8, 1894." This is conceded by counsel to be a collateral matter. It was brought out by the defendant, upon the cross-examination of plaintiff's witness Mr. Whitt, that defendant refused to pay the draft for the Wright cattle after their delivery, and that the matter was settled between the defendant and Wright upon terms unknown to him; and he was further asked the general question whether "the cattle involved in this action were bought by you under the same arrangement you had with Mr. Silverberg touching other lots of cattle purchased by you?" To which the witness replied, "Why, I would so consider it certainly." After plaintiff rested, and upon the examination of the defendant in his own behalf, the letter in question was produced and offered in evidence. In the examination in chief, plaintiff put no question to the witness in reference to any other purchase than that involved in this action; and it was not competent to go into a collateral matter upon cross-examination, and afterwards rebut the evidence so called out. The letter from defendant to Mr. Whitt, offered upon the examination in chief of the defendant, related also to collateral matters, and so far as it contained anything illustrating the relations between himself and Mr. Whitt, and their mode of doing business, was a repetition of his oral testimony.

Defendant also excepted to an instruction given to the jury upon the subject of ratification of the acts of an alleged agent by retaining the benefits of the transaction. The objection was that the evidence did not warrant the instruction. We think this exception is not well taken. Defendant knew on the 3d that the draft in favor of the plaintiff was for the full purchase price of the cattle and calves, and that plaintiff claimed that Whitt was defendant's agent in the transaction, and had declared his purpose of holding him liable for the purchase price. He knew that Whitt did not draw against a fund then in his hands, but against the cattle shipped to him, and which he had received. On the next day, March 4th, defendant wrote to Whitt that he would pay the draft, though the cattle would fall short of the amount by $150, rather than have any quarrel with the plaintiff, and on the 5th commenced slaughtering the cattle; and after he had commenced to slaughter them, and thus put it out of his power to restore the property either to Whitt or the plaintiff, he changed his mind, not because he had learned any new fact touching the transaction, but because he found that he had overestimated their value. Having, under these circumstances, slaughtered the cattle, and not only received the profit which he would have derived from slaughtering them on commission, but had the entire proceeds, which, upon any theory as to the relation which in fact existed between him and Whitt, became his upon his assuming the payment of the draft, we think there was evidence which justified the court in giving the instruction excepted to. Either party has the right to have an instruction given to the jury, based upon his theory of the case, if there is any evidence to support it; and the judgment will not be reversed because we may find such evidence insufficient to justify the verdict upon that theory, if it appears that upon other facts, covered by proper instructions, the verdict is right. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BRITT, C.

SPAULDING v. WESSON et al. (S. F. 41.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. July 23, 1896.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—STREETS—DEDICATION—ACCEPTANCE—ESTOPPEL.

1. It appeared that in 1855 and 1856, under certain ordinances, a landowner had a tract subdivided into blocks and lots, with streets delineated thereon, among which was Union street, and a map was made and approved, showing such survey. In 1861 the then owner of defendant's lot made a declaration of homestead upon it, showing it to be bounded on the north by Union street. The conveyance of said lot to defendant, and a declaration of homestead and mortgage executed by him, all described the lot in a similar manner. When Union street was graded, defendant made no objection thereto. After the grading was finished the fences were adjusted to Union street as thus laid out, the street was sewered and paved, and a street railroad was placed thereon, without objection by defendant. Held, that Union street was dedicated to public use as a street, and accepted as such.

2. The fact that, 12 years after the city had caused Union street to be graded, it took steps to declare Union street a public street, and to procure the legal title thereto, cannot operate as an estoppel in pais to defeat a recovery for work done by the contractor who graded the street.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Water H. Levy, Judge.

Action by N. W. Spaulding against J. W. Wesson and others to recover on a street assessment for grading. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellants. W. H. H. Hart and D. H. Whittemore, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to recover on a street assessment for grading Union street from Larkin street to west line of Franklin street, in the city and county of San Francisco, under a contract made on the 4th day of October, 1877, with plaintiff's assignor, J. S. Dyer. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants appeal therefrom, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The cause has been here before, upon an appeal by the plaintiff, and the decision is reported in 84 Cal., at page 141, 24 Pac. 377.

Was Union street, from Larkin street to the west line of Franklin street, on the 25th day of June, 1877,—the date of the resolution of the board of supervisors to order the grading thereof,—a public street of the city and county of San Francisco? This is practically the sole question in the case. It needs no argument to demonstrate that, if that portion of said street was not in fact and law a public street, the board of supervisors was without jurisdiction to order the improvement for the payment of which the assessment involved in this action was made. This question was made an issue in the case, and was solved in favor of the plaintiff by the eighth finding of the court, in the following language: "That Union street, between Larkin and Franklin streets, originally ran through a part of lot No. 15 of the Laguna survey, as designated on the official map of said city and county, but that said portion of Union street was, prior to the 25th day of June, 1877, dedicated to public use, and was then, and now is, a public street, and not owned by the defendants." This finding is assailed by the appellants as not being supported by the evidence. The answer to the objection thus made is determinative of the case. Some minor questions were made at the trial, which need not be noticed; for, as is well said by counsel for appellants, "they resolve themselves into the question of the right of jurisdiction of the board of supervisors to grade a projected street, only, through private property, and to attempt to assess the owners of the property unlawfully attempted to be taken, to pay for the work." Manifestly, if the alleged street was not private property, but an open, public street, objections predicated upon the theory of its being such private property fall to the ground. The finding is to the effect that the street became such by dedication prior to June 25, 1877. Dedication is the setting apart of land for the public use. To constitute a valid dedication to a public use, it is essential that the acts of the owner be of such a character as to conclude him, and that, as against the public, it be accepted by the proper local authorities, or by general public user. No formal act of dedication by the owner, or of acceptance by the public, is requisite. Any evidence which establishes the intent of the owner to dedicate, and of the public to accept such dedication, is sufficient to establish a common-law dedication to a public use. There was evidence tending to show that the lot of land owned by defendants, designated in the assessment as "Lot 18," and situate at the southwest corner of Union and Polk streets, originally constituted a part of lot 15 of the Laguna survey, conveyed in 1848, by an alcalde grant to Stephen Harris, under whom, by sundry mesne conveyances, defendants hold title. Upon the Laguna survey, so far as appears by the map, no streets were designated or laid off. There were, however, some streets and roads over the tract, and among them a road leading from the city to the Presidio, known as the "Presidio Road," which, from some of the evidence, it is to be inferred, was in part, at least, upon the same ground with Union street. W. S. Dyer, a witness for plaintiff, and the contractor who graded Union street, says the Presidio road was about twenty feet wide, and "ran down the hill in front of Mr. Wesson's [defendants'] lot." The exterior lines of defendants' lot (laguna lot No. 15) included Union street.

The evidence upon which the dedication of the street to public use is based may be summarized thus: In 1855 and 1856, under and pursuant to certain ordinances of the city and county of San Francisco, the land in question here was surveyed, and subdivided into blocks and lots, with streets delineated thereon, among which was Union street, and a map known as the "Van Ness Map" was made and approved, showing such survey, lots, and streets. The old Presidio road seems to have been abandoned soon after, and the streets, as laid out, used in lieu thereof. Some of these streets, owing to natural obstacles, could not be much used until graded and improved, and among these was a portion of Union street. In 1861 the grantor of defendants made a declaration of homestead upon the lot of defendant; showing it to be bounded on the north by Union street, and east by Polk street. The conveyance to defendant J. W. Wesson, and a declaration of homestead and mortgage executed by him, all described the lot in a similar manner; and some of them referred to the Van Ness map, and to Union and Polk streets, as delineated thereon. When Union street was graded, in 1878, by Dyer, the assignor of plaintiff, defendant J. W. Wesson made no objection thereto, but seemed to assent, and directed Dyer to take down a fence which extended into the street, and to place the material in the back yard. After the grading was finished the fences were adjusted to Union street as thus laid out, the street was sewered and paved, and a street railroad placed thereon and operated,—all, so far as appears, without objection by defendants. This would seem ample to warrant the court in finding that Union street was dedicated to public use as a street, and accepted as such by the public and by the municipal authorities. On the other hand, counsel for appellants contend that as in 1891–92 the city authorities took steps to declare Union and the adjoining streets public streets, to procure the legal title thereto, and did in fact receive conveyances from defendants, and other owners of property on Union street, of their rights therein, the city is thereby estopped from saying that the title did not remain in defendants until thus conveyed. We cannot concur in this view. The action of the city, 12 years after it had caused the street to be graded by plaintiffs' assignor, cannot operate as an estoppel in pais against the plaintiff here. We recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

BENNETT v. SUPERIOR COURT OF SAN DIEGO COUNTY. (S. F. 194.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 23, 1896.)

APPEAL—SUFFICIENCY OF BOND.

Upon the execution of a bond on appeal from justice court, reciting that it was the undertaking of C. and N. as sureties, N. failed to appear and justify. Thereupon the bond was signed by G., who qualified, but no change was made in the body of the instrument. Held that, there being no promise on the part of G., the bond was insufficient. Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In bank. Petition by Uriah Bennett for a writ of review, for the purpose of reviewing the action of the superior court of the county of San Diego. Granted.

Wittington & Carter, for petitioner. Rippey & Nutt, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an application for a writ of review. The petitioner asks that the writ issue for the purpose of reviewing the action of the superior court of the county of San Diego in certain litigation then pending before it, as being in excess of its jurisdiction. The salient facts presented by the petition and the return to the writ may be stated as follows: The defendants in a certain action desired to appeal from a money judgment rendered against them before a justice of the peace, and in favor of this petitioner. They filed an undertaking upon appeal, with one Chase and one Newkirk as sureties thereon. Bennett, the respondent, objected to the sufficiency of these sureties; and, at the time fixed for their justification, Chase appeared and justified. Newkirk did not appear. Thereupon the appellants secured one Gassen to attach his name to the undertaking, and he qualified before the justice of the peace in the amount called for by the body of the instrument. Respondent's counsel was present at this time, and expressly reserved his right to object to the proceeding. The papers upon appeal being forwarded to the superior court, respondent there moved to dismiss the appeal, alleging that the court had no jurisdiction over the cause, inasmuch as the undertaking was void. The superior court thereupon allowed appellants to file a new undertaking in that court, and then denied the motion to dismiss.

We attach no importance to the action of the superior court in allowing appellants to file a new undertaking in that forum. As far as any question of the jurisdiction of that court to hear and determine the cause upon its merits was concerned, such action counted for nothing. If the original undertaking was fatally defective, a second could not be filed in the appellate court with jurisdictional effect. If the original undertaking was only defective in matters of minor importance, it was still sufficient to give the court jurisdiction of the cause, and no second undertaking was required. Among other things, section 978 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in speaking of appeals to superior courts, declares: "The adverse party may except to the sufficiency of the sureties within five days after the filing of the undertaking, and, unless they or other sureties justify before the justice or judge within five days thereafter upon notice to the adverse party to the amounts stated in their affidavits, the appeal must be regarded as if no such undertaking had been given." In this case Newkirk, one of the sureties, failed to appear and justify; and if the proceedings had been left in that situation the appeal would necessarily fail, as provided by the law we have quoted. Did the appearance of Gassen in the case cure the trouble? It did not. As the undertaking is presented to us, we are clear that Gassen could not be held liable if a recovery were sought upon it. The body of the undertaking provides: "Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises, and of such appeal, we, the undersigned, E. W. Newkirk and E. F. Chase, of the county of San Diego aforesaid, do hereby jointly and severally undertake, in the sum of one hundred dollars, that said appellants will pay all costs which may be awarded against them on the said appeál, or on a withdrawal or dismissal thereof, not exceeding the aforesaid sum of one hundred dollars, to which amount we acknowledge ourselves jointly and severally bound." It appears that Gassen does not agree to do anything. He makes no promises. He does not acknowledge himself to be bound in any amount, or upon any conditions. His name is simply attached to an undertaking which, upon its face, shows that he is not a party to it. The case of Dore v. Covey, 13 Cal. 502, is not in point. There the name of one of the sureties was omitted from the body of the bond, and the court held the omission immaterial, saying it is not necessary that the names of the stipulators should be inserted in the body of the bond in order to make it obligatory, and, as a necessary conclusion from such holding, declared the omission of the name of one of the sureties from the body of the bond immaterial. That decision is clearly correct. But this is no such case. Here the names of two purported sureties are inserted in the body of the bond, and Gassen's name is not one of them. The insertion of two other names results in the necessary exclusion of his name. It cannot be assumed that his name was intended to be placed there, for there is no room for it. The space which it should occupy is already taken. In effect, his name is expressly excluded. Without an agreement of some kind, upon his part, to be bound, no obligation rests upon him; and here there is no agreement. Newkirk having failed to justify, and Gassen not being bound by the undertaking, the appeal must fail, as lacking in the essential requisite of a valid undertaking.

It becomes unnecessary to notice other objections made by petitioner. The order of the court denying the motion to dismiss the appeal should be annulled, and it is so ordered.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; HENSHAW, J.; TEMPLE, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. Gassen, by signing the bond, became a party to and was bound by it. Dore v. Covey, 13 Cal. 502. The justification was therefore sufficient, and the appeal was duly perfected, irrespective of the action of the superior court in allowing a new bond to be filed.

LADY WASHINGTON CONSOLIDATED CO. v. WOOD et al. (S. F. 69.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1896.)

LIMITATIONS—PLEADING—RELIEF ON GROUND OF FRAUD—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

Plaintiff corporation, by its board of directors, October 1, 1890, accepted a proposition by a mining company to assume a debt due plaintiff from an estate, and give its note for the amount, and agreed, on receipt of such note, to release the estate. The court, on petition of the executor, authorized him to sell the mining company certain property in consideration of its assuming the debt due plaintiff and the release of the estate. The contract was executed. June 4, 1892, the court made a final order of distribution, and discharged the executor. The note given by the mining company was not paid. A petition filed by plaintiff in 1894 against the executor and others, to set aside such release, etc., alleged that the whole transaction was a fraudulent scheme of its directors, the executor, and others, to exempt such estate from payment of its claim; that "it was not informed of and did not know of or discover any of the aforesaid frauds, or the facts connected therewith, until within six months preceding the filing of the complaint"; and that the directors charged with the fraud remained in office until within a year before the action was commenced. Held, that the complaint did not allege facts sufficient to show that the fraud was not discovered more than three years before the complaint was filed, and the right of action was barred, under Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county; Joseph P. Jones, Judge.

Action by the Lady Washington Consolidated Company against W. S. Wood and others to set aside on the ground of fraud a release by plaintiff of a claim held by it and allowed against the estate of Seth Cook, deceased, of which defendant Wood was executor. From a judgment in favor of defendants, entered after demurrers to the petition were sustained, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. T. Baggett, for appellant. Lloyd & Wood, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff presented a claim against the estate of Seth Cook, deceased, of which the defendant Wood was executor, for the sum of $23,540, which, on January 15, 1890, was allowed by the executor and approved by the judge of the superior court, and filed with the clerk. Thereafter the American Mill & Mining Company, a corporation, offered to the plaintiff to assume the said indebtedness of said estate, and to execute its promissory note therefor to the plaintiff, payable 60 days after date, and on October 1, 1890, the board of directors of the plaintiff passed a resolution accepting the said proposition, and authorizing its president and secretary, upon the receipt of said promissory note, to execute to the aforesaid executor a release and satisfaction of its claim against the estate of Cook. After the passage of this resolution the executor presented to the superior court his petition setting forth the said agreement, and asking for an order allowing him to sell and deliver to the said corporation certain property belonging to the estate of Cook, upon the consideration that it would assume the payment of the plaintiff's claim against the estate, and cause the estate to be released therefrom, and after due notice of said petition the court made the order prayed for. Thereupon the American Mill & Mining Company executed to the plaintiff its promissory note for said amount, bearing date October 7, 1890, payable 60 days after date, and the plaintiff executed to the executor a release of its claim against Cook's estate. June 4, 1892, an order was made and entered by the superior court finally distributing the estate of Cook to the defendant Boyd, and discharging the executor from his trust. The plaintiff brought this action to obtain a judgment setting aside the aforesaid release of its claim, that the property distributed to the defendant Boyd be declared chargeable with the payment of said claim, that the decree of distribution be vacated, and that administration of said estate be continued for the purpose of paying said claim.

[1] Rehearing denied.

It is alleged in the complaint herein that the resolution of the plaintiff's board of directors authorizing the release of its claim against the estate of Cook, and the release afterwards executed, the petition of the defendant Wood for the aforesaid order of the court, the execution of the note by the American Mill & Mining Company, and its agreement to assume the indebtedness of Cook, were all made in furtherance of a fraudulent scheme and purpose on the part of certain interested parties to exempt the estate of Cook from the payment of said claim; that the directors of the plaintiff who authorized the said release, and the said executor of the will of Cook, were parties to the same fraudulent scheme; that the estate of Cook was solvent, and fully able to pay the said claim, and that said claim could have been readily collected from his estate; that the said American Mill & Mining Company has not paid said note, or any part thereof, and that the estate distributed to the defendant Boyd is still held by said defendant. The defendants severally demurred to the complaint upon the ground that it does not state a cause of action, and that the cause of action is barred by subdivision 4, § 338, Code Civ. Proc. The demurrers were sustained, and judgment entered in favor of the defendants, from which the plaintiff has appealed. The time at which the action was commenced is not shown by the record, but the appellant states in its brief, and it is not disputed by the respondents, that it was in March, 1894; and, for the purpose of determining the sufficiency of the complaint, that will be assumed as the date when the complaint was filed. The right of a plaintiff to invoke the aid of a court of equity for relief against fraud, after the expiration of three years from the time when the fraud was committed, is an exception to the general statute on that subject, and cannot be asserted unless the plaintiff brings himself within the terms of the exception. It must appear that he did not discover the facts constituting the fraud until within three years prior to commencing the action. This is an element of the plaintiff's right of action, and must be affirmatively pleaded by him in order to authorize the court to entertain his complaint. "Discovery" and "knowledge" are not convertible terms, and whether there has been a "discovery" of the facts "constituting the fraud," within the meaning of the statute of limitations, is a question of law to be determined by the court from the facts pleaded. As in the case of any other legal conclusion, it is not sufficient to make a mere averment thereof, but the facts from which the conclusion follows must themselves be pleaded. It is not enough that the plaintiff merely avers that he was ignorant of the facts at the time of their occurrence, and has not been informed of them until within the three years. He must show that the acts of fraud were committed under such circumstances that he would not be presumed to have any knowledge of them,—as that they were done in secret, or were kept concealed; and he must also show the times and the circumstances under which the facts constituting the fraud were brought to his knowledge, so that the court may determine whether the discovery of these facts was within the time alleged, and, as the means of knowledge are equivalent to knowledge, if it appears that the plaintiff had notice or information of circumstances which would put him on an inquiry which, if followed, would lead to knowledge, or that the facts were presumptively within his knowledge, he will be deemed to have had actual knowledge of these facts. These principles are so fully recognized that mere reference to some of the cases in which they have been enforced will be sufficient. Martin v. Smith, 1 Dill. 85, Fed. Cas. No. 9,164; Wood v. Carpenter, 101 U. S. 135; Hecht v. Slaney, 72 Cal. 363, 14 Pac. 88; Moore v. Boyd, 74 Cal. 167, 15 Pac. 670; Lataillade v. Orena, 91 Cal. 565, 27 Pac. 924. Testing the complaint herein by these rules, it falls far short of showing that the plaintiff is within the exception to the statute, or that its cause of action is not within the apparent bar of the statute. These transactions were had in October, 1890, and their correctness remained unquestioned until March, 1894. In the meantime the estate of Cook was distributed, and its administration closed, and the executor discharged. The only right of action alleged by the plaintiff in its complaint is to be relieved from the effect of its release to the estate of Cook of the claim against that estate which had been allowed by the executor, and to recover the amount of that claim; and the only fraudulent acts to be considered herein are those by which it was induced to execute that release. It was necessary for the plaintiff, therefore, to allege not only the facts constituting this fraud, but also the facts connected with its discovery, so that it might appear from the complaint that the action was not barred by the statute of limitations. The only averment by the plaintiff in this respect is that "it was not informed of and did not know or discover any of the aforesaid frauds, or the facts connected therewith, until within six months preceding the filing of the complaint herein." It is not averred that any of these facts, or the transactions set forth as constituting the fraud, were done secretly, or were concealed from the plaintiff, or that any information which it sought was refused, or that, indeed, it sought to obtain any information upon the subject. On the contrary, it appears from the nature of the transactions themselves that they were open and public. The resolution to execute the release was spread upon the records of the plaintiff at the time it was passed by its board of directors. The petition to the superior court, with a copy of the agreement for a release, and the order of the court thereon, were also public records, open to the inspection of every one. When this petition was filed, public notice thereof was given by the clerk under the order of the court; and upon the execution of the release the plaintiff received the promissory note provided for by the agreement, and the transaction was entered upon the books of its treasurer. The plaintiff ought not now to be permitted to say that it did not discover the transactions when they were spread at large upon its records and books of account.

The plaintiff, however, seeks to avoid the effect of these entries upon its books by the allegation that its directors, who are charged as confederates in the fraud, remained in office, and in the control of its affairs, until within one year prior to the commencement of the action, "and plaintiff was afforded no opportunity through innocent and honest directors to look into and ascertain the facts herein set forth, until within one year prior to the filing of the complaint herein." Whether the plaintiff was afforded an opportunity, through innocent and honest directors, to look into and ascertain the facts set forth in the complaint or not, is unavailing to relieve it from the effect of the delay. The plaintiff is but the representative of its stockholders, and can have no rights in the matter other than in behalf of its stockholders; and, if all of the stockholders authorized the release, the plaintiff was not defrauded. It does not appear from the complaint that at the time of the transactions complained of there were any stockholders of the plaintiff other than those who authorized the release. If there were other stockholders, they were chargeable with knowledge of all the acts of the directors which were spread upon the records of the corporation, and of all the facts connected therewith that the inquiry suggested thereby would have disclosed. Between the time that these transactions were had and the commencement of this action more than three years elapsed, and it is to be presumed that there were three annual meetings of the stockholders during that time, at each of which they could have ascertained all of the facts connected with the release. Whether they did ascertain them, and made no objection thereto, or whether they neglected to inform themselves, is immaterial. They cannot be permitted to question their validity after the lapse of more than three years from the time when they should have ascertained them. Nor can the plaintiff, as their representative, claim that, with such opportunities for ascertaining the facts, it had no opportunity to ascertain them. "The shareholders of a corporation cannot avoid responsibility for the unauthorized acts of their agent by abstaining from inquiry into the affairs of the company, or by absenting themselves from the company's meetings, and at the same time reap the benefit of their acts in case of success." Underhill v. Improvement Co., 93 Cal. 312, 28 Pac. 1049. City of Oakland v. Carpentier, 13 Cal. 540, is not in contravention of this proposition. The frauds there alleged were not matters of record, or a written agreement openly executed, but were charged to result from a secret agreement for the purpose of accomplishing an act fraudulent in itself. The action was against Carpentier, who had been elected as one of the trustees of the plaintiff, and was charged to be in the enjoyment of the property which the plaintiff had chosen him to protect, and the court was discussing what would be the effect of the ordinance if it were shown that its passage had been procured by Carpentier for his own benefit, while dealing with the town of which he had been elected a trustee. These facts were not alleged in the complaint, and the language of the court which is quoted by the appellant is prefaced by the condition, "if these facts be made to appear," and is, therefore, clearly obiter. It appears from the opinion given when the case came before the court (21 Cal. 665) that the facts were not made to appear, as his complaint was not amended. The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. RICHTER. (Cr. 156.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1896.)

CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL BY STATE.

An appeal from an order granting defendant's motion to set aside an information for a felony will be dismissed; such order not being included in Pen. Code, § 1238, which prescribes the cases in which an appeal may be taken by the people.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Lassen county; W. T. Masten, Judge.

One Richter was charged with a felony, and from an order setting aside the information the people appeal. Dismissed.

Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the State. Shinn & Shinn, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. After the district attorney had filed in the superior court an information against the defendant, accusing him of a felony, the defendant moved the court to set the same aside, on various grounds, and his motion was granted. From this order the people have appealed. The defendant objects to the hearing of the appeal, upon the ground that the order is not appealable. Section 1238 of the Penal Code prescribes the cases in which an appeal may be taken by the people, and the present order is not included therein. The appeal is dismissed.

KILBRIDE v. MOSS et al. (S. F. 19.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 23, 1896.)

GUARANTY—COLLATERAL UNDERTAKING—ORIGINAL CONTRACT—STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

1. Defendant was an officer of a corporation, and a large stockholder therein. To relieve the demands of other creditors, defendant urged plaintiff to invest $1,500 in the capital stock of the corporation, and it was verbally agreed between defendant and plaintiff that plaintiff should purchase the stock, pay the money therefor to the company, and, in the event that the stock became worthless, defendant would pay to plaintiff the said sum of $1,500. Held, that defendant's undertaking was an original contract, and not within the statute of frauds.

2. To make a promise a contract of guaranty, there must be a primary liability of a third person to the promisee, which continues after the promise is made.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Action by J. J. Kilbride against Franklin Moss, an incompetent person, and George D. Metcalf, as guardian of his estate, on a contract. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. M. Gibson, Welles Whitmore, and Reed & Nusbaumer, for appellants. R. M. Fitzgerald and C. H. Abbott, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to recover $1,500 under the following circumstances: The California Lustral Company was a corporation duly organized under the laws of the state of California. Defendant Franklin Moss was a large stockholder therein, a director and vice president of the company, and, with another, held a mortgage upon the property of the company. The corporation was indebted to sundry creditors, some of whom were pressing payment. Plaintiff had $1,500, and defendant Moss proposed to him to purchase therewith 6,000 shares of the capital stock of the corporation, and at first offered to secure him therefor by a second mortgage on the corporate property. This offer was declined. Thereupon it was verbally agreed between plaintiff and defendant that the plaintiff should purchase the 6,000 shares of stock, pay $1,500 therefor to the company, and, in the event that the stock became worthless, or of no value, he, the said defendant, would return and pay to plaintiff the said sum of $1,500. This was on the 25th of May, 1891. Plaintiff purchased the stock, paid therefor the $1,500, which was used in payment of company debts. In 1892, the capital stock of the corporation having become worthless and of no value, plaintiff offered to return the same to defendant and demanded payment of the $1,500, all of which was refused. Plaintiff thereupon brought this action, and obtained judgment for said $1,500, from which judgment, and from an order denying his motion for new trial, defendant appeals.

At the trial defendant's counsel objected to all evidence tending to show a verbal guaranty by defendant of the stock or its value. The objection was overruled, and the ruling is assigned as error. A guaranty is defined by section 2787 of the Civil Code as follows: "A guaranty is a promise to answer for the debt, default or miscarriage of another person." Under section 2793 of the Civil Code a guaranty, save in the cases excepted by the following sections, "must be in writing and signed by the guarantor; but the writing need not express a consideration." Under section 1624 of the same Code "a special promise to answer for the debt, default or miscarriage of another" (except as provided in section 2794) is void, unless the contract or some note or memorandum thereof be in writing, and subscribed by the party to be charged, or by his agent. Appellant contends that defendant was a guarantor, and that the action is brought against him as such. The complaint sets out the facts much as we have stated them, but more in detail, and more fully. If these facts constitute him a guarantor, the contention of appellant is sound, but, if the converse of the proposition is maintained, defendant is neither a guarantor nor surety. Much learning has been exhibited, many fine distinctions drawn, and, we may add, a good deal of discrepancy is to be found upon some of the many branches of the law relating to guaranty. The present case, however, seems to us to involve but a single, plain, fundamental principle, not calling for extended discussion. It is this: The contract of guaranty is a collateral undertaking. It cannot exist without the presence of a main or substantive liability to which it is collateral. If there is no such substantive liability on the part of a third person, either express or implied,—that is to say, if there is no debt, default, or miscarriage, present or prospective,—there is nothing to guaranty, and hence can be no contract of guaranty. If there is no primary liability of a third person to the promisee which continues after the promise is made, it is an original promise, and need not be in writing. Applying this doctrine to the case at bar, and we fail to discern any primary liability on the part of any one to the plaintiff upon which to base a guaranty. The corporation from which he purchased the shares of capital stock owed him no duty in the premises after such purchase was consummated, except the general obligation to him, in common with all other shareholders, to fairly and impartially conduct the business of the company in such manner as would best promote the interests of all concerned. The corporation simply sold him 6,000 shares of its stock, and received payment therefor. This closed the incident so far as the company was concerned. It was the defendant who entered into contract with him, whereby, as an inducement for plaintiff to purchase, he promised to refund his money should the stock become worthless. This was an original contract. Moorehouse v. Crangle, 36 Ohio St. 130, is in point. There C., who was a large stockholder of a business corporation, and president thereof, verbally promised M. that, if he would subscribe and pay $500 to the capital stock of the company, he should, within one year, receive 15 per cent. on the amount invested. M., in consideration of this promise, subscribed and paid for the stock. No dividends were made or earned within the year. Held that this was not a contract to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, but an original contract, upon the proof of which plaintiff was entitled to recover. Johnson, J., in discussing the case, said: "The terms of the statute make it clear that a collateral promise, or one to answer for the liability of another, is one where there is a debt or obligation of another than the promisor for whose default he undertakes to be liable. An original liability of another is the foundation of the collateral liability of the promisor. * * * If this contract is not within the statute of frauds, the plaintiff is entitled to recover, as it is not doubted but that the consideration stated is sufficient. Was there any debt, obligation, or legal duty, express or implied, owing by the corporation to the plaintiff as a stockholder, for which the defendant undertook to answer upon default of the corporation?" The learned judge, after defining the duties of the corporation to its stockholders, adds: "The defendant did not undertake to answer for any debt, default, or miscarriage by the corporation growing out of a failure to perform any of these duties. * * * Defendant's contract was, in legal effect, essentially different from the obligations of the corporation in favor of plaintiff as a stockholder, and the liability created was wholly independent of any default by the corporation. It was not an undertaking to answer for the default of the corporation." In Hill v. Smith, 21 How. 283, plaintiff had sold land to a railroad company, receiving in payment therefor the stock of the company, which the defendant guarantied should be at par within three years. This was held an original, and not a collateral, contract. Stress was laid by counsel upon the use of the word "guaranty" in the contract as importing a collateral agreement, but the court held that the term, when taken in connection with the other provisions of the agreement, showed it to be an original contract. Green v. Brookins, 23 Mich. 48, is to like effect. See, also, notes to Forth v. Stanton, 1 Saund. 211. Applying the reasoning of these cases to the case in hand, and the question involved is solved in favor of plaintiff.

Objections are urged to the sufficiency of the evidence to support some of the findings. These questions need not be discussed, for the reason that there was clear and unequivocal evidence in favor of plaintiff upon each and every of the issues. That defendant's testimony contradicted some of it is not cause for disturbing the findings of the court. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

MARTIN v. MARTIN et al. (Sac. 169.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1896.)

NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—STATEMENT BY COURT—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE—JUDICIAL DISCRETION—REVIEW.

1. The superior court need not specify the grounds for granting a new trial; and, where it has not done so, its action is to be reviewed on the record on which the order was made, and will be sustained if it would, under any circumstances, authorize it to grant a new trial.

2. The superior court is authorized to grant a new trial, if, in its opinion, the verdict is against the weight of the evidence.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Ansel Smith, Judge.

Action by Thomas F. Martin against Elizabeth Martin and others for the revocation of the probate of the will in the matter of the estate of Uriah Martin, deceased. From an order granting defendants a new trial, after a verdict in favor of plaintiff and an order revoking the probate, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Jas. A. Louttit, for appellant. Nicol & Orr, Nutter & De Vries, and J. H. & J. E. Budd, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Within one year after the last will of the decedent had been admitted to probate, the appellant filed his petition for the revocation of the probate. Upon issues made by the answer of the respondents, the cause was tried before a jury, who found, upon certain special issues submitted to them, in accordance with the petition, and thereupon the court made its order revoking the probate. Respondents thereupon moved for a new trial, which was granted, and the petitioner has appealed from the order. One of the grounds upon which the motion was made is the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and the motion was heard upon a statement of the case, in which the evidence is set out at length. The order of the court is, in general terms, granting a new trial, without specifying the grounds of its action; and, in support of the order, we may assume that it was made upon the ground of such insufficiency of evidence. The Code does not require the court to specify the grounds which govern its action in granting or refusing a new trial; and, even when such provision was contained in the statute, it was held to be merely directory. Borkheim v. Insurance Co., 38 Cal. 505. Its action is to be reviewed upon the record on which the order was made, and will be sustained if the matters contained in that record would, under any circumstances, authorize it to grant a new trial. Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 269, 29 Pac. 481.

Counsel for appellant has discussed at length the right of the trial court to disregard the verdict of a jury upon a conflict of evidence, and has cited many decisions from other states in support of the proposition that such right does not exist unless the verdict is plainly contrary to the weight of evidence. But the rule in this state is too firmly established to admit of discussion, that the superior court is authorized to grant a new trial if in its opinion the verdict is against the weight of the evidence. Its action in so doing is the exercise of a legal discretion which has been confided to it, and, like the exercise of any other legal discretion, can be reviewed by this court only when it is made to appear that the discretion was abused. Domico v. Casassa, 101 Cal. 411, 35 Pac. 1024, and cases there cited. It is sufficient to say that the record herein fails to show such abuse, or that the trial court acted otherwise than in the exercise of a legal discretion in its estimate of the testimony before the jury. As the case is to be again tried, it would not be proper for us to point out what may have been the grounds of its action, or to indicate our views of the testimony. The order is affirmed.

BACHMAN v. CATHRY et al. (L. A. 78.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1896.)

CHANGE OF VENUE—DEFENDANT DESIGNATED BY FICTITIOUS NAME—RESIDENCE—WHEN CONSIDERED—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 474, provides that, when plaintiff is ignorant of the name of a defendant, he must so state in the complaint, and such defendant may be designated in any pleading or proceeding by any name, "and when his true name is discovered the pleading or proceeding must be amended accordingly." Held, that where two of three defendants sued in K. county were designated by fictitious names, and an affidavit by the other for change of venue stated that he and his co-defendants were residents of I. county when suit was commenced, affidavits by plaintiff that such co-defendants, described by their true names, were residents of K. county, could not be considered, in the absence of an amendment of the complaint describing such defendants by their true names.

2. An affidavit, on application for a change of venue, of an attorney, not professing to have any personal knowledge, or any information other than that obtained from the affidavit of service, which stated that defendant was a resident of K. county, will not be considered, as the statement in such affidavit is only hearsay.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Kern county; A. R. Conklin, Judge.

Action by one Bachman against Frank Cathry and others. From an order sustaining a motion to change the place of trial to Inyo county, on the ground that defendants resided in such county, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. M. McNamara, for appellant. W. A. Lamar and J. W. Jameson, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The action was brought in Kern county against Frank Cathry, John Doe, and Richard Roe; and the plaintiff alleges in the complaint that he "is ignorant of the true names of the defendants sued herein under the fictitious names of John Doe and Richard Roe, and asks that, when their true names are discovered, this complaint may be amended by inserting the same in lieu of said fictitious names." The summons was served upon the defendant Cathry, in the county of Inyo, February 28, 1895, and returned to the clerk's office on the 11th of March. March 9th, Cathry gave notice of a motion to change the place of trial to the county of Inyo, upon the ground that at the commencement of the action all of the defendants named in the complaint were residents of said Inyo county; accompanying this notice with his affidavit that at the commencement of the action, and for more than 12 months prior thereto, he and each of his co-defendants were bona fide residents of the county of Inyo. After this notice was given, an alias summons was issued upon the complaint, and on the 13th of March, 1895, was returned with an affidavit indorsed thereon that the same was served by the affiant, on the 12th of March, on "Jean Brun, a then resident of the said county of Kern, and one of the defendants in the above-entitled action, sued therein under the name of John Doe." March 13th a demurrer to the complaint was filed in the action, on behalf of said Brun. Upon the hearing of the motion, in addition to the complaint and the foregoing affidavits, there was presented an affidavit by the attorney for the plaintiff that "it appears from the affidavit of service of summons" that the defendant sued as John Doe is a resident of Kern county, and that "all the defendants in said cause are not residents of the county of Inyo." The motion was heard and submitted April 1st, and, on the 3d of April, counsel for plaintiff requested leave to file affidavits of S. Heineman and Albert Lederer, to which "the court stated that he could file anything he wanted to, but that the motion had been heard and submitted, and thereupon said affidavits were filed in said cause, but not submitted to or considered by the court in determining said motion." In each of these affidavits it is stated that "Jean Brun, one of the defendants in the above-entitled action, sued as John Doe, has been for more than six months continuously last past, a bona fide resident of the county of Kern." No amendment of the complaint was made, nor was Jean Brun made a defendant by having his name substituted in the complaint for that of John Doe. April 8th the court made an order granting the motion, from which this appeal is taken.

Section 474, Code Civ. Proc., provides: "When the plaintiff is ignorant of the name of a defendant, he must state that fact in the complaint, and such defendant may be designated in any pleading or proceeding by any name, and when his true name is discovered the pleading or proceeding must be amended accordingly." In McKinlay v. Tuttle, 42 Cal. 570, it was held that unless such amendment is made a judgment against individuals served under fictitious names cannot be sustained; that, though they appear and answer the complaint, their answer does not waive an amendment of the complaint describing them by their true names. In Rosencrantz v. Rogers, 40 Cal. 489, service had been made upon persons claimed to be sued under fictitious names, and an order setting aside the service was affirmed upon the ground, among others, that the plaintiff did not, in response to the motion, offer to have their names inserted as defendants. Under the principles of these decisions, the court, in considering the action of Cathry, could not consider the residence of Brun until after his name had been inserted in the complaint as one of the defendants. The affidavit of Cathry that at the commencement of the action he and his co-defendants were residents of the county of Inyo entitled him to have his motion granted, unless this fact should be overcome by affidavits on the part of the plaintiff. The plaintiff did not make any affidavit on the motion, and no showing was made by him, or on his behalf, that Brun was the individual intended by the fictitious name of John Doe. The attorney for the plaintiff, whose affidavit was read upon the hearing of the motion, did not profess to have any personal knowledge on the subject, or any information other than that which he obtained from the affidavit of service, and this latter affidavit merely states that Brun was a resident of Kern county at the date of the service. That portion of the affidavit in which it is stated that "Brun is one of the defendants in the action, sued under the name of John Doe," is only hearsay, and was not entitled to be considered. A process server, or an officer, can have no knowledge of the individual intended by the plaintiff under a fictitious name. The further statement of the plaintiff's attorney that all of the defendants are not residents of the county of Inyo was immaterial, unless one or more of them were residents of the county of Kern.

The Code allows a defendant to be sued by a fictitious name only when the plaintiff is ignorant of his name, and, although the individual who is served under such fictitious name may be substituted as a defendant, until such substitution is made the rights of other parties to the action will not be affected by such service, or by his appearance in the suit. The plaintiff made no affidavit upon the subject, and there was nothing before the court from which it could find that either of the defendants was a resident of Kern county. The complaint charged all the defendants with the same act of taking and converting the property of the plaintiff, and the court could assume, in the absence of any other showing, that the defendant who was served would know his associates. If the affidavits, which were filed under leave of the court after the motion had been submitted, had contained matter material to the motion, it would have been an abuse of discretion in the court not to consider them; but, as their purport was merely to show the residence of Brun, they were immaterial, in the absence of any showing that Brun was the individual whom the plaintiff intended to make a defendant in the action. Their statement to that effect was merely hearsay. The order is affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. HAHN. (S. F. 198.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1896.)

ATTACHMENT—RIGHT TO WRIT—SECURITY BECOMING VALUELESS—SALE OF COLLATERAL.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 537, denying to a plaintiff an attachment, where the debt sued for is secured by a pledge of personal property, except where such security has, without any act of the plaintiff or the person to whom the security was given, become valueless, collateral security which has been sold in accordance with the conditions of the pledge, and the proceeds applied on the debt, has become valueless, as security, by act or authority of the defendant, and the holder of the debt is not debarred from an attachment in an action for the amount remaining due.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Napa county; E. D. Ham, Judge.

Action by Williams against Hahn. From an order denying a motion to dissolve an attachment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. E. Miller, for appellant. H. M. Barstow, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The defendant executed his promissory note to W. B. Bourn, November 8, 1890, for the sum of $2,000, payable six months after date, and at the same time delivered to him 27,000 gallons of wine as collateral security for its payment, with authority to the payee, or his assigns, in case of default in the payment of the note, to sell the same and apply the proceeds upon the note. This authority is in the following terms: "Should the note, or any part thereof, or the interest accruing thereon, remain due and unpaid after the same should have been paid according to the tenor of said note, I hereby waive demand of payment of said note, and irrevocably authorize and empower said W. B. Bourn, or his assigns, to sell and dispose of the above-described property, or any part thereof, at public or private sale, with or without notice to me of any such sale, and out of the proceeds of such sale to pay the costs and charges for the storage and care of said property, the charges and costs of such sale, and the principal and interest due upon said note, and to pay over the balance, if any, to me or my representative, upon demand." The defendant did not pay the note at its maturity, and thereafter the plaintiff, to whom the note had been assigned, sold the wine, and applied the proceeds of said sale, after deducting certain charges and expenses, as a payment upon the note. The present action was brought to recover the amount remaining due on the note, and at the commencement of the action a writ of attachment was issued at the instance of the plaintiff. The defendant moved to dissolve the attachment, upon the ground that the note was originally secured by a pledge of personal property, and that the same had not become valueless. It was shown to the court that the wine was sold by the plaintiff for more than its market value at the time of the sale, but it did not appear that the plaintiff gave any notice of the sale. The court denied the motion, and the present appeal is from that order.

By the provisions of section 537, Code Civ. Proc., the plaintiff is not entitled to a writ of attachment if the debt sued for is secured by a pledge of personal property, or, if originally so secured, unless such security has, without any act of the plaintiff or the person to whom the security was given, become valueless. It is contended by the appellant that the latter of these conditions existed in the present case,—that the security (that is, the wine which was pledged) has not become valueless, and that, if the sale of the wine has rendered the security valueless, this was by the direct act of the plaintiff. Upon the sale of the pledged property by the plaintiff, and the application of the proceeds upon the note, the plaintiff ceased to have any security for the payment of the amount then due upon the note, and the "security" originally given had become valueless. The language used in section 537, Code Civ. Proc., is not to be construed as meaning that the property pledged must itself have become valueless, before the plaintiff can have an attachment; but the provision that the "security" must have become valueless must be construed as meaning that the property pledged has ceased to have any value as a security, and, if the property has been disposed of in accordance with the very terms under which it was given and held as a security, the "security" has ceased to exist, and is therefore valueless. The sale by the plaintiff under the authority given by the defendant in the note itself has the same effect as though it had been made under the provisions of the Civil Code. It must also be held that it was by the direction and authority of the defendant that the "security" which existed while the wine was held by the plaintiff became valueless, and that it did not become valueless by the act of the plaintiff. By the terms of the agreement under which the security was given, the defendant had authorized and empowered the plaintiff to sell the wine upon his default in making payment of the note, and the sale thus made must be regarded as made by the direction of the defendant. The plaintiff was not required to give any notice of the sale. The defendant had expressly waived all notice to himself, and had authorized the plaintiff to sell the wine at private sale. The case of Bendel v. Ice Co., 82 Cal. 201, 22 Pac. 1112, is not applicable. In that case the mortgagee was merely empowered to sell the mortgaged property "by proceedings had and taken as in cases of pledges." The mortgagor waived notice to himself of the time and place of sale, but did not authorize a private sale of the property. It was held that the sale should have been at public auction, and upon such notice to the public as is usual at the place of sale in respect to auction sales of similar property, as required by section 3005, Civ. Code. In the present case these provisions were superseded by the agreement of the parties, as well in respect to the notice as to the manner in which the sale should be made. "Conventio vincit legem." The order is affirmed.

VANCE v. ANDERSON et ux. (S. F. 1.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. July 28, 1896.)

EJECTMENT — COMPLAINT — AIDER BY ANSWER — MORTGAGE — WHAT CONSTITUTES.

1. A complaint in ejectment, defective for failure to allege that plaintiff was entitled to possession at the commencement of the action, is cured by a denial in the answer that plaintiff was entitled to possession.

2. Plaintiff held the overdue note of defendants, secured by a mortgage on two tracts of land. Defendants authorized a real-estate agent to induce plaintiff to take a deed for one tract in payment of the debt, and to secure, if possible, an agreement for a reconveyance. Plaintiff took a deed thereto, the consideration being the amount of the debt and interest, and executed an agreement for reconveyance on the payment of such amount within a certain time, the agreement expressly reciting that the transaction was not intended as a mortgage. Held, that the conveyance was an absolute conveyance, and not a mortgage.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunler, Judge.

Ejectment by Phoebe A. Vance against Leander Anderson and wife. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ernest Sevier and Denver Sevier, for appellants. A. J. Monroe, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. Action of ejectment to recover a lot of land in the city of Eureka, Humboldt county. Plaintiff had judgment, from which judgment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal.

The first point made by appellants for reversal is that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. To properly present the question thus raised, it is necessary to quote from the complaint and answer, and to state some facts bearing upon the case. The complaint is, in part, as follows: "That on the first of May, 1894, she [the plaintiff] was seised in fee, and possessed, and entitled to the possession, of that certain tract of land situate in," etc. (describing the land and its location). "That, while the plaintiff was so seised, the defendants, afterwards, on the 1st of May, 1894, and without right or title, entered into possession of the demanded premises, and ousted and ejected the plaintiff therefrom, and now unlawfully withhold the possession thereof from the plaintiff, to her damage." Defendants interposed a general demurrer to the complaint, but, before a hearing, voluntarily withdrew such demurrer, and took leave to answer within 20 days. The answer is, in part, as follows: "Deny that plaintiff was on the 1st day of May, 1894, or at any other time, or at all, or is now, seised in fee, and possessed, and entitled to the possession, or seised in fee or otherwise, or possessed, or entitled to the possession, or otherwise, of that certain tract of land set forth and described in the said complaint." The pleadings were verified, and at the trial no objection to evidence was predicated upon the insufficiency of the complaint. It will be observed that while the complaint avers seisin and possession in the plaintiff on the 1st day of May, 1894, it fails to state that she was so seised at the date of the suit brought, which was May 19, 1894, or at any time after May 1st. This was, we think, a failure of an essential allegation in the complaint. It is true that in some of the earlier cases in this court a complaint in ejectment was, in effect, differentiated from those in other actions, and precisely similar complaints with this were held sufficient. Salmon v. Symonds, 24 Cal. 260; Kidder v. Stevens, 60 Cal., at page 420; Yount v. Howell, 14 Cal. 465. We shall, however, assume that it was the duty of the plaintiff to tender to the defendants an issue as to her seisin or ownership at the date of the bringing of the suit. But the defendants did not wait, as they might well have done, for such tender; for in their answer they not only denied the seisin and right to possession of the plaintiff on the 1st of May, 1894, but added, "or at any other time, or at all, or is now, seised in fee," etc., as above quoted. When defendants thus tendered an issue as to the seisin of plaintiff up to the time the action was brought, and that issue was tried and determined against the defendants, it was too late to raise the objection here. It is a familiar rule of pleading that defects in a complaint may be cured by the averments of an answer thereto. County of San Diego v. Seifert, 97 Cal. 594, 32 Pac. 644; Harkness v. McClain (Utah) 29 Pac. 964; Code Civ. Proc. § 475; Diefendorff v. Hopkins, 95 Cal. 344, 28 Pac. 265, and 30 Pac. 549; Schenck v. Insurance Co., 71 Cal. 28, 11 Pac. 807; Cohen v. Knox, 90 Cal. 266, 27 Pac. 215. Pomeroy is of opinion that this rule of the curative property of an answer should be confined to cases in which the answer affirmatively alleges the very fact which is omitted from the complaint, but says it has sometimes been "enforced, although the answer simply contained a denial of the necessary facts which should have been averred by the plaintiff." Pom. Rem. § 579. The practice in this state has been to treat express denials as sufficient to cover the defect. See cases cited supra. Under these circumstances, the contention of appellants cannot prevail.

2. The more important question to be solved relates to the character of the conveyance under which plaintiff claims title. There was a deed of conveyance offered in evidence, executed and acknowledged in due form by the defendants on the 16th day of October, 1893, conveying the property in question to the plaintiff. The consideration mentioned in the deed was $500, and the deed was recorded October 17, 1893. The defendants, at the trial, for the purpose of showing that the foregoing conveyance was intended to operate as a mortgage, and not as an absolute conveyance, introduced in evidence an agreement between the plaintiff and Leander Anderson, executed October 16, 1893, whereby the plaintiff covenanted and agreed to and with said defendant Anderson, that she, the said plaintiff, would sell, and he, the said defendant, would buy, the certain premises therein described, and being the same premises described in the conveyance to plaintiff by the defendant. Such sale was to be made within six months, upon the payment by said Anderson to plaintiff of the sum of $4,193.70, with interest at 11 per cent. per annum from date until sale, which sum defendant covenanted to pay. If defendant failed to pay within six months, the agreement to convey was to be considered null and void, etc. The agreement contained the following clause: "It is expressly understood and agreed that this instrument is not a mortgage, but an agreement to sell and buy real estate; nor is it the intention of the parties hereto that this instrument should be or operate in any way as a mortgage." The instrument was duly acknowledged and recorded, but at what date does not appear. The deed and agreement, when taken together, do not, upon their face, constitute a mortgage, for the reasons: (1) It does not appear therefrom that the parties were the same; the deed being executed to plaintiff by the two defendants, while the agreement runs to one only of such defendants. (2) They present no evidence of any pre-existing, existing, or future debt to be secured thereby. (3) The agreement to convey expressly provides that it is not, and shall not be considered, a mortgage. It follows from these circumstances, and some others which might be mentioned, that the instruments. taken together, do not, on their face, in law. constitute a mortgage. This is not, however, conclusive. A deed absolute on its face may be shown by parol to be intended as a mortgage. It may be stated, as a general proposition, that in this state, at least, every conveyance of real property made as security for the performance of an obligation is in equity a mortgage, irrespective of the form in which it is made. Equity looks beyond the mere form in which the transaction is clothed, and shapes its relief in such way as to carry out the true intent of the parties to the agreement; and to this end all the facts and circumstances of the transaction, the conduct of the parties thereto, and their declarations against their own interests, their relations to one another and to the subject matter, are subjects for consideration. Campbell v. Freeman, 99 Cal. 546, 34 Pac. 113; Pierce v. Robinson, 13 Cal. 116; Locke v. Moulton, 96 Cal. 21, 30 Pac. 957; Ross v. Brusie, 64 Cal. 245, 30 Pac. 811; Taylor v. McLain, 64 Cal. 513, 2 Pac. 399. We need not multiply authorities under this head.

The question of fact as to the intention of the parties here was decided by the jury against the contention that the deed and so-called defeasance were intended by the parties as security for an existing liability on the part of the defendants. In favor of the verdict, there was evidence tending to show that, prior to the execution of the deed and agreement, plaintiff held a mortgage upon the lot involved in this action, and a timber tract, given by defendant Leander Anderson to secure his promissory note for $3,700, with interest at 11 per cent. per annum from August, 1892, the date of the note. The note was due, and nothing had been paid thereon. Plaintiff desired payment of the note, and Anderson was unable to pay. Under these circumstances, Anderson and wife (the other defendant), being desirous of saving their timber claim, placed the lot here in question in the hands of Farris & Cooper, real-estate agents, and authorized them, in writing, to sell it for $3,700 and the interest due on the note, amounting to $400. They were unable to sell it at that price. They then suggested to Anderson that they be permitted to try to get plaintiff to take a deed of the town lot, and release the timber claim, as that would be equivalent to a sale of said lot and payment of plaintiff. Anderson agreed to this. They also advised Anderson to get a bond from plaintiff for a reconveyance of the town lot, if he could. The plaintiff, being desirous of avoiding the expense of a foreclosure, agreed to the proposition, whereupon the deed and agreement were drawn and executed. The note of defendant was marked "Paid," and delivered up to him, and the mortgage satisfied. When the agreement was drawn, the attorney asked if it was intended as a mortgage, and Anderson answered in the negative, whereupon the clause which we have quoted therefrom was inserted, and agreed to by the parties. Anderson thereafter mortgaged the timber claim to other parties. There is a house upon the town lot, and witnesses placed the value of the premises at from $4,500 upward, and the monthly rental at $10. Plaintiff supposed the premises were vacant at the date of the deed, but, when her agent called upon defendant, for the key to the house, he found defendants had moved thereto; and they declined to take a lease of the premises, or, upon demand, to deliver possession thereof to plaintiff. Prior to the execution of the deed, defendant Maria Anderson had filed a declaration of homestead on a portion of the premises; hence her joinder in the deed, and as a party defendant. The only testimony on the part of the defendants was that of Leander Anderson, which was not at all clear, and scarcely sufficient to constitute a substantial conflict. Indeed, the main circumstances in favor of considering the transaction a mortgage are to be found in the fact that the agreement was of even date with the deed, and the sum for which plaintiff agreed to convey was the exact sum due upon her previous note secured by mortgage. These circumstances are important, but not conclusive, and, we think, are outweighed by other attendant circumstances; and, on the whole case, we are of opinion the jury was not only warranted in its verdict, but that any other result would have been a surprise.

The instructions given by the court clearly embodied the law applicable to the case, and contained all that was pertinent in the instructions asked on behalf of defendants and refused. It would be more satisfactory to set out all of these instructions given and refused, but their length, coupled with the fact that they involve no new propositions, are deemed sufficient reasons for their omission.

There is nothing in the proposition that defendants were tenants at will of the plaintiff, and therefore entitled to notice in writing, under section 789 of the Civil Code. If the conveyance to plaintiff was a mortgage, it conveyed no title, and did not entitle her to possession of the property. If it was an absolute deed, she was, upon its execution, entitled to immediate possession, and upon her demand, and the refusal of defendants to deliver such possession, was entitled to maintain an action for its recovery. There is nothing in the agreement entitling the defendants, or either of them, to possession before the contract is consummated. We recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

CRAWFORD v. HARRIS. (S. F. 18.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 28, 1896.)

BUILDING CONTRACT—DAMAGES FOR NONPERFORMANCE—EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR—MISCONDUCT OF JURORS.

1. In an action for services for construction of a building, defendant, after testifying that plaintiff left the job uncompleted, and that he (defendant) thereafter superintended the work himself, and that it took up his time so that he could not attend to his business (which, it appears, was that of a merchant) for two months, was asked "the value of the time he lost" while personally superintending the work. Held, that the question was objectionable, as calling, not for the reasonable compensation of a superintendent, but for the value of his time.

2. Allowing defendant, on cross-examination, in an action for construction of a building which he claimed he had to complete himself, to be asked if he had not told the brickman that he would not pay him, but that if he got anything he would have to get it out of plaintiff, even if error, is harmless, defendant's answer being "No."

3. The presumption being that jurors have faithfully performed their duty, a new trial is properly denied where the affidavits charging misconduct of jurors are fully met by counter affidavits of the jurors.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by S. T. Crawford against I. Harris. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

M. J. Platsheck, for appellant. W. H. Jordan, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. Action to recover $500 for work, labor, and services performed by plaintiff for defendant, and for $353.35 as a balance due for money paid, laid out, and expended by plaintiff for defendant, and to recover interest on said two several sums. Defendant denied his indebtedness to plaintiff, and, by way of cross complaint, set out that plaintiff was indebted to him in the sum of $1,000, for so much money by him (the said plaintiff) had and received to and for the use of defendant, and, in a separate count, claimed a like sum of $1,000 on an account stated; and, in a third count, defendant claimed damages in the sum of $500 for the violation by plaintiff of a contract to superintend the erection and construction of additions and alterations to two certain buildings owned by defendant, and demanding judgment against plaintiff for $2,500. The cause was tried by a jury, and a general verdict returned in favor of plaintiff for $916.46, for which sum judgment was entered. The appeal is from such judgment and from an order denying a motion on behalf of defendant for a new trial.

Defendant was the owner of two buildings at the corner of Grove street and Van Ness avenue, in the city and county of San Francisco, which he desired to have remodeled, in part rebuilt, and converted into a single structure. About the month of June, 1892, as the result of sundry interviews on the subject, he entered into a verbal contract with the plaintiff, by the terms of which the latter agreed to furnish, and did furnish, plans, and was to superintend the alterations, construction, etc., all for $500. Plaintiff took charge of the work, had the necessary grading done, moved the buildings as required by the necessities of the case, employed a foreman, ordered materials, employed, by himself or through the foreman, all needed mechanics and laborers; usually paying the mechanics, etc., and calling upon the defendant for money to reimburse himself. The work progressed until, say, the month of November, when plaintiff called upon defendant for some $309.10 to reimburse himself for moneys alleged to have been expended in the payment of mechanics, which defendant refused to pay, averring that the bills were unjust, fraudulent, etc. Plaintiff left the building the last of November or first of December, 1892, at which time he claims it was substantially completed, except in some minor particulars not requiring his attention. There was a sharp conflict in the evidence, not only upon this last point, but also upon the general conduct of the business, and reasonableness of the expenditures incurred by plaintiff on behalf of defendant. The jury, by a general verdict in favor of plaintiff, has passed upon all the issues involved; and as there was testimony which, if believed, was sufficient to support such verdict, it can subserve no useful purpose to examine such evidence in detail, where the inevitable conclusion must be that, in the face of the substantial conflict which characterizes the testimony, we are not authorized to substitute our views for those of the jury. The verdict must therefore stand, unless there are other and more cogent reasons for its reversal.

Two errors of law only are predicated upon the rulings of the court during the trial:

1. The defendant had testified on his own behalf to the effect that plaintiff left the job about November 24, 1892, and that thereafter he (the defendant) had superintended the work himself, and that it took up his time so that he could not attend to his business for, say, about two months. Defendant's counsel then put the following question: "What was the value of the time which you lost during the months of December, 1892, and January, 1893, during which you personally superintended the work?" Plaintiff's counsel objected upon the ground that the question was immaterial and irrelevant. The objection was sustained, and the ruling is assigned as error. We think the ruling should be upheld. It appeared, inferentially at least, that defendant was a merchant; and, as the question, in the form it was put, called, not for a reasonable compensation of a superintendent, but for the value of his time,—the value of the time he lost,—it was not sufficiently definite. He may well have considered his time worth $1,000 per month, but it would not follow that a superintendent of the building in question was entitled to any such compensation. Defendant was permitted to prove, and did thereafter show, the value of his services as a superintendent of the building, viz. that such services were worth $3.50 per day, and there was no contradiction of this testimony.

2. Plaintiff's counsel was permitted by the court, against the objection of defendant's counsel, to ask the defendant, on cross-examination, if he (the said defendant) had not told one Tarp, the brickman, that he (defendant) would not pay him a cent for his work, and if he got anything he would have to get it out of plaintiff. It is sufficient to say of this question that, while the question was, within the discretion of the court, a proper one, in view of the direct examination, yet if it be conceded that it was not, as the answer was, "No, sir," no injury accrued to defendant.

One other point only remains to be noticed. It relates to alleged misconduct on the part of several of the jurors. A number of affidavits are filed, tending to show that several of the jurors admitted to the affiants either that they were familiar with the building, the subject of the controversy, before the trial, or, as to some of them, that they visited and examined the structure pending such trial. In every instance the jurors thus impugned filed their counter affidavits, in which they emphatically denied every fact from which any inference of misconduct could be fairly deduced. The most that can be said is that two or three of the jurors had frequently passed the building, and one of them, having a friend residing therein, had been in the building; but none of them knew anything of the character of its construction, its owner, or those who made the improvement. In short, their knowledge was only such as we all gain by the casual observance of the buildings which we pass or enter without any circumstance calling our attention thereto. Jurors will be presumed to have performed their duty faithfully and well, until the contrary is made to appear; and, as all charges of improper conduct are fully met, and negative the allegations of the charging affidavits, the motion for a new trial, so far as based upon the misconduct of the jury, as well as for other causes, was properly overruled. We recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

CHRISTIE v. SHERWOOD et al. (S. F. 269.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. July 28, 1896.)

UNRECORDED MORTGAGE—NOTICE.

The articles of incorporation of a bank provided that "it is to act as an agent in the investment of funds," and "to transact any business that may properly be done by a financial agent." Its cashier made a loan for a customer who had money deposited therein, took the acknowledgment to the mortgage securing the loan, had possession of the unrecorded mortgage, and received two or three installments of interest, which he placed to such customer's credit, on his pass book. Held, that the knowledge of its cashier was the knowledge of the bank, affecting it with notice of such unrecorded mortgage.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Lake county; R. W. Crump, Judge.

Action by R. J. Christie against Dwight Sherwood, the Bank of Lake, and others, to foreclose a mortgage executed by defendant Sherwood to plaintiff. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant bank appeals. Affirmed.

Woods Crawford, for appellant. Hudson & Sayre, for respondent. Thos. B. Bond, for defendant Sherwood.

HAYNES, C. Defendant Dwight Sherwood executed his note and mortgage to the plaintiff on December 3, 1887, and that mortgage was recorded December 20, 1890. On March 4, 1890, Sherwood executed to the Bank of Lake another note and mortgage on the same lands and certain other parcels, and this mortgage was recorded March 5, 1890. Plaintiff's mortgage is for $2,000; that of the bank, for $4,000; and the property mortgaged is insufficient to satisfy both. The court below held that plaintiff's mortgage, though last recorded, was the first lien on that part of the land described in both mortgages, and judgment was entered accordingly. This appeal is by the bank from the judgment, upon the judgment roll and a statement containing the evidence; and the only question is whether the bank, at the time it took its mortgage, had notice of the prior mortgage to the plaintiff.

The uncontradicted facts are that the plaintiff, at and prior to the date of his note and mortgage, had $3,000 or more on deposit with the Bank of Lake; that Marshall Arnold was then the cashier of said bank, and continued to be such cashier until after the execution of the mortgage to the bank; that, about the date of the mortgage to plaintiff, Arnold asked plaintiff if he wanted to lend the money he had in the bank; that plaintiff replied that he might need it soon; that Arnold then said, "If you want to loan the money, we can loan it for you, and the bank will settle your mortgage off any time you want the money on it," and plaintiff told him he could lend it in that way; that plaintiff did not personally see Sherwood, or negotiate the loan; that Sherwood's acknowledgment of his mortgage to Christie was taken and certified by Arnold, as notary public. The plaintiff testified that the bank paid him the interest three different times, the first time $200, at another time $300, but the amount of the third payment was not stated; that said sums were credited to him by the bank, in his pass book, and he was told by the cashier that they were interest on the loan to Sherwood. The date of the $200 payment is given as February 20th,—year not stated,—but as that is the amount of one year's interest, which became due December 3, 1888, we assume that it was paid February 20, 1889. The only other date given was May 7, 1890. The books of the bank were also put in evidence, showing the same deposits. The articles of incorporation of the bank, and its by-laws, were also put in evidence by the plaintiff, by each of which it appears that its business was, among other things, "to act as an agent in the investment of funds," and "to transact any business that may properly be done by a financial agent." The by-laws further show that the cashier, with the president, "shall negotiate loans," and that "no loan shall be made without their concurrence." The president of the bank testified that he did not know of the mortgage from Sherwood to Christie at the time Sherwood made his mortgage to the bank, and that neither he nor the board of directors ever had any notice of the mortgage to the plaintiff. No other evidence was given, on behalf of the bank, affecting the question before us. The indorsement on the plaintiff's mortgage showed that it was recorded at the request of Marshall Arnold, and the plaintiff first received the mortgage after it was recorded.

It is contended by appellant that "notice to the bank is not inferred from notice to its cashier in respect to a matter beyond the scope of his employment, and outside of the ordinary business of the bank"; citing Wilson v. McCullough, 23 Pa. St. 440. If it be conceded that Arnold, though cashier of the bank at the time plaintiff's money was loaned to Sherwood, was not acting as the agent of the bank in that transaction, but was then acting as the agent of Christie, his knowledge of the fact that the loan was made and the mortgage taken may be notice to the bank in the subsequent transaction in which he, being authorized, loaned the money of the bank to Sherwood, and took as security a second mortgage upon the same property; but whether it is notice to the bank depends upon whether the previous transaction was present in his mind at the time the loan was made by the bank. Yerger v. Barz, 56 Iowa, 77, 8 N. W. 769; Distilled Spirits, 11 Wall. 366. In the case last cited, after reviewing the English cases, it was said: "If he [the agent] acquires the knowledge when he effects the purchase, no question can arise as to his having it at that time. If he acquired it previous to the purchase, the presumption that he still retains it, and has it present to his mind, will depend upon the lapse of time, and other circumstances. Knowledge communicated to the principal himself he is bound to recollect, but he is not bound by knowledge communicated to his agent, unless it is present to the agent's mind at the time of effecting the purchase. Clear and satisfactory proof that it was so present seems to be the only restriction required by the English rule as now understood. With the qualification that the agent is at liberty to communicate his knowledge to his principal, it appears to us to be a sound view of the subject." Whether the prior transaction was present in the mind and recollection of the cashier at the time the mortgage was taken by the bank, there is no direct evidence. The cashier was not examined. The circumstances would seem to show that it could not well have escaped his recollection. The mortgage itself was in his possession, either as agent of Christie, or as cashier of the bank. Interest on the loan to Sherwood was also received, and placed to the credit of Christie in the books of the bank, and in Christie's pass book, and Christie was informed on both occasions that these deposits were moneys paid by Sherwood as interest on his loan. If, however, the bank was the agent of Christie in making the loan, then the bank was bound to recollect the prior loan at the time when it subsequently loaned its own money and took a mortgage upon the same property. Distilled Spirits, 11 Wall. 366. Appellant contends that it is not within the power of the bank to act as such agent, and that, therefore, Arnold did not represent the bank when the loan was made for Christie, and cites authorities to the effect that it is outside of the business of a banking corporation to make loans for depositors. But that must depend upon the purposes of its organization, and the powers given by the statute and its articles of incorporation. Under our Civil Code, "private corporations may be formed for any purpose for which individuals may lawfully associate themselves" (section 286); and the articles of incorporation of the Bank of Lake, among other purposes for which it was organized, state that it is "to act as an agent in the investment of funds," and "to transact any business that may properly be done by a financial agent." It is clear that in lending its own money the bank acts as a principal, and can only act as an agent when it invests the funds of others; and therefore the provisions of its articles of association, above quoted, gave it ample authority to act for Christie in making the loan to Sherwood, and it cannot be presumed that Arnold acted in his individual capacity, and not as cashier, in doing that which the bank was organized for the purpose of doing. It is true, the by-laws of the bank provide that the cashier, with the president, "shall negotiate loans," and that "no loan shall be made without their concurrence"; but the president testified that "Marshall Arnold, the cashier, never consulted me about making any loans." Under such circumstances, we think the bank should not be permitted to say that it did not make the loan of Christie's money. The knowledge of its cashier of the prior mortgage to Christie was the knowledge of the bank, and therefore not within the provisions of section 1214 of the Civil Code. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; SEARLS, C.

CULLEN et al. v. GLENDORA WATER CO. (No. 19,360.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1896.)

IRRIGATION DISTRICTS—ISSUANCE OF BONDS—ESTIMATE OF COST.

Under St. 1891, p. 147, § 15, providing that the board of directors of an irrigation district must determine the amount necessary to be raised for the purpose of providing for the work of irrigation, and shall call a special election, at which shall be submitted to the electors the question whether or not the bonds shall be issued, the estimate of money required must be based on some definite plan for the construction of works or for the acquisition or distribution of a water supply. 39 Pac. 769, affirmed. Board v. Tregea, 26 Pac. 237, 88 Cal. 357, distinguished.

In bank. On rehearing. For former report, see 39 Pac. 769.

Chapman & Hendrick, for appellant. A. W. Hutton and C. L. Batcheller, for respondents. Anderson & Anderson and Joseph H. Call, amici curiæ.

BEATTY, C. J. This cause was formerly heard and decided by the court in bank, upon grounds stated by Commissioner Vanclief in an opinion reported in 39 Pac. 769. The case arises out of a special proceeding, under an act supplemental to the Wright act, for obtaining a decree of court approving and confirming the regularity of the issue of the bonds of an irrigation district. By the decree of the superior court, the proceedings for the formation of the district, and the issuance of the bonds, were held to have been regular, and the bonds were declared valid. By the decision here, all the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the superior court were approved, excepting only a finding to the effect that the directors of the irrigation district had made a proper estimate of the cost of works, etc., before ordering the issue of the bonds. This finding was held to be contrary to the uncontradicted evidence in the record, and upon that ground, and none other, the judgment of the superior court, and its order denying a new trial, were reversed. Subsequently a rehearing was granted, upon the contention of respondents that there was no issue raised by the answer of appellant as to the fact alleged in the petition for confirmation,—that a proper estimate had been made of the cost of works, etc., before the sale of bonds was ordered. At the rehearing, counsel not only discussed the pleadings and evidence relating to this particular question, but counsel for appellant asked the court to consider again the various points which had been ruled against him in our former decision. We have therefore again carefully considered the entire case, with the result that we adhere to the views expressed in Commissioner Vanclief's opinion, except in so far as they may be qualified by what we shall have to say with reference to the point upon which the judgment was reversed.

It was alleged in the petition for confirmation "that as soon after said district was organized as was practicable, to wit, at its meeting of May 10, A. D. 1892, said board of directors of said district did, in order that sufficient water may be furnished to each landowner in said district for irrigation purposes, and for the purpose of constructing necessary irrigating canals and works, and acquiring the necessary property and rights therefor, and otherwise carrying out the provisions of said act under which said district was organized, deem it necessary that the sum of one hundred and seventy thousand ($170,000) dollars should be raised; and said board of directors did thereupon estimate and determine that said amount of one hundred and seventy thousand ($170,000) dollars was and is necessary to be raised for said purposes." By its answer the appellant denied that "said board of directors of said district did, in order that sufficient water might be furnished to each landowner in said district for irrigation purposes, and for the purpose of constructing necessary irrigating canals and works, and acquiring the necessary property and rights therefor, and otherwise carrying out the provisions of the said act under which said district was organized, or did otherwise or at all, estimate or determine that the amount of $170,000 was or is necessary to be raised for said or any purposes." If the answer had stopped here, the allegation that an estimate was made would have been very clearly met; but in the very next paragraph of the answer the appellant goes on to aver the truth to be "that on the 10th day of May, 1892, the said persons, claiming to be sitting as a board of directors of the Glendora irrigation district, did order that it was necessary that the sum of $170,000 should be raised, in order that sufficient water might be furnished to each landowner in said district for irrigation purposes, and for the purpose of constructing necessary irrigating canals and works, and acquiring the necessary property and rights therefor, and otherwise carrying out the provisions of the act under which the district is organized, to wit, the act approved March 7, 1887, as amended, and did further estimate and determine that $170,000 was necessary to be raised for the said purposes." This averment would seem to have destroyed the whole effect of the previous denial, but the parties evidently supposed that the pleadings presented an issue on this point, for in stipulating as to the facts of the case they included the following: "That as soon after said district was organized as was practicable, and on May 10, 1892, said board of directors of said district made an order calling a special election to be held in said district, at which said election should be submitted to the electors of said district possessing the qualifications prescribed by said act the question whether or not the bonds of said district, in the amount determined by the board, to wit, $170,000, should be issued, of which said order the following is a copy: 'On motion, duly seconded, the following order was made and adopted by the board of directors of Glendora irrigation district, Los Angeles county, California, to wit: "Be it ordered that this board, being fully advised in the premises, and having duly considered the matter, do now find and order that it is necessary that the sum of one hundred and seventy thousand dollars should be raised, in order that sufficient water may be furnished to each landowner in said district for irrigation purposes, and for the purpose of constructing necessary irrigating canals and works, and acquiring the necessary property and rights therefor, and otherwise carrying out the provisions of the act under which this district is organized, to wit, an act of the legislature of the state of California entitled 'An act to provide for the organization and government of irrigation districts, and to provide for the acquisition of water and other property, and for the distribution of water thereby for irrigation purposes,' approved March 7, 1887, as amended." And said board of directors of said district do now estimate and determine that the following amount of money is necessary to be raised for said purposes, to wit, the sum of one hundred and seventy thousand dollars ($170,000).'" And the bill of exceptions shows that the cause was submitted in the superior court upon this stipulation.

Considering the ambiguity of the pleadings, the court may well be excused for having followed the lead of the parties, in treating the question whether a preliminary estimate of cost of works had been made as one of the issues in the case. But a critical examination of the commissioner's opinion will show that the real question considered and decided by the court was not whether the directors of the district had declared an estimate, or resolved that they did estimate, but whether, as a legal possibility, they could have made the estimate contemplated by the Wright act, in the absence of any sort of plan for the construction of works, or for the acquisition or distribution of a water supply. And this is the issue which the appellant raised, or attempted to raise, by its answer. An examination of the whole tenor of the pleadings will show that the appellant intended to admit that the board of directors passed the resolution and took the action disclosed by that part of the stipulation above quoted, but intended to deny the legal sufficiency of such action, upon the ground that the board had never "adopted any plan of any canal or canals, storage reservoirs, or works, or provided for the acquisition of any property or rights whatever," or made any provision for distributing water among the owners of the land in the district. It was with reference to this question that witnesses were examined in the superior court, and findings made, and the exception to the findings was upon the specific ground that the evidence showed "that the board had never formed any plan, or made any plans or specifications, for acquiring water, or constructing necessary canals and works, or acquiring necessary property and rights therefor, and that the board of directors never have done anything looking to the acquisition of any waters or water rights, or the construction of any waterworks, or acquiring any property, except only the purchase of the Glendora waterworks, and that they have not paid anything for that." This statement in the exceptions to the findings was, as shown by the commissioner's opinion, very fully and sufficiently borne out by the unconflicting evidence in the record; and the question therefore was and is presented for decision, whether there can be, under the Wright act, an estimate of money required, without any plan for the acquisition and distribution of water. Counsel for respondents contend that this question has already been decided in their favor in the case of Board v. Tregea, 88 Cal. 357, 26 Pac. 237, where the following language was used by the court: "The authority to issue bonds is wholly independent of the source of supply of water, or any plans for obtaining it." This language was not very happily chosen, and taken in its largest sense, for universal application, is misleading. But read with its context, and construed with reference to the point under discussion, it is correct. The sole question there considered grew out of this state of facts: The directors, upon a plan to get a supply of water from one source to irrigate the district as originally laid out, had estimated the cost at $800,000, and ordered that amount of bonds to be issued. Subsequently the size of the district had been reduced, and the plan had been modified with respect to the source of supply and the amount of water to be used, and the directors had modified their order for the issuance of bonds by reducing the amount to $400,000. The question was whether the electors could be held to have ratified this order for the issuance of a smaller amount of bonds, and the decision of the point at issue is really embodied in the language immediately following that above quoted: "There is nothing in the law to prevent the directors from changing their plans in this respect whenever they find it to the advantage of the district to do so." In other words, we held that the authority to issue bonds is not so bound up with the preliminary plans as to sources of supply, upon which the estimate is based, that the proceeds of a valid issue of bonds cannot be used to carry out a modified plan, if the change is deemed advantageous. But we did not hold—and we think it would lead to very unfortunate consequences if such a construction were placed upon the law—that the board of directors have complied with their duty, or acted within their powers, by merely resolving that a certain amount of bonds should issue, or by merely declaring that they have estimated the cost, when they have no plan or basis for an estimate of cost. We think that the language of the act (St. 1891, p. 147, § 15) clearly implies that there must be some plan or plans in the alternative, before an estimate can be made, and that without such plan or plans there can be no real estimate. The judgment and order are reversed.

HIGGINS et al. v. CITY OF SAN DIEGO et al (No. 19,459.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1896.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — CONTRACTS ULTRA VIRES— SUBSIDY TO RAILROADS — ORDINANCES AND RESOLUTIONS — VALIDITY—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—EXCEEDING DEBT LIMIT—VOID CONTRACTS —PART PERFORMANCE BY CITY—RECOVERY ON QUANTUM VALEBAT—ESTOPPEL.

1. A contract by a municipal corporation to pay money in aid of the construction of a railroad is invalid, in the absence of any authority therefor in the charter.

2. An agreement by a city, not authorized to expend corporate funds in aid of railroads, to pay a stipulated monthly rental for a waterworks plant on condition, inter alia, that the lessor will thereafter construct a railroad between certain points, is void; an indefinite and inseparable part of the rent being payable in consideration of an unlawful object.

3. Such contract being void in its inception, the fact that the lessor never constructs the railroad, or that compliance with that clause of the agreement is waived by the city, is immaterial.

4. A water company, in order to avoid a lease of its plant directly to a city which had no authority to aid in the construction of railroads, executed a lease to certain individuals on condition, inter alia, that the lessor should thereafter construct a railroad between certain points, it being stipulated that the lessee should have the option to terminate the lease in case any of the conditions were not complied with. On the same day, and as a part of the same contract, the lessees, who were merely nominal parties, made a sublease to the city, containing substantially the same provisions as the original lease, but omitting the clause in reference to the construction of a railroad. Held that, as a part of the amount to be paid by the city, under the name of rent, was in consideration of the undertaking to construct the road mentioned in the original lease, the contract was void, whether the option remaining in the nominal lessees to terminate the agreement for failure to build the road was to be exercised by them for their own advantage or for the benefit of the city.

5. Where the common council passes a resolution authorizing the mayor to contract for the expenditure of corporate funds, without first presenting such resolution to the auditor, as required by charter, and obtaining his certificate thereon that the indebtedness can be lawfully incurred under the charter, the contract is void; the defect of power being patent on the face of the resolution.

6. Under Const. art. 11, § 18, forbidding municipal corporations to incur indebtedness exceeding in any year the revenue provided for it for such year, a contract extending over several years is not invalidated by the fact that the aggregate amount to be paid during the whole period exceeds the revenue provided for a single year, if a sufficient revenue for the purpose may be provided in each year without exceeding the limit. McBean v. City of Fresno (Cal.) 44 Pac. 358, followed.

7. A contract by a city council for the lease of a waterworks system for a period of 20 years is not necessarily void as a suspension of the legislative power of succeeding councils. McBean v. City of Fresno (Cal.) 44 Pac. 358, followed.

8. Where an agreement by a municipal corporation for the lease of a waterworks plant is void, because a part of the consideration to be paid by the city is, in effect, a subsidy to a railroad, no recovery can be had on the express contract, even for the time the city retains possession of the plant, such contract being incapable of direct or indirect ratification; but if a general power to contract for a water supply exists, the city will be liable on a quantum valebat for the reasonable value of the use of the plant.

9. In such case the city is not precluded, by the allowance of bills presented by the lessor for the stipulated rent, from showing that they were in excess of the reasonable value.

Works & Works, for appellant. W. H. Fuller and C. L. Barber, for respondents.

BEATTY, C. J. This appeal presents another phase of the varied litigation that has arisen out of the several contracts discussed in the two cases of San Diego Water Co. v. San Diego Flume Co., reported in 100 Cal. 43, 34 Pac. 656, and 108 Cal. 549, 41 Pac. 495. A portion of the transactions out of which the present controversy arises is very fully stated in the opinions delivered in those cases, but for the sake of clearness it will be necessary to restate the same matters here, at least in outline, and to present some others in fuller detail.

The San Diego Flume Company and the San Diego Water Company are California corporations, organized for the purpose, among others, of furnishing water to the city of San Diego and its inhabitants. The flume company was owner of a water supply and a system of pipes by which it brought water to the city limits, but had no distributing system within the city. The water company had pipes laid throughout the city and all the necessary facilities for distributing water to consumers. This being the case, on November 6, 1890, the two companies entered into an agreement in writing by which the water company was constituted the sole agent of the flume company for the sale of its water to consumers within the city. Under and in pursuance of this contract the pipes of the two systems were connected at the city limits, and the water company commenced to sell the water supplied by the flume company, and to deliver the same through its distributing system to consumers within the city, and so continued to do until the 1st day of June, 1891, when its entire distributing plant was turned over to the city of San Diego under a contract, the validity of which is the principal question involved in this appeal. In form this contract was a lease from the water company to Bryant Howard and four other citizens of San Diego, and a sublease from them to the city of the entire plant of the water company with a daily supply of 3,000,000 gallons of water from the flume company for the term of 20 years from and after June 1, 1891, at a monthly rental of $9,166.65. The lease from the water company to Howard and others was dated April 13, and their sublease to the city April 18, 1891, but the court finds that both were executed on the 18th, and that "the said lease of said water plant and the sublease thereof constitute a single contract, which was intended to be a lease of said water plant from said water company to said city; that said Bryant Howard and his associates were not interested in said lease from said water company to them, or in said sublease from them to said city, nor was it intended by any of the parties thereto that they should have any interest therein. They were nominal parties only, and their names were used for the sole purpose of effecting a lease of said water plant from said water company to said city, and to avoid making said lease direct from the water company to the city. It was intended and agreed that the said Howard and associates should not be under any liability of any nature, and also that the lease to them should be null and void if the city did not consent to receive from them a transfer or sublease thereof." These facts in regard to the lease and sublease are not only found by the court, but they are clearly evident from the terms of the instruments themselves, which are fully set out in the record, and are confirmed by the fact that the sublease, with the covenants of the city for payment, etc., was immediately assigned by Howard and others to the water company, by which means the city became directly liable to that corporation, if the contract was valid, for the stipulated monthly payments.

In pursuance of this agreement the water company, on the 1st day of June, 1891, delivered its water plant to the city, and from that time until after the commencement of this action supplied to its mains so much of the flume company's water as the city required for the use of itself and its inhabitants. From the time it took possession of the plant the city collected the dues of water consumers, so far as they were collected, and with the exception of two months it regularly allowed and approved the bills of the water company for the monthly rental of $9,166.65. It also applied to the payment of these bills the moneys collected from water rates, less the cost of collection and management. But the payments so made fell far short of the stipulated rent; that is to say, when the rent due according to the terms of the lease amounted in round numbers to $200,000 but $90,000 had been paid, leaving $110,000 still due. And this deficiency was caused in great part by the action of the city authorities in reducing water rates to an unreasonably low figure after obtaining possession of the distributing plant, and by neglecting to collect the rates so reduced. Such being the situation, the plaintiffs Higgins and Llewelyn, taxpayers of San Diego, in September, 1892, in behalf of themselves and other taxpayers of the city, commenced this action to obtain a decree declaring the lease to the city void, and enjoining the city and its auditor and treasurer from allowing and paying any further claims for rent. The defendants named in the complaint were the city of San Diego, its treasurer and auditor, Bryant Howard and his associates, the flume company, and the water company. Of these defendants only the city, the auditor and treasurer, and the water company answered the complaint, and these answers, owing to the subsequent action of the plaintiffs in dismissing their action, will not call for further consideration. The water company, in addition to its answer to the complaint, filed a cross complaint against its co-defendants, the city and its auditor and treasurer. In the first count of its cross complaint the water company alleged the making of the lease and sublease, and the assignment of the latter to itself, its full compliance with all the covenants on its part to be performed, and the failure of the city and its officers to pay the stipulated rent; counting, in other words, upon the written contract. The second count of the cross complaint was upon a quantum valebat for the reasonable value of the use of its plant during the time it had been held and used by the city. The third count was for damages for the unlawful withholding of the plant by the city after demand for its return. To this cross complaint the city and its auditor and treasurer made answer, asserting the invalidity of the lease and sublease upon all the grounds suggested by the plaintiffs and upon other grounds, and defending against the claims for value of the use and for damages. Upon the filing of this answer to the cross complaint the original plaintiffs dismissed their action, leaving the contest to be waged between the water company on one side and the city and its officers on the other. The cause was tried by the court, and very full findings made, upon which the court concluded that the water company had no right to recover upon either count in its cross complaint, and judgment was entered accordingly. From the judgment so entered the water company appeals, contending that, upon the facts found by the court and admitted by the pleadings, the judgment should have been in its favor.

The main question in the case is as to the validity of the written contract between the city and the water company, and this involves an inquiry into the capacity and powers of the respective parties to the contract, the terms of the written instruments, and the objects of the transaction. As to the powers and capacities of the parties: The San Diego Water Company is and then was a corporation organized under the laws of the state of California for the purposes, among others, of supplying, furnishing, and selling water to the city of San Diego and its inhabitants for domestic purposes, and to acquire, by purchase or otherwise, the rights, franchises, works, and equipments, and the real and personal property, of other persons and corporations supplying, or authorized to supply, water for said purposes, and to use, control, sell, convey, or lease all such property. The San Diego Flume Company was also a California corporation, organized for the purposes, among others, of diverting water from the San Diego and other rivers, and conveying the same by means of aqueducts to the city of San Diego and other places for sale for domestic purposes, irrigation, etc. The city of San Diego is a municipal corporation of the state of California, organized under a freeholders' charter ratified by the legislature March 16, 1889. St. 1889, p. 643. The general features of the lease from the water company to Bryant Howard and others have been sufficiently indicated, but it is necessary here to state more in detail some of its conditions. After providing for the lease of the distributing plant, the sale of 3,000,000 gallons daily of the flume company's water, and so much more as the city may require, at the rate of 5 cents per 1,000 gallons, the payment of the rent, the assignment of the lease to the city, and the immunity of the lessees from any personal liability for the rent, the agreement proceeds as follows: "This lease is made and executed and the amount above agreed to be paid by the parties of the second part on the following conditions, stipulations, and agreements, viz." (except as indicated by quotation marks, the substance only of these stipulations is given): (5) That the party of the first part do cause a railroad to be constructed and operated from the city of San Diego to San Quintin, in Mexico, or to Ft. Yuma in California; work to be commenced thereon within 30 days, and 50 miles of road to be completed and in operation within one year; 65 miles per annum to be thereafter constructed; road to be American standard gauge, well constructed; and, after completion of first 50 miles, daily and continuously operated for accommodation of freight and passengers. "(7) It is further agreed that, should any extensions of the pipe lines or plants of the party of the first part be necessary, during the term of this lease, the parties of the second part or their assigns or sublessee shall have the option to put in such extension, the same to be of the kind and quality now being put in and used by the said party of the first part; or said parties of the second part or their assigns or sublessee may require such extensions to be made by the party of the first part, in which case the party of the first part shall be allowed for the amount actually invested in such extensions the sum of six per centum (6 per cent.) per annum, interest payable at the time of paying the monthly amounts called for by this lease; and in case said party of the first part shall fail or refuse to make such extensions when required so to do by the parties of the second part, then the second party may cause such necessary extensions to be made, and deduct the cost thereof from the subsequent rentals falling due." (8) The party of the first part agrees to keep in good repair and look after and care for its plant, free of expense to the parties of the second part, etc. "(10) It is also agreed that the parties of the second part, or their assignee or sublessee, shall pay to the party of the first part, for the deterioration of the extension of the pipe lines, or any part of the system, three per centum (3 per cent.) per annum on the cost of such extensions; said parties of the second part to have the option of purchasing such extensions and the entire plant at any time during the term of this lease, at the actual first cost thereof to the party of the first part, less the amount paid for deterioration." "(12) And it is expressly understood and agreed that the parties of the second part have the option to terminate this lease in case any of the conditions, stipulations, or agreements above mentioned shall not be complied with, by giving notice of such option to the party of the first part of one month, and upon returning to the party of the first part, in as good condition as when this lease is executed, ordinary wear and tear and damages of the elements excepted, of the property above described; or, in case of failure to return any part or piece thereof, to pay said party of the first part the value of all property not returned as aforesaid, and from the time of such notice and surrender the party of the first part shall be restored to all the rights and privileges it now has."

On the same day that this lease was executed—April 18, 1891—Douglass Gunn, as mayor of the city, signed the name of the city to the sublease, which was also signed and delivered by Bryant Howard and others. The sublease, after reciting the execution and substance of the lease, and referring to the conditions upon which it might be terminated, and providing that in case of its termination the sublease itself shall terminate, and all parties be freed from liability thereunder, is in its terms a substantial repetition of the lease itself down to the clause providing for the construction of the railroad, which is wholly omitted. The ensuing stipulations of the lease as to repairs, extensions, care of plant, interest on costs of extensions, allowance for deterioration, etc., are repeated in the sublease, which concludes as follows: "And it is expressly understood and agreed that the party of the second part has the option to terminate this lease, in case any of the conditions, stipulations, or agreements above mentioned shall not be complied with, by giving notice of such option to the parties of the first part of one (1) month, and upon returning to the parties of the first part, in as good condition as when this lease is executed, ordinary wear and tear and damages by the elements excepted, of the property above described; or, in the case of a failure to return any part or piece thereof, to pay said parties of the first part the value of all property not returned as aforesaid; and from the time of such notice and surrender the parties of the first part shall be restored to all of the rights and privileges they now have; and in the case of the termination of this contract the first parties shall be released from all liability for damages or otherwise by reason of such termination or failure of conditions, terms or agreements."

The foregoing full statement of certain features of the lease and sublease has been made in view of the contention of counsel for respondent that the manifest purpose of the whole transaction between the water company, Howard, and his associates and the officers of the city was to accomplish by indirection what could not be done openly and directly, viz. to secure a subsidy from the city, or a loan of its credit in aid of the construction of a railroad. This, however, is not the sole or principal objection to the validity of the contract, and is not the ground upon which the superior court held it invalid. It appears from an opinion of the judge of the superior court, printed as an appendix to one of the briefs, that his conclusion was based upon the provisions of section 18, art. 11, of the constitution, and certain provisions of the charter of San Diego. Section 18, art. 11, of the constitution reads as follows: "No county, city, town, township, board of education or school district shall incur any indebtedness or liability in any manner, or for any purpose, exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for it for such year, without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors thereof voting at an election to be held for that purpose, nor unless, before or at the time of incurring such indebtedness, provision shall be made for the collection of an annual tax sufficient to pay the interest on such indebtedness as it falls due, and also to constitute a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof within twenty years from the time of contracting the same. Any indebtedness or liability incurred contrary to this provision shall be void." Section 11, art. 2, c. 2, of the city charter (St. 1889, p. 658), provides: "No expenditure, debt or liability shall be made, contracted or incurred during any fiscal year that cannot be paid out of the revenues provided for such fiscal year. Except as otherwise authorized by this charter, the city shall not, nor shall the common council, the board of education, or any board, department or officer incur any indebtedness or liability in any manner, or for any purpose, exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for it for such fiscal year. All contracts, indebtedness or liabilities incurred contrary to the provisions of this section shall be void, and shall not be paid out of the treasury, or constitute or be the foundation of any claim, demand or liability, legal or equitable, against said city. The words expenditure, indebtedness and liability herein used shall include official salaries and the pay of all employés of said city, or of any of its departments." Chapter 2 of article 6 provides for the contracting of bonded indebtedness, and in section 12 (page 709) reiterates in more emphatic terms the inhibitions quoted from article 2, respecting unsecured or floating indebtedness, and declares that "all officers of said city are charged with notice of the condition of the city treasury and extent of the claims against the same." Section 14, art. 2, c. 2, of the charter (page 659), provides: "All ordinances or resolutions appropriating money or for the incurring of indebtedness or liability against the treasurer, introduced in either board of the common council, or in the board of education, or other department or authority, must, before being passed, be presented to the auditor, and until he certifies in writing upon such ordinance or resolution that such appropriation can be made or indebtedness incurred without the violation of any of the provisions of this charter, no further action shall be had upon the same."

The findings in relation to these matters are that the resolution authorizing the mayor to execute the sublease in behalf of the city was passed by the council without obtaining or requesting the certificate of the auditor as provided in the section last quoted, and "that the debt and liability attempted to be incurred by the said city by said lease and sublease, the sum of $110,000 per year, could not, at the date of said instruments, or at any other time since, be paid out of the revenues of the said city provided for the fiscal year then current, or any fiscal year since the date of said instruments; nor was any provision made for the collection of an annual tax to pay the interest of said indebtedness or to constitute a sinking fund for the payment of the principal. And no election was called or held at which the electors of said city voted upon the question of incurring said liability or consented thereto." For these reasons, and for these alone, the contract was held invalid by the learned judge of the superior court. As to the other objection above stated, he says in the opinion referred to: "While it is very evident from the terms of the contract that the hope that a railroad would be constructed was one of the moving causes for the city authorities entering into the contract, it was not, in my opinion, a consideration of the contract, but merely a condition subsequent, which falls, because invalid, without affecting the other provisions of the contract." And in his conclusions of law he holds "that said lease and sublease were not void because the amount agreed to be paid was a subsidy to or in aid of the construction of a railroad." These conclusions are based upon findings to the effect that the city waived the construction of the railroad, and that neither the city, nor its mayor acting in its behalf, was induced to enter into the contract by any promises or representations of the officers or agents of the water company that the railroad would be built.

For all these reasons counsel for appellant assumes that this particular objection to the contract is wholly eliminated from the case, and that the appeal must be determined upon other grounds. Counsel for respondents, on the other hand, insists that the conclusions of the judge of the superior court as to this matter are at variance with his findings of fact, and that the findings must control. He contends, in other words, that, considering the character and situation of the parties, the terms of their agreements, the circumstances under which these were entered into, and the purposes of the transaction, as found by the superior court, this court cannot avoid seeing and declaring as matter of law that a part of the consideration for the $9,166.65, which the city promised to pay monthly, was the agreement of the water company to cause the construction of a railroad. These propositions require consideration, and in considering them it will be assumed, for the purposes of the discussion, that the contract of the city was entirely free from any objections except those founded upon the condition in the lease to Howard and others, as to the construction of the road. It is claimed by counsel for respondents, and seems to be conceded by counsel for appellant, that a contract by a municipal corporation of California to pay money to any person or corporation to secure the construction of a railroad would be void, because in violation of section 31 of article 4 of the constitution, which reads as follows: "The legislature shall have no power to give or to lend, or to authorize the giving or lending, of the credit of the state, or of any county, city and county, city, township, or other political corporation or subdivision of the state now existing, or that may be hereafter established, in aid of or to any person, association or corporation, whether municipal or otherwise, or to pledge the credit thereof, in any manner whatever, for the payment of the liabilities of any individual, association, municipal or other corporation whatever; nor shall it have power to make any gift, or authorize the making of any gift, of any public money or thing of value to any individual, municipal or other corporation whatever; provided that nothing in this section shall prevent the legislature granting aid pursuant to section twenty-two of this article; and it shall not have power to authorize the state, or any political subdivision thereof, to subscribe for stock, or to become a stockholder in any corporation whatever." It does not seem entirely clear that such a contract would come within the strict terms of this provision, but certainly it would involve, in part at least, the evils which the constitutional restriction was designed to prevent, because it would afford a ready means of accomplishing by indirection what could not be done openly and avowedly. It is not necessary, however, to decide this question here, for there is no suggestion that the charter of San Diego confers authority upon the common council to expend any portion of the municipal funds in constructing or aiding the construction of railroads; and, in the absence of such authority, an agreement of the character supposed would necessarily be invalid.

This brings us to the question whether the city made or attempted to make such an agreement, or whether the other parties to the transaction managed to secure the advantages of such an agreement by means of the elaborate contrivance to which they resorted. The solution of this question may be simplified by considering what would have been the consequence if a lease from the water company directly to the city had been executed in the same terms as those contained in the lease from the company to Bryant Howard and associates. In such case it seems clear that the agreement of the city to pay the so-called "rent" would have been wholly void, because an indefinite and inseparable part of the stipulated amount would have been payable in consideration of the unlawful object of subsidizing the railroad. And it is no answer to this proposition to say that the provision for the construction of the road was a condition subsequent and void, or that it was waived by the city. If the city had no power to expend corporate funds in aid of the construction of a railroad, it does not help a contract, based in part upon such unlawful consideration, to show that the city waived compliance with that part of the undertaking of the water company. The vice of such a contract consists in the attempted misapplication of the public funds, and is not cured, but is rather aggravated, by foregoing the advantages bargained for. If a city could not be compelled to pay for a railroad actually built on the faith of its promise to pay, still less could it be compelled to pay for a road not built. But if we have mistaken the position of appellant—and the argument of counsel goes to the extent of claiming that, because the provision for the construction of the railroad was put in the form of a condition subsequent, it therefore constituted no part of the consideration for the stipulated payments—we can only say that the position is untenable. The option to terminate a contract calling for the monthly payment of large sums of money is certainly valuable to the party charged with such payments, and burdensome to the party against whom it may be exercised unless he performs some onerous condition. It is, therefore, a good consideration for an agreement to pay money. And if the option is valuable, the condition upon which it may be exercised is equally valuable to the party who is to pay and burdensome to the party who is to receive payment.

We conclude, for these reasons, that if this had been a lease direct from the water company to the city, it would have been rendered wholly void by the railroad clause. But in form, at least, it was a lease to Howard & Co., and a sublease to the city, and it remains to consider the effect of the elimination of the railroad clause in the sublease. If the transaction had been in fact what it was in form, this part of the case would have presented no difficulty. There could have been no objection to Bryant Howard, or any citizen of San Diego, stipulating for the construction of a railroad in connection with a lease of the water plant and sale of a water supply; and they, having obtained such a contract, might lawfully have sublet the water plant and water supply to the city in consideration of any agreement on the part of the city which its officers were authorized to make. But, as we have seen, the transaction was not in fact what it formally assumed to be. It sufficiently appears from the instruments themselves, but more plainly and certainly from the findings of the court, that the whole object of the parties was to effect a lease of the distributing plant and water supply to the city, and that Bryant Howard and others were made formal parties for the single purpose of avoiding a lease direct from the water company to the city. But why this desire to avoid making the lease direct? If the water company had the right and power to lease its plant and water supply to Howard & Co., it had the same right and power to lease to the city, and if the city could agree for a sublease from Howard & Co. it could equally well agree for a lease from the owner of the plant. There is but one conceivable motive, therefore, for the circuitous course pursued. The parties to the transaction evidently understood that a lease direct to the city with the railroad clause included would be void, but felt that such a provision was necessary in order to induce the city authorities to enter into the agreement. This, however, is a conclusion, not of law, but of fact, and cannot be assumed by this court as the basis of its decision in the absence of a finding by the superior court, and, in view of the finding to the effect that the city was not induced to enter into the agreement by any representations that a railroad would be built, the motives and purposes of the water company and its agents became immaterial. The city, according to the findings, was entirely willing to take a lease of the water plant and water supply, and pay the rent, irrespective of any condition for the construction of a road, and in making the agreement the members of the common council were wholly uninfluenced by the lure which the water company took such unnecessary pains to hold out to those interested in the growth and expansion of the city.

This being so, the validity of the contract depends upon the true construction and legal effect of the writings in which it is embodied. As to this our conclusions may be very briefly stated. They are that the city acquired by the sublease all the rights secured to Bryant Howard and others by the original lease, excepting only the right to terminate the agreement for failure to construct the railroad. This, in our opinion, remained in Howard and his associates. But whether, under the circumstances, it remained in them to be exercised in their own behalf, and at their own discretion, is not so clear. It may be that they held it as mere trustees for the benefit of the city which, by their contrivance, had been induced to pay, or agree to pay, the whole consideration upon which it was granted. It makes no difference, however, whether they held this right for their own benefit or for the benefit of the city. In either case it remains undisputed that the city, by the connivance of the water company and Howard & Co., had been induced to agree to pay, under the name of rent, the whole consideration for the undertaking, such as it was, to build the railroad. This vice, inherent in the contract from its inception, rendered it wholly void; for we have shown that, if the original lease, with the railroad clause, had been made directly to the city, it would have been void, not because there is anything unlawful in an agreement for the construction of a railroad, but because it was unlawful to use the revenues of the city to subsidize a railroad; and, if this could not be done directly, it could not be done indirectly, as was here attempted. If the city could not use its revenues to subsidize a railroad, it could not use them to buy an option to terminate its agreement to pay rent under a lease otherwise valid if its lessor failed to build a railroad. If it could not buy such an option to be exercised by itself, it could not buy it for trustees, and still less for strangers. If these conclusions are correct, it seems unnecessary to advert to the fact that the water company never operated or constructed the railroad, or, so far as appears, ever commenced its construction. The contract being void, the question whether it was performed or not becomes as immaterial as the fact found by the superior court that the condition for building the railroad was waived by the city.

It seems also to be unnecessary to discuss at length the various remaining objections to the validity of the contract, but they will be briefly noticed. The first of the grounds upon which the superior court held the contract invalid was that the resolution of the council authorizing the mayor to execute the sublease was fatally defective, because previous to its passage it had not been presented to the auditor, and lacked his certificate that the contemplated indebtedness or liability could be incurred without a violation of the restrictions imposed by the charter. This defect in the proceedings is conceded, but the appellant contends that the provision of the charter above quoted is void, because it is an attempt to invest a ministerial officer with powers and functions purely judicial. This proposition is not, in our opinion, sustained by the authorities cited, or by any authority. The provision in question does not seek to invest the auditor with any power to determine what the law is, or what the rights of any parties are, with reference to any past transaction. It merely requires the certificate of an officer peculiarly conversant with the fiscal affairs of the city that there are or will be available funds, or that available funds may lawfully be provided to meet any proposed expenditure, before the passage of an ordinance or resolution incurring the liability. It is a restriction upon the legislative power of the council, consisting only in a requirement that they must go to the best source of information for the fact upon which their right to act depends. It is easily conceivable that an arbitrary exercise by the auditor of the power so conferred might in particular instances be detrimental to the public interests, but so might the arbitrary exercise of an absolute or qualified veto by the mayor or other executive officer; and, since there is no constitutional objection to the conferring of a veto power upon the mayor, we can see no reason why a similar power with respect to a certain class of legislation may not be conferred upon the auditor of a municipal corporation. But the appellant further contends that, notwithstanding the resolution was passed in the teeth of a prohibitory restriction in the charter, the city is nevertheless bound by the action of the mayor in executing the sublease, because the water company had the right to presume that the council would not have authorized the mayor to act without the proper certificate of the auditor. This proposition, also, we think is unsustained by authority or reason. It is no doubt true, as was said in Moore v. Mayor, etc., 73 N. Y. 245, that "it is indispensable to any government, state or municipal, that full faith and credit be given to the acts of the governing body, and that individuals having occasion to deal with agents of the government should be permitted to regard the acts of the government valid in the absence of any apparent defect either in the power or the manner of its exercise." And upon this principle it may be conceded that as to acts in pais, which cannot appear upon the records of the proceedings, they will be presumed, so far as necessary, to sustain the action of municipal officers in matters falling within their general authority. But this is not a case for the application of the doctrine invoked. The mayor of San Diego had no authority, under the charter or other law of the state, to execute the contract in question. All the authority he had was derived from the resolution of the council, and the water company was bound to know that he could act only in pursuance of authority so conferred. They knew, in other words, that he was, for the purpose of executing that contract, the special agent of the city, and were bound to examine his warrant of attorney. If they had done so, they would have discovered its invalidity by mere inspection, because they must have seen that it did not bear the certificate which the law required to be indorsed upon it. The deficiency here was not merely of an act in pais, but was a defect of power, patent on the face of the writing which professed to confer it, and for this reason, also, we are of the opinion that the contract was void.

The further objection by counsel for respondents that the resolution authorizing the mayor to execute the sublease was nugatory because the council could only contract by ordinance, need not be noticed further than to say that no authority to proceed by joint resolution in such a matter has been called to our attention, and there is this material difference between the two proceedings: that an ordinance cannot take effect without publication, while a joint resolution is not subject to that condition. The resolution in question does not appear to have been published. The only authority conferred upon the council by the charter "to adopt, enter and carry out means for securing a supply of water for the use of the city and its inhabitants" is found in the enumeration of matters as to which the council is empowered to pass ordinances. St. 1889, p. 651, § 1; Id. p. 653, § 29.

The second ground upon which the superior court held the contract invalid was that it violated section 18, art. 11, of the constitution, and the similar provisions of the city charter above quoted. It was found that the sum of $110,000 per year could not have been paid out of the revenue provided for the city for the year in which the contract was made, or for any subsequent year. But this finding is attacked by the appellant, and the evidence clearly shows, without conflict, that the annual revenue of the city, exclusive of the amount collected from consumers of water, has been largely in excess of $110,000, but that most of it has been expended for other purposes, so that the surplus was very much less than $110,000. But there is nothing to show that the claims upon which the revenues were expended were valid claims, or for the necessary expenses of the city government. For aught that appears, the amount required to pay the rent may have been used to satisfy claims upon contracts entered into subsequent to the date of the lease. It is found, moreover, that a revenue sufficient to pay the necessary expenses of the city government and the rent of the water company could be raised by the levy of a tax not exceeding the charter limit of 90 cents on the $100. In view of these findings the conclusion of the superior court on this point evidently was not based upon the ground that a sufficient revenue to pay the rent could not have been provided year by year without transgressing the limitations of the taxing power imposed by the charter. In fact, it appears from the opinion of the superior judge that his conclusion was based upon a construction of the word "liability" as used in the constitution and charter, according to which a contract extending over several years, and providing for annual payments for services to be rendered or materials to be supplied from year to year, is void if the aggregate amount of all the payments that may become due under the contract from first to last exceeds the revenue of the city provided for the year in which the contract is made. That is to say, he held this lease for 20 years void because the aggregate rent for the whole period, $2,200,000, exceeded the revenues of 1891. This construction of the constitution is not without authority to support it, but most of the cases cited by the learned judge of the superior court in his opinion, and by counsel for respondents in his brief, are considered in the opinion of Justice Henshaw in McBean v. City of Fresno, 44 Pac. 358, where it was held, in accordance with a conflicting line of decisions in other states, and in this state, that a contract of a municipal government extending over several years is not rendered invalid by the fact that the aggregate amount to be paid during the whole period is in excess of the income provided for a single year, and that such a contract, so far as this particular objection is concerned, is valid if an income sufficient for the purpose may be provided in each year without exceeding the charter limit of taxation. The opinion in that case also discusses another objection, which is made in a different form to the contract here in question, viz. that a contract calling for services or supplies for a number of years beyond the term of office of the members of the council by whom it is made is void because it operates as a restraint or suspension of the legislative powers of the council. It is sufficient, for our present purposes, to say that we approve what was said in McBean v. City of Fresno with respect to this question, as well as the decision therein upon the point last above mentioned.

The remaining objections to the contract are without merit, and do not call for particular notice.

The result of the foregoing discussion is that the contract of the city with the water company is held invalid upon at least two grounds: First, because the city was led by the contrivance of the water company to agree to pay, under the name of "rent," a subsidy to a railroad; and, second, because the mayor had not sufficient authority to execute it on the part of the city. This brings us to the proposition of appellant that, although the contract may have been invalid, the city is nevertheless estopped by its own conduct to deny its validity, at least in so far as it has been executed. The acts of the city most relied upon as creating such estoppel are, in addition to matters already stated, that the city required the water company, in pursuance of the terms of the sublease, to expend more than a hundred thousand dollars in extending its plant for supplying water to consumers, and refused to redeliver possession of the plant when demanded. It is doubtful if the doctrine contended for by appellant could be sustained without setting aside previous decisions of this court, but this point need not be determined, for none of the decisions of other states go beyond the proposition that a municipal corporation may be estopped to deny the validity of a contract which it had the general power to make, or to deny the validity of a contract, so far as executed, when the only objection to it is that it is for too long a term. But here one of the principal objections to this contract is that it contains a subsidy to a railroad, and is, therefore, beyond the power of the city, and incapable of ratification, directly or indirectly. Our conclusion is that there can be no recovery upon the express contract, even for the time the city kept possession of the water plant.

But the city had the general power to contract for a water supply for itself and its inhabitants, and under this power could undoubtedly have taken a lease of the water company's plant for a year, and could have renewed such lease from year to year. In effect it has done this very thing. Its express contract to pay $9,166.65 was invalid for the reasons above stated, but there is no reason why it should not pay the reasonable value of the use of the plant which it has actually enjoyed. The decisions cited by counsel for appellant from the reports of other states very clearly sustain his contention in this respect, and so we think do the decisions of this court. We cite the following: Light Co. v. Dunn, 62 Cal. 580; opinion of Field, J., in San Francisco Gas Co. v. City of San Francisco, 9 Cal. 469; County of Los Angeles v. City of Los Angeles, 65 Cal. 476, 4 Pac. 453; Argenti v. City of San Francisco, 16 Cal. 276 (opinion of Field, C. J.); Zottman v. City and County of San Francisco, 20 Cal. 96. We think the superior court erred in holding the city not liable on its implied contract to pay the value to it of the use of defendant's plant, as found in the thirty-eighth finding.

Counsel for appellant contends that the city is concluded by the allowance of the bills of the water company for the stipulated rent, and to sustain this proposition cites Light Co. v. Dunn, 62 Cal. 580, McFarland v. McCowen, 98 Cal. 329, 33 Pac. 113, and other cases. These cases are not in point, because they merely hold that the auditor, in mandamus to compel the drawing of his warrant for an allowed claim, cannot question the amount of the allowance. But here the city itself is contesting the claim, and is not precluded from showing that an amount allowed in pursuance of a void contract is in excess of reasonable value. The claim that the city is liable for damages for withholding possession of the water plant after demand made for its return is not supported by any argument, and, since it is not pressed by counsel, we deem it sufficient to say that, in view of the findings of the superior court and our conclusions upon the points above discussed, this position is not tenable. For the reasons above stated, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the superior court to enter judgment upon the findings in favor of the water company for the reasonable value to the city of the use of the water company's plant during the time it was actually retained by the city, with authority to take additional evidence, if necessary, to ascertain the exact sums payable for the different fiscal years; said sums to be made payable out of the revenues of the fiscal years during which they respectively accrued, according to the suggestion made as to the proper form of such judgments in Weaver v. City and County of San Francisco (decided Feb. 21, 1896) 43 Pac. 972.

DIETZ v. KUCKS et al. (S. F. 55.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 28, 1896.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT—ASSIGNMENT OF LEASE—APPEAL.

1. In the absence of an agreement to the contrary, a tenant who assigns his lease for the whole term remains liable thereon to the landlord, as surety for the assignee.

2. Where there is any evidence to support a verdict, and a motion for a new trial is denied by the trial court, its judgment will not be reversed on appeal.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by A. C. Dietz against C. H. Kucks and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. McElrath, for appellant. Geo. E. Degolia, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. Action to recover $755 rent reserved in a lease of real estate situate and being in Oakland, Alameda county. Verdict and judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Two points only are made for reversal:

First. That there is no evidence to justify the verdict of the jury. Second. That the court erred in permitting defendant Fugel to testify to the declaration of Stillwell, an agent of plaintiff, that he, the said Stillwell, had a letter from plaintiff authorizing him to agree to an assignment of a certain lease made by plaintiff to C. H. Kucks and Hugo Fugel, partners, and by them assigned to Fugel and Wettstein, partners.

The second point urged is wholly immaterial, as there was no issue upon the question of the consent of plaintiff to the assignment. His complaint, after averring the assignment of the lease, proceeds as follows: "And that the plaintiff agreed, in writing, to the said assignment."

The facts essential to an understanding of the real question involved are that plaintiff leased certain premises to C. H. Kucks and Hugo Fugel, co-partners under the name of C. H. Kucks & Co., for the term of four years from the 1st day of January, 1890, at the monthly rental of $75 for the first year, and $100 per month thereafter, payable monthly in advance. On or about September 1, 1892, Kucks sold his interest in the co-partnership to A. Wettstein, who formed a co-partnership with Fugel under the firm name of A. Wettstein & Co. The lease was assigned to the new firm, as before stated, with the consent of plaintiff. The new firm paid the rent reserved in the lease for some time, but finally became insolvent; and, Kucks having paid the rent up to the assignment of the lease, the real question is, did he continue liable for the rent accruing thereafter, or was he released therefrom by operation of law, or by the act or agreement of the parties? In the absence of some agreement to the contrary, the tenant who, as in this instance, assigns his whole term, remains liable as a surety. The assignee becomes liable directly to the lessor upon all the covenants of the lease which run with the land, and his assignor remains his surety to the lessor for the performance of such covenants. Armstrong v. Wheeler, 9 Cow. 88; Babcock v. Scoville, 56 Ill. 461; Salisbury v. Shirley, 66 Cal. 223, 5 Pac. 104; Greenleaf v. Allen, 127 Mass. 248; Wilson v. Gerhardt, 9 Colo. 585, 13 Pac. 705. But the question remains, was there a substitution of tenants, by consent of the parties, with an agreement that the original tenants should be released from further liability? The jury, under proper instructions from the court, found in the affirmative on this issue. The evidence in support of the verdict cannot be said to be entirely satisfactory. Still, as there was some testimony in favor of the finding of the jury, and as the court below, by refusing a motion for a new trial, evidenced its satisfaction with the verdict, we do not feel at liberty to crystallize our doubts into action by setting aside such verdict. Meyer v. Insurance Co., 104 Cal. 381, 38 Pac. 82; Mahan v. Wood, 105 Cal. 12, 38 Pac. 507; White v. Beer, 105 Cal. 9, 38 Pac. 513; Warner v. Cleaning Works, 105 Cal. 409, 38 Pac. 960. We recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; HAYNES, C.

PACHECO v. JUDSON MANUF'G CO. (S. F. 243.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. July 28, 1896.)

DEFECTIVE MACHINERY—FAILURE TO INSPECT—LEADING QUESTIONS—COLLATERAL ISSUE—OPINION EVIDENCE.

1. An employé injured by the breaking of shears used in cutting iron is entitled to go to the jury on the question of negligence,—there being evidence that there was an old crack part way across the lever which broke; that it could have been detected by reasonable and practicable tests, which were not applied, though it was not perceptible by ordinary observation, and was not known; that such shears sometimes break in use; and that shears of similar character, though somewhat lighter, had broken in defendant's manufactory.

2. A question whether instructions were given by those in charge "about picking out quick and active men [to work at the shears], so that they might get away from the shears in case of an accident," is leading, and calls for an opinion.

3. Where an employé seeks recovery for injury from the breaking of shears used in cutting iron, on the ground of negligence in not having them inspected, plaintiff, while he may show that similar shears used by defendant broke, because tending to establish the propriety of inspection, cannot show that they broke because of faulty construction, as this would raise an irrelevant, collateral issue.

4. While an expert may establish that a crack in iron machinery could have been ascertained in certain ways, he cannot testify as to whether it "could not have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary care and precaution"; this being part of the ultimate question of negligence for the jury.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county.

Action by Maurice Pacheco against the Judson Manufacturing Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

M. C. Chapman, for appellant. Fitzgerald & Abbott, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Defendant is a corporation engaged in the business of manufacturing iron and steel machinery. On April 7, 1892, plaintiff was employed at its works, and while he was assisting in cutting up a plate of boiler iron by means of a pair of shears weighing some 12 tons, and operated by steam, the casting forming the body of the lever or upper jaw of the shears broke. A fragment thereof fell upon plaintiff, and he sustained serious injury. He prosecutes this action to recover damages, claiming that defendant was negligent, both in the construction of the shears, and the oversight of them after completion. At the trial, plaintiff having closed his evidence, the court directed a nonsuit, observing that a case of ordinary neglect by defendant was not made out.

[1] Rehearing denied.

It seems to have been assumed by the court and the parties, on the trial, that danger to the person of plaintiff was to be apprehended as a result of the breaking of the shears. This being predicated, there was evidence that the shears were made by defendant itself about October, 1891. The jaw or lever which broke was a heavy casting, having a perpendicular section of two feet or more, and a breadth of about eight inches. It moved on a horizontal journal, which was lubricated through a tube extending from an oil hole at the top of the casting to the journal. Oil poured into this tube sometimes ran over on the outside of the casting. When the casting broke the line of the fracture extended through the same from a point close to the oil hole diagonally downward to the lower side. There was further evidence—not without conflict—that one side of the sectional area exposed by the fracture looked blue and fresh, as if then just broken, and that the other side, nearly one-half of the broken surface, was black, and more or less stained with oil, as if it had been previously cracked, and oil had run down the crack. The exterior of the casting was covered with dust, and it is not claimed that the crack, if any there was before the event in question, was known to any one, or was perceptible by ordinary observation. It was, however, in evidence that such a crack, if it existed, might have been detected by applying tests, as by sounding the casting with a hammer; that the only test of the shears ever made was in their practical operation about the work for which they were constructed, they having previously cut metal much heavier than the piece on which the lever broke; that such shears sometimes break in use; and that shears of similar character, though of lighter construction, had broken in defendant's works. Defendant owed to plaintiff, as its servant, the legal duty to exercise ordinary and reasonable care—First, in the original provision of safe appliances with which he was to work, and, secondly, in keeping them safe; employing, if necessary for this purpose, such practicable means and tests as common prudence shows to be proper for discovering defects which might occur with time and use. While we have not found in the record any sufficient evidence that the defendant was negligent in the original construction of this machine, yet the evidence was such that the jury might have deduced as inferences therefrom that, previously to the breaking which was the immediate occasion of injury to plaintiff, the shears were cracked and weakened; that this condition was so far to be reasonably anticipated as to render prudent the adoption of measures for its discovery, and would have been detected by the application of reasonable and not impracticable tests; that such tests were not applied; and that the shears broke on account of such discoverable defect. Whether these inferences, and the conclusion of negligence thereon, should be drawn from the evidence, was a question of fact, "to be determined from all the circumstances and surroundings of the case." Sappenfield v. Railroad Co., 91 Cal. 56, 27 Pac. 590. As is sometimes said, whether negligence can be inferred from the evidence is for the determination of the court, but whether it ought to be inferred is a question for the jury. Here it might have been, and the court erred in ordering a nonsuit. Sappenfield v. Railroad Co., supra; Alexander v. Mill Co., 104 Cal. 532, 38 Pac. 410; Bowman v. White (Cal.) 42 Pac. 470; Moynihan v. Hills Co., 146 Mass. 586, 16 N. E. 574; Huddleston v. Lowell Machine Shop, 106 Mass. 282; Baker v. Railroad Co., 95 Pa. St. 211; Brann v. Railway Co., 53 Iowa, 595, 6 N. W. 5; Busw. Pers. Injur. § 194.

Plaintiff complains of the action of the court in sustaining objections to sundry questions put to his witnesses. Thus, he inquired of a witness whether instructions were given by those in charge "about picking out quick and active men [to work at the shears], so that they might get away from the shears in case of accident." If such instructions were given, plaintiff was entitled to prove the fact, as tending to show that defendant knew the shears to be a dangerous instrumentality. Smith v. Whittier, 95 Cal. 279, 30 Pac. 529. But the objection made included the points that the question was leading, and asked the opinion of the witness, and we cannot see that it was error to sustain it on these grounds. So, the court refused to allow a question which counsel said was designed to show that many other shears made by defendant for cutting iron at its works had broken, from defendant's ignorance in their manufacture. While it was permissible to show that similar shears used by defendant broke,—which, in fact, was shown,—because this tended to establish the propriety of inspecting such machinery for defects, yet it was not competent to inquire whether such other shears broke because of faulty construction. Defendant would have had equal right to rebut the imputation, and so an irrelevant, collateral issue would have been tried. 1 Greenl. Ev. 448. The court rightly sustained an objection to the question put to an expert witness, whether a crack descending through one side of the casting "could not have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary care and precaution." He could properly testify (as, in effect, he did subsequently) that the defect was ascertainable by employing some of the methods described by him; but whether this would have been the "exercise of ordinary care and precaution" was part of the ultimate question of negligence, for determination by the jury.

Other assignments of error either are unfounded, or relate to matters not of probable occurrence on a new trial, and do not require discussion. The judgment should be reversed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed.

ORTON v. BROWN et al. (S. F. 290.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 28, 1896.)

APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—IRREGULAR SALE ON EXECUTION—LIABILITY OF SHERIFF.

1. It is the duty of counsel for an appellant to see that the evidence is fully set out in a bill of exceptions when he desires to have questions of fact reviewed; and where he has assented, by stipulation, to the manner in which it is stated in amendments proposed by appellees, he cannot be heard to complain that the trial court settled the bill as stipulated.

2. A sale of personal property by a sheriff on execution in bulk, when it should have been sold in several lots, is irregular, but not void; and, not being subject to confirmation, the purchaser is entitled to possession of the property on payment of the bid, and the sheriff can only be held liable for it thereafter in case he wrongfully fails to retake it after the sale is set aside.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by William Orton, assignee, against T. M. Brown and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Turner, for appellant. Buck & Cutler, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. Action upon sheriff's bond. Judgment was entered for defendants upon the verdict of the jury, and plaintiff appeals only from the order denying his motion for a new trial. Plaintiff is the assignee of the Consumers' Lumber Company, an insolvent corporation, which operated in Humboldt county, and defendant Brown is the sheriff of said county. On May 2, 1891, and prior to the insolvency proceedings, one Georgeson obtained judgment against said corporation for the sum of $1,031.58 and costs, in which action the plaintiff attached certain lumber and shingles; and on May 7th an execution was levied on said property, which was afterwards, on May 20, 1891, sold by the sheriff in one lot, and not in separate parcels, for the sum of $700, to H. H. Buhne, Jr. On May 23d said corporation served notice upon the judgment creditor, the sheriff, and said purchaser, that on May 28th it would move the court to set aside said sale, upon the ground of irregularity, specifying that the sale was conducted in disregard of the requirements of section 694, Code Civ. Proc., in that 596,000 feet of lumber and 326,000 shingles were sold in one lot for a grossly inadequate price. Said motion was heard on June 3d, and an order was made vacating the sale, and ordering "that the money paid by the sheriff to satisfy preferred claims be returned to the sheriff by the parties receiving the same, and that the $700 paid by Mr. Buhne for the property be returned to him by the sheriff," and ordering a resale of said property to be made according to law. On June 23, 1891, Buhne appealed from said order, and on November 21, 1892, the supreme court affirmed the order. 31 Pac. 257. On June 20, 1891, certain creditors of said corporation commenced proceedings in insolvency against it; and on August 14, 1891, it was adjudged an insolvent debtor, and said judgment was, on appeal, affirmed May 20, 1893 (33 Pac. 196), and plaintiff was thereafter appointed assignee. The foregoing facts, alleged in the complaint, are not disputed; but the complaint further alleged that it was the duty of the sheriff to take and hold said lumber and shingles under the said process and order of the court, and to safely keep the same in his custody and possession, so that the same could be subjected to sale, and, on information and belief, further alleged that he did not do so, but that he colluded, confederated, and conspired with said Buhne, and willfully and in violation of his duty agreed that Buhne should take said lumber and shingles out of his possession, and "that said lumber and shingles were taken out of his custody and possession by said Buhne," to the damage of said corporation in the sum of $6,300; "and thereby the said sheriff placed it beyond his power to again sell said lumber and shingles, in obedience to the lawful commands of said court." The prayer was for judgment for the said sum of $6,300, with interest from May 20, 1891. The answer admitted the levy upon and sale of the property to Buhne in the manner and for the sum alleged, and that said sale was set aside, and that Buhne appealed from said order, and denied specifically all allegations of the complaint charging the defendant Brown with misconduct or neglect.

Upon the trial, the plaintiff introduced several witnesses, whose testimony, we assume, sustained his allegation as to the value of the lumber and shingles. He also put in evidence the execution under which said property was sold, with the return of the sheriff thereon. The return, after reciting the levy and notice of sale, and giving a list by numbers and dimensions and quality of the lumber, and the quantity of the shingles, proceeded as follows: "And sold the whole of the same in one lot or parcel to H. H. Buhne, Jr., for the sum of $700, United States gold coin, said purchaser being the highest bidder, and said sum being the highest bid for the same. And I further certify that thereafter, on the 3d day of June, A. D. 1891, the sale was vacated and set aside by the Honorable G. W. Hunter, superior judge of Humboldt county, California, and a resale ordered, and thereafter H. H. Buhne appealed to the supreme court from such order. Dated July 6, 1891." The plaintiff called said sheriff as a witness, and he testified as follows: "I remember the sale of lumber and shingles under that execution. I made it myself. I sold it to Buhne for $700. I had notice that the sale was set aside by the court. I gave a certificate of sale to Buhne. After the sale was set aside, I did not retake the lumber from Buhne. The greater portion of it had been taken away. I don't know when the lumber was taken away. I only know by hearsay. It was never sold under the order of the court. I remember after the supreme court affirmed the order of the court setting aside the sale that you talked to me about it. I don't know when the lumber was removed." No other evidence was given or offered on behalf of the plaintiff. As to the evidence on behalf of the defendants, the bill of exceptions does not set it out, but proceeds to state that "defendants introduced evidence tending to prove the following facts:" That after the sale and delivery of the lumber to Buhne, and before the sheriff had notice that the sale had been vacated, the purchaser had taken and converted the same to his own use and placed it out of the power of the sheriff to retake or resell the same. "Defendants also introduced evidence tending to prove" that the lumber was so spoiled in manufacturing, and by being covered with sand, that it had no market value at the time of sale. "Defendants also introduced evidence tending to prove" that it was not the duty of the sheriff to retake said lumber after said sale, or to keep it in his custody or possession until disposed of under the order of the court; that said sheriff did not collude or conspire with Buhne in contempt of the process and orders of the court, or at all, or consent that said property should be taken out of his custody or possession, except as the same was delivered to said Buhne as the purchaser at said sale and by virtue thereof. The specifications upon which plaintiff's motion for a new trial was based are that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict; that the verdict is against law; and that the court erred in giving and refusing certain instructions.

The opinion of the court in passing upon the motion for new trial is printed in the transcript, and a considerable portion of it, and a larger portion of appellant's brief, are devoted to criticising the bill of exceptions upon which said motion is based as to the manner in which the evidence on behalf of the defendants is stated. Appellant's counsel prepared the proposed bill, from which was omitted all reference to the evidence on behalf of defendants. Defendants' counsel prepared amendments in the form hereinbefore stated, viz.: "That defendants introduced evidence tending to prove" certain facts, which were briefly stated. It was stipulated by counsel for the respective parties that "the judge of said court may sign the bill of exceptions presented herein as correct," and the judge, "upon the foregoing stipulation," settled and allowed it. There are many cases in which such reference to the evidence is sufficient and proper, as where the exception goes to some ruling upon a question of law, where the weight or conclusiveness of the evidence is not involved, but only the fact that some evidence has been given upon a particular point or issue; but it is not proper where the weight or effect of evidence is to be considered, as upon motion for new trial, where the ground of the motion is the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or finding. It was the duty of counsel for the moving party to incorporate in his bill of exceptions all of the evidence which, in his judgment, was material to the questions he intended to urge upon the hearing. Not having done so, it was the right of counsel for defendants to propose amendments, and, if these were not properly prepared, he should have aided in their correction, or refused to stipulate that the bill might be settled as amended; but, having so stipulated, he has no right to assail court or counsel for the result, or contend that it was the duty of the court to insert the evidence on behalf of the defendants in order that he may have the facts reviewed by this court. In his reply brief, he asks: "What is there for this court to review? In this case appellant is prevented from having the testimony introduced by defendants reviewed by this court. Can such a method of settling a bill of exceptions be approved? No." It is quite true that it is the duty of the court, in settling a bill of exceptions, to see that it speaks the truth, notwithstanding the parties assent to an inaccurate statement; but it is not contended that the bill in question contains any false or inaccurate statement, but the complaint is that the manner in which defendants' evidence is stated is not proper, and that it was the duty of the court, notwithstanding counsel's assent to the form and matter of the amendments, to write out the evidence in full,—a duty not imposed upon the court, but which rested upon counsel for appellant if he desired to have that evidence reviewed. The position of counsel would justify this court in refusing to consider the evidence, and in affirming the order denying a new trial, so far as questions of fact are concerned. At the least, we shall be compelled to hold that the statement of defendant's evidence is sufficient to show a material conflict as to all questions of fact therein stated, and, unless the order denying a new trial should be reversed upon other grounds, it must be affirmed.

The plaintiff requested the court to give to the jury the following instruction, which was refused: "I further charge you that the return made by the sheriff to the writ of attachment or the writ of execution, while prima facie evidence in his favor, is conclusive against him and also his sureties in this action, and that he and they are estopped disputing the truthfulness of the same and the legal effect thereof." The return to said writ has been quoted herein. It shows a sale made thereunder on May 20, 1891, in one lot, of all the lumber and shingles to Buhne, for $700, and that on June 3d said sale was vacated, and a resale ordered. All these facts were alleged in the complaint, and not denied in the answer, and were therefore admitted; and the jury had already been instructed that it was admitted by the pleadings that the sheriff had taken the property into his possession under the execution, and the court added: "I charge you that the return made by the sheriff to the writ of execution in said action is prima facie evidence of the facts in such return stated." The instruction requested by the plaintiff only added that it was conclusive against him. But it could be conclusive only as to the facts shown by such return, and, these facts being admitted, the instruction given, which was excepted to only so far as it declared the return to be prima facie evidence, fully informed the jury that there was no controversy as to any fact stated in the return.

But, conceding that the return of the sheriff is conclusive against him, of what facts is it conclusive? It is conclusive of the fact that he levied upon the property, and had it in his possession; that he sold it in the manner and for the price therein stated, and that the sale was set aside. Such sales are not subject to confirmation by the court, nor has the execution defendant any right of redemption. The sale is completed by the payment of the sum bid, and the purchaser is then entitled to the immediate possession of the property, and it was not thereafter in the custody or possession in fact of the sheriff, nor did he have the right to regain the possession until the sale was set aside by the court; and any subsequent possession of the property could only be acquired by a retaking. If the sale had been absolutely void upon the face of the return, such return would show the legal custody and possession of the property still in his hands. But the sale was not void, though it was irregular. San Francisco v. Pixley, 21 Cal. 56; Hibberd v. Smith, 67 Cal. 547, 4 Pac. 473, and 8 Pac. 46; Frink v Roe, 70 Cal. 303, 11 Pac. 820; Marston v. White, 91 Cal. 40, 27 Pac. 588. The liability of the sheriff, if he is liable, could only be for his failure to retake the property after the sale was set aside; and whether he was liable for such failure involves questions of fact, as to which the record, as already stated, shows such conflict in the evidence as will not permit the verdict of the jury to be disturbed.

Plaintiff's second request, which the court also refused to give, is sufficiently covered by what has been said above. It is based upon the theory that the property was lost because not sold, as required by law. The argument of counsel is that, because the sheriff once had the property in his possession, he could only be discharged by an affirmative showing, and that no discharge is pleaded. But the facts alleged in the complaint showed that Buhne, the purchaser, acquired the actual and lawful possession, and the burden was therefore upon the plaintiff to show that, in the proper discharge of his official duty, the sheriff could have retaken the property after the sale was set aside; and here, again, we are brought face to face with a question of fact. We see no error in the refusal of the court to give these instructions.

That the verdict is not against law sufficiently appears from what has been said, nor is it contrary to the allegations and admissions in the pleadings. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

BECKER v. FEIGENBAUM. (S. F. 103.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 31, 1896.)

CONVERSION—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—DEMAND—TRIAL.

1. Where error is predicated on the court's failure to give certain instructions, they must appear in the record.

2. In conversion, where plaintiff alleges that she placed in the hands of defendant, as her agent, a sum of money to be loaned on security, and defendant denies the agency, plaintiff need not allege or prove a demand on him for the money before suit.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by Susan Becker against Ludwig Feigenbaum for conversion. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. F. Coonan and J. N. Gillette, for appellant. Chamberlain & Wheeler, for respondent.

BRITT, C. It is alleged by plaintiff that she placed in the hands of defendant, as her agent, a sum of money, to be loaned on security, and that he converted a large part of it to his own use. She had a verdict and judgment for the amount thus converted. Defendant denied the agency, and resisted the action on the ground, alleged among others, that an account had been stated between the parties, by which a sum was found due to plaintiff much less than that now demanded by her. At the trial an exception was taken to the refusal of the court "to give the two instructions in reference to account stated asked for by the defendant." It is his main contention here that such refusal was error. It is admitted that the contents of those instructions in no manner appear in the record. Counsel has suggested no means by which we may divine their import, and our own ingenuity has been unequal to the difficulty. We discover, therefore, no error in the action of the court. It is not clear that appellant means to argue that the verdict was unsustained by the evidence. Plaintiff was indebted to defendant, and he attempted to apply part of the money in question upon such indebtedness. Of course, he had no right to do this, if he had received the money for the specific purpose alleged by plaintiff. There was direct conflict in the evidence upon the question whether he did so receive it, and the verdict of the jury is conclusive of the matter. By denying the agency, defendant rendered unnecessary allegation and proof of demand on him for the money before suit. Parrott v. Byers, 40 Cal. 614; Waddell v. Swann, 91 N. C. 108. The judgment and order denying a new trial should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

THOMASON et al. v. GRACE M. E. CHURCH. (S. F. 7.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 28, 1896.)

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES—POWERS—TRUSTEES—ACT OF SECRETARY—ESTOPPEL IN PAIS.

1. The powers of a religious corporation are vested in its trustees, and can only be exercised by them in their collective capacity, or by their accredited agents.

2. The secretary of a religious corporation possesses no inherent power to bind the corporation by entering into a contract in its name and behalf.

3. Where the secretary of a religious corporation has, without authority, contracted for paving the street in front of its property, the doctrine of estoppel by acceptance of benefits cannot be invoked to sustain the contract, where the work done thereunder was wholly worthless, and the act of the secretary was expressly repudiated, at the completion of the work, for that reason.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Thomason & Williams against the Grace Methodist Episcopal Church on a contract for paving, and to foreclose a mechanic's lien. From a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellants. Wm. F. Gibson, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is special assumpsit upon a written contract, to recover from the defendant (a corporation) the sum of $425.25 for paving 2,025 square feet of Capp street, in the city and county of San Francisco, together with interest, counsel fees, etc., and to foreclose a mechanic's lien taken to secure the payment thereof. Defendant had judgment for costs, from which judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, plaintiffs appeal.

The complaint sets forth a written contract according to its legal tenor and effect, and not hæc verba, whereby several parties, and among them the defendant, severally, and not jointly, agreed with plaintiffs to pay the prices therein mentioned, to the latter, for paving the roadway of Capp street in front of their several lots; the material to be furnished and the work done by said plaintiffs, "all in accordance with specifications on file in the office of the superintendent of public streets," etc., "to the satisfaction of the said superintendent of public streets," etc. The amended answer of the defendant denies that it entered into the contract, and substantially denies all the material allegations of the complaint, etc. The answer further avers that the expense of improving the streets devolves upon the adjacent property owners, until they are improved and accepted by the board of supervisors, when their further improvement becomes a city charge, and that the object of an approval of street work by the superintendent of public streets, etc., is that such street will be accepted, etc.; that plaintiffs commenced to perform certain work on Capp street, but used material so inferior, and performed the work so badly, that the board would not accept it, of all of which plaintiffs had notice as the work progressed, etc.; that defendant desires Capp street to be paved, and is ready and willing to pay therefor when the same has been done in such manner as to entitle it to acceptance by the board of supervisors. The pleadings are verified. The court found that defendant was a corporation "organized to provide a place and means for divine worship by its members"; that the board of trustees of said corporation consists of nine persons, including the president, Robert Husband, and the secretary, William H. Codington; that five members thereof constitute a quorum for the transaction of business; that the corporation defendant never entered into the contract, and never authorized or ratified it. The contract was in fact signed by the secretary of defendant, as follows: "Grace Methodist Episcopal, by W. H. Codington, Secretary Board of Trustees." There was nothing in the charter or by-laws of the corporation giving any authority to the secretary to enter into contracts without the order of the board of trustees. The findings proceed at length to detail the circumstances under which the contract was signed, and the action of the board of trustees touching the matter. The following is a brief synopsis of the facts as thus found: On the evening of November 2, 1892, after a prayer meeting, the solicitor of plaintiffs called at the church, and found the secretary and two other trustees of the corporation present. He presented the contract, and after consultation the secretary, at the suggestion of the two other trustees, signed it. No meeting or action by the board of trustees was ever had on the subject until the work was performed, when the board met to protest, and did protest, against the manner in which the work was performed, and against its acceptance. A majority of the members composing the board knew the contract had been signed by the secretary before the work was performed, but had no meeting and took no action in relation thereto until the meeting and action protesting, as above stated. The work was not done according to the contract, "but was constructed of very inferior materials, and in a very inferior manner, and is wholly worthless and insufficient, all of which was known to said plaintiffs." The superintendent of streets accepted and approved the work, and the board of supervisors repudiated and refused to accept it, as their committee had notified plaintiffs they would do when the work was progressing.

The court found that the corporation defendant never executed the contract. This finding is supported by the evidence. The powers which a corporation may exercise are vested in the trustees, and can only be exercised by them in their collective capacity, or by such agents, real or ostensible, as they have accredited, or by their conduct are deemed to have accredited. The secretary of a religious corporation, like the defendant here, possesses no inherent power to bind the corporation by entering into a contract in its name and behalf. There is no evidence tending to show that any custom or usage existed whereby the secretary executed contracts in the name of or for the defendant, and hence no inference of authority can be drawn from the previous conduct of the corporation in approving contracts of a similar character, as is frequently done in case of business corporations. Defendant did not approve the contract, for its first act in the premises, as a corporation, was to repudiate it. "A voluntary acceptance of the benefits of a transaction is equivalent to a consent to all the obligations arising from it, so far as the facts are known, or ought to be known, to the person accepting." Civ. Code, § 1589; Borel v. Rollins, 30 Cal. 409; Gribble v. Brewing Co., 100 Cal. 67, 34 Pac. 527, and cases there cited. But that doctrine has no application here, for the reason that the defendant neither received nor accepted any benefits from the transaction. The court finds expressly that the work "is wholly worthless." Under such circumstances, the doctrine of estoppel in pais cannot be invoked. Under the circumstances noticed, all other questions raised become false quantities in the problem, and need not be referred to. We recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

McLAUGHLIN v. SAN FRANCISCO & S. M. RY. CO. (S. F. 26.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 31, 1896.)

PLEADING—COMPLAINT FOR PERSONAL INJURIES—DOCTOR'S BILLS INCURRED.

Under an allegation, in a complaint to recover damages for personal injuries, that plaintiff has "necessarily expended in doctor's bills" a stated sum, evidence is not admissible to show the amount of liabilities he has incurred for such bills, but has not paid.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Michael McLaughlin against the San Francisco & San Mateo Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Morrison, Stratton & Foerster, for appellant. E. Crisp, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to recover damages for injuries sustained by plaintiff while a passenger upon the electric railroad of the defendant, as is alleged, through the negligence of said defendant. Plaintiff had a verdict and judgment for $1,000, from which judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

A single question is raised on the appeal. Plaintiff, in his complaint, after averring the nature and extent of his injuries, averred "that in attempting to be cured he has necessarily expended, in doctor's bills, the sum of $750 (seven hundred and fifty dollars)." Under this allegation the plaintiff was permitted to prove, against the objection of defendant, not that he had expended $750, or any part thereof, but that he had incurred an indebtedness therefor, which was not paid. Counsel for defendant afterwards moved to strike out the evidence, which was refused. The court also instructed the jury, in substance, that if, through the negligence of the defendant, plaintiff sustained injuries whereby medical services became necessary, he was entitled to the reasonable expense incurred therefor, and that the fact that plaintiff had not paid the bill would not preclude his recovery of the expenses so incurred. In all this, we think, the court below erred. In cases of personal injury of a plaintiff through the negligence of a defendant, there is no doubt but that, under a proper pleading, the injured party may recover for such necessary medical expenses as he may have become liable to pay, though not in fact paid before suit brought. Donnelly v. Hufschmidt, 79 Cal. 74, 21 Pac. 546. It will be observed here, however, that the allegation of the complaint is that he (the plaintiff) "necessarily expended in doctor's bills the sum of," etc. To expend is to pay out, to disburse, etc., and implies an act performed, a thing accomplished. To incur a liability to do the same thing is quite different. As was said by McFarland, J., in his concurring opinion in Donnelly v. Hufschmidt, supra, "The law is, I think, that a plaintiff, in such a case, cannot prove that he has incurred a physician's bill, under an allegation that he has paid it"; citing Ward v. Haws, 5 Minn. 440 (Gil. 359); Pritchet v. Boevey, 1 Cromp. & M. 775; Jones v. Lewis, 9 Dowl. 143; Sedg. Dam. (7th Ed.) 197, note a. See, also, Murphy v. Mulgrew, 102 Cal. 547, 36 Pac. 857. We are of opinion the evidence that plaintiff had incurred a liability to pay $750 was not admissible, under the allegation of his complaint that he had expended such sum; and we recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, with leave to plaintiff to amend his complaint if he shall be so advised.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, with leave to plaintiff to amend his complaint if he shall be so advised.

SAVINGS BANK OF ST. HELENA v. MIDDLEKAUFF et ux. (No. 15,902.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 23, 1896.)

MORTGAGES—ASSIGNMENT OF INSURANCE POLICY—FORECLOSURE—ISSUES—PLEDGE.

1. Where a mortgagee has taken an assignment of an insurance policy on a house standing on the mortgaged premises, as further security for the debt, and the house is destroyed before an action is begun in foreclosure, Code Civ. Proc. § 726, which provides that there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt secured by mortgage, does not apply to the insurance policy, and defendants cannot introduce into foreclosure proceedings any question concerning it.

2. The assignment of an insurance policy on mortgaged premises, as further security for the debt, is a pledge, within Civ. Code, § 2987, which provides that "every contract by which the possession of personal property is transferred as security only is to be deemed a pledge."

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Napa county; E. D. Ham, Judge.

Action in foreclosure by the Savings Bank of St. Helena against E. D. Middlekauff and wife. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. S. Pillsbury, for appellants. J. W. Goodwin, A. J. Hull, and Thos. Watt, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an ordinary action to foreclose a mortgage made by the defendants, E. D. Middlekauff and his wife, Addie, to secure a promissory note made by said defendants to plaintiff for $3,500. The said defendants first filed a short answer, in which they merely denied generally all the allegations of the complaint. Some months afterwards, when the case was called for trial, the said defendants presented, and asked leave to file, an amended answer, and also a cross complaint. The court denied leave to file either of said offered pleadings. The case then proceeded to trial, and judgment was rendered for plaintiffs, foreclosing the mortgage, in the usual form; and said defendants appeal from the judgment.

The only question raised by the appeal is whether or not the court erred in denying the motion of the appellants to file said answer and cross complaint. No question is made by respondent as to the time when the offer to file the said pleadings was made, or that the defendants were guilty of laches. The court denied the motion upon the ground that the proposed answer constituted no defense to the action, and that the matters therein set forth could not be litigated in this action, and upon the same ground denied the motion to file the cross complaint. The matters set out in the proposed answer and cross complaint are, briefly, that at the time of the execution of the mortgage the appellants also assigned and delivered to plaintiff a certain fire insurance policy, issued by the Sun Insurance Company, in the amount of $3,000, upon a certain house standing upon the mortgaged premises, as further security for said note, and that the said house was consumed by fire before the commencement of this action. It is further alleged in said rejected pleadings that the defendants had made all the proper proof of the loss to said insurance office, and took all the steps necessary, under the law and the conditions of the said policy, in order to render said money due under said insurance, and requested the plaintiff to collect said insurance money, and apply it upon the said note secured by said mortgage as aforesaid, and that plaintiff has refused so to do. It is also alleged in the cross complaint that there was a conspiracy between the plaintiff and the said insurance company to defeat said insurance. It is prayed in the said answer and cross complaint that plaintiff be compelled to proceed and collect said insurance money, and apply it to the note and mortgage sued on in this case. The court was right in denying the motion to file said pleadings; for they do not set up any defense to this action, or any cause of complaint against the plaintiff that can be litigated in this action. Appellants have presented no authority applicable to the contention which they make. Section 3433 of the Civil Code has no applicability to the position of the parties in this case. That section applies only to a case where one creditor is entitled to resort to each of several funds of a debtor, and another creditor of said debtor is entitled to resort to some but not all the said funds. Section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt, or the enforcement of any right, secured by mortgage upon real or personal property; and the form of such action is set forth in said section. The assignment and delivery of the insurance policy by appellants to respondent was a mere pledge. It was "a deposit of personal property by way of security for the performance of another act." Civ. Code, § 2986. "Every contract by which the possession of personal property is transferred as security only is to be deemed a pledge." Id. § 2987. A pledgee may sue to recover the debt for which the pledge was given, without first exhausting the subject of the pledge (Ehrlich v. Ewald, 66 Cal. 97, 4 Pac. 1062); and therefore, while in the case at bar the respondent was compelled to bring the suit to foreclose the mortgage on the land, the principle stated in section 726, Code Civ. Proc., did not apply to the insurance policy. We therefore see no principle upon which, in this case, the defendants can introduce into the litigation any question about said policy. Whatever difference there may be between the parties as to that matter must be determined in another action. The judgment is affirmed.

HOWETH v. SULLENGER et al. (S. F. 102.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 28, 1896.)

MINING CLAIM—LOCATION—BOUNDARIES—OFFICIAL SURVEY—JUDGMENT—INCONSISTENT FINDINGS—REVIEW.

1. Under Rev. St. U. S. § 2324, which provides that the location of a mining claim "must be distinctly marked on the ground, so that the boundaries can be readily traced," there is a sufficient identification of a lode claim where a stake or monument is placed at each corner and at the center of each end, with one or more notices of location.

2. Where the existence of an ultimate fact must be conclusively inferred from the probative facts found, the finding of an ultimate fact inconsistent therewith may be questioned on appeal without bringing up the evidence.

3. It is immaterial that the lines and monuments of the official survey of a mining claim are not identical with those of the original location, the location being void only so far as it exceeds the statutory requirements.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Napa county.

Action by W. S. Howeth against J. C. Sullenger and others to determine the rights of the parties to a mining claim. From a judgment dismissing the action, defendants appeal upon the judgment roll. Reversed.

John P. O'Brien and C. S. Harker, for appellants. F. E. Johnson, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. The defendants commenced proceedings under the mining laws of the United States to obtain a patent for the "White Rock Deposit" mining claim. The plaintiff in due time filed an adverse claim in the United States land office, claiming the same ground under an alleged location thereof; and this action was brought to determine the rights of the parties to the ground in controversy. The cause was tried by the court without a jury. Findings were filed, from which, as a conclusion of law, the court found that neither party was entitled to the premises, and dismissed the action, each party to pay his own costs; and from the judgment entered thereon the defendants appeal upon the judgment roll.

The findings show that appellants attempted to locate the ground in question on November 4, 1882, under the name of the "Comet," and all the facts necessary to show a valid location are recited, except that it was said that "the marking of said location claim on the ground was such that its boundaries could not be readily traced"; and it was further found that from that time until the 29th day of April, 1890, they were in the sole and undisputed possession, holding the same by virtue of their attempted location. The sixth and seventh findings are as follows: "(6) That having formerly discovered a lode or deposit of mineral or mineral-bearing rock bearing magnesite, on the 29th day of April, 1890, defendants attempted to make a relocation of the said lands and premises, under the name of the 'White Rock Deposit,' by posting thereupon in conspicuous places, viz. on a pine tree near the ledge, and on the said south center stake of the land so claimed, notices in which the names of the locators, the date of location, and description of said lands and premises, by reference to permanent monuments sufficient for identification of said claim, were given, and thereupon marking said location on the ground by erecting a stake three or four inches in diameter and four or five feet high, in a mound of rocks two or three feet across, and eighteen to twenty-four inches high, at the north end, and another at the south end of the center line, and a like stake and mound at each of the four corners of their claim, which marking and location embraced the lands and premises in dispute. (7) Said locations were not distinctly marked on the ground, so that their boundaries could be readily traced." The court further found that the location notice was duly recorded; that the requisite amount of work was performed; that it had been surveyed under the direction of the United States surveyor general, "showing accurately the boundaries of the claim distinctly marked by monuments on the ground."

Without referring more particularly to the findings, it may be said that the only question is whether the relocation was sufficiently marked upon the ground, all other requirements essential to a valid location appearing to have been complied with. The record gives no intimation of the defect upon which the conclusion of the trial court was based. The sixth finding shows that notices of the location were posted in conspicuous places, containing a "description of said lands and premises sufficient for identification"; that stakes and mounds of rock were erected at the north and south ends of the center line, and a like stake and mound at each of the four corners of the claim, and "which marking and location embraced the lands and premises in dispute." Section 2324, Rev. St. U. S., provides that "the location must be distinctly marked on the ground, so that its boundaries can be readily traced," but does not prescribe how it shall be marked. That matter is left to the regulation of the local laws. Carter v. Bacigalupi, 83 Cal. 188, 23 Pac. 361. The mining claim here in question is alleged in the answer to be in "no mining district," and is therefore governed by the general provisions of the United States Revised Statutes. This statute was considered in North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co., 6 Sawy. 299, 310, 1 Fed. 522, 533. The court, instructing the jury, said: "Any marking on the ground claimed by stakes and mounds and written notices, whereby the boundaries of the claim located can be readily traced, is sufficient." In Southern Cross G. & S. Min. Co. v. Europa Min. Co., 15 Nev. 383, 9 Morr. Min. R. 513, it was held that "stakes and stone monuments, set at each corner of the claim, and at the center of each end line, is a sufficient marking of the boundaries, under the most stringent construction of the act of congress." In Gleeson v. Mining Co., 13 Nev. 442, it was held that setting stakes at the four corners of the claim is a sufficient marking of the boundaries. In some cases, in other jurisdictions, it has been held that a stake and notice at each end of the center line, with a claim of a given number of feet on each side, is a compliance with the statute; but no case requires more in marking the boundaries of a lode claim than a stake or monument at each corner, and at the center of each end, with one or more notices of location.

The sixth finding having shown that the claim was so marked upon the ground that its boundaries could be readily traced, the seventh finding is a mere conclusion from the specific facts found, and is wholly inconsistent therewith. If the seventh finding stood alone as the finding of an ultimate fact, it would support the judgment; but, if the specific findings of probative facts set out in the sixth finding are true, the seventh cannot be true, and in such case the specific findings cannot be disregarded. Geer v. Sibley, 83 Cal. 1, 23 Pac. 220; People v. Reed, 81 Cal. 76, 22 Pac. 474. In Smith v. Acker, 52 Cal. 219, it was said: "It has been held that, where facts are found from which the existence of the ultimate fact must be conclusively inferred, the finding is sufficient as the finding of an ultimate fact; but, when the ultimate fact is found, no finding of probative facts which may tend to establish that the ultimate fact was found against the evidence can overcome the principal finding." The qualifying words in this quotation must not be overlooked. If the existence of the ultimate fact must be conclusively inferred from the probative facts found, it is the equivalent of a finding of an ultimate fact; but, if the probative facts found simply tend to show that the ultimate fact was found against the evidence, the finding of the ultimate fact cannot be questioned on appeal without bringing up the evidence. In the case before us, we can conceive of no ground upon which it can be said that defendants' location was not so marked upon the ground that its boundaries could be readily traced, if the specific facts stated in the sixth finding are true; and those facts are strengthened, if that is possible, by the fact found by the court that defendants' claim has been surveyed by or under the direction of the United States surveyor general, "showing accurately the boundaries of the claim distinctly marked by monuments on the ground," though such marking by the surveyor general requires no greater number of stakes or monuments than were erected by the locators. Nor is it material that the lines and monuments of the official survey do not correspond to or be identical with those of the original location, since the courses and distances are simply estimated by miners in making their locations, and hence it often happens that claims are located covering more than 1,500 feet in length and 600 feet in width; and in such case the surveyor contracts the lines and draws in the monuments so as to make the location conform to the requirements of the statute, the location being void only as to the excess.

The plaintiff not having appealed, the judgment against him is conclusive; but, the findings upon the defendants' case being inconsistent and conflicting, the judgment against them is reversed, with directions to the court below, upon the evidence already heard, and such further evidence, if any, as defendants may introduce, to so correct its findings in the particular herein discussed as shall make them consistent and in accord with this opinion.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment against the defendants is reversed, with directions to the court below, upon the evidence already heard, and such further evidence, if any, as defendants may introduce, to so correct its findings and conclusions of law as shall make them consistent and in accord with this opinion.

PHILLIPS et al. v. HAGART. (Sac. 85.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 28, 1896.)

EJECTMENT—PLEADING—JUDICIAL SALE—REDEMPTION.

1. Allegation of title in defendant in an answer to a complaint in ejectment is but a general denial in an argumentative form, and does not constitute a cross complaint, requiring a denial of its allegations by plaintiff.

2. By Code Civ. Proc. § 701, two classes of persons are given the right to redeem from judicial sales made subject to redemption: First, the judgment debtor or his successor in interest; and, second, creditors having subsequent liens by judgment or mortgage, the latter class being termed "redemptioners." Held, that a grantee by deed from the judgment debtor after foreclosure sale is a successor in interest, and not a redemptioner, and is entitled to all the rights of redemption given by the statute to his grantor, to be exercised in the same manner.

3. A sheriff's deed executed on a foreclosure sale, from which the proper steps have been taken to redeem, by one having the right of redemption, is a nullity, and may be attacked at law in an action of ejectment for the property.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; Matt F. Johnson, Judge.

Action by J. P. M. Phillips and M. J. Healy against Peter Hagart. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wallace & Wallace, Pullen & Armstrong, and Bruner, Henley & Costello, for appellant. John M. Fulweiler and F. P. Tuttle, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This action involves the right of possession to a certain tract of land, and the complaint is in the usual and ordinary form for such cases. The appeal presents but few questions for the court's consideration.

One Morrison was the owner of the land. While such owner, a mortgage resting upon it was foreclosed, and the defendant, Hagart, became the purchaser at the sale under the foreclosure proceedings. Thereafter, and within the time allowed for redemption, Morrison transferred the property by deed to these plaintiffs, who at once took steps to redeem from the sheriff's sale. Notwithstanding the acts of plaintiffs in attempting to redeem, the sheriff refused to issue a certificate of redemption, and, in due course, gave a deed of the property to the defendant, as a purchaser at the sale. Defendant relies upon this deed for title, while plaintiffs assert title by reason of their deed from Morrison, coupled with the claim that the acts performed by them looking towards a redemption were sufficient in law to accomplish that result.

As already suggested, the complaint was in the simple and ordinary form as for an action in ejectment. Defendant, by answer, denied the allegations of the complaint, and set out his title in detail, consisting of the sheriff's deed and the proceedings upon which it was based. Plaintiffs answered defendant's pleading by denials. It is now claimed by defendant that the affirmative matters set out in his answer constituted a cross complaint, and that certain allegations thereof must be deemed to be true by reason of insufficient denials thereto. Upon the insufficiency of these denials we will not dwell, for the contention seems to be immaterial. The affirmative matters set out by defendant in no sense constituted a cross complaint, and no denial of them was necessary. A recital by defendant of his title was no more than a denial of plaintiffs' title, and opened the door no wider for the admission of evidence. Whatever defendant was entitled to prove under his pleading as he framed it, he was entitled to prove under a general denial. An allegation of title in himself, in an action of ejectment, by defendant, is but a general denial in an argumentative form. Marshall v. Shafter, 32 Cal. 192. See Cooper v. Miller (Cal.) 45 Pac. 325.

Did plaintiffs, as successors in interest of Morrison, the judgment debtor, redeem from the sheriff's sale to defendant, Hagart? It is conceded that the sheriff refused to issue a certificate of redemption to plaintiffs, but, as to the fact of a redemption, that circumstance is immaterial, for the issuance of the certificate is no part of the redemption. Appellants, who attack the sufficiency of the redemption, insist that plaintiffs were "redemptioners," in the sense of the word as used in section 705 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, as such redemptioners, failed to comply with the demands of that section, and therefore failed to perfect their attempted redemption. Upon the part of plaintiffs, it is insisted that they were not "redemptioners," as the term is there used, but "successors in interest" of the judgment debtor, and, consequently, not required to follow those provisions of the statute. Section 701 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares: "Property sold subject to redemption, as provided in the last section, or any part sold separately, may be redeemed in the manner hereinafter provided, by the following persons or their successors in interest: (1) The judgment debtor, or his successor in interest in the whole or any part of the property; (2) a creditor having a lien by judgment or mortgage on the property sold, or on some share or part thereof, subsequent to that on which the property was sold. The persons mentioned in the second subdivision of this section are in this chapter termed redemptioners." It is thus observable that judgment debtors and their successors in interest do not come within the class termed "redemptioners," and therefore are not required to follow the demands of section 705 in making a redemption. While the successor in interest of the judgment debtor is mentioned only in section 701, and the succeeding sections refer to the judgment debtor and redemptioners alone, still that fact is not material. The statute declares that successors in interest have the right to redeem, and further declares, in effect, that they are not to be considered "redemptioners" as the word is there used. Under such conditions, successors in interest stand in the place of judgment debtors; and when the statute uses the term "judgment debtors," as contradistinguished from "redemptioners," the words should be construed broadly enough to include successors in interest of judgment debtors. That such was the intention of the legislative mind there can be no question, and that the successor in interest of the judgment debtor possesses the rights given by the statute to the judgment debtor, rather than those of the redemptioner, there is likewise no question.

It is insisted that the recital in the sheriff's deed given to defendant, Hagart, that there had been no redemption from the sale to defendant, was conclusive upon the judgment debtor, Morrison, and his successors in interest, these plaintiffs; and that, until such deed was attacked and set aside in equity, it was beyond and above any attack at law which these plaintiffs could make upon it. It is insisted that, being the sheriff's deed, it was the judgment debtor's deed, and the sheriff's recitals therein were the judgment debtor's recitals; and that, consequently, the debtor was estopped from gainsaying their truth. The position here assumed by appellant is unsound. It is not true that the sheriff's deed cannot be attacked by the judgment debtor except in equity, as numberless cases found in the reports of this state fully prove. Mr. Freeman, in his work on Executions (section 351), in speaking as to the judgment debtor's defenses in ejectment, says: "He may certainly resist the action with success if he can show that his interest in the property was of a character not subject to levy and sale under execution. He may also avail himself of any defect in the judgment, execution, or proceedings of so serious a character as to render the sale void." The power of the sheriff to make the deed primarily depends upon a valid judgment and execution, and that the execution and judgment are void, can always be shown by the debtor in defending against an action for possession. It has been held that a recital of those matters in the deed is not even evidence of the fact of their existence, and that their production in evidence is absolutely necessary to support the deed, or no title is shown. Section 703 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares that, if the judgment debtor redeem, the effect of the sale is terminated, and he is restored to his estate. In this case it is shown by oral evidence that a redemption took place. The court has so found the fact, and, the moment a redemption occurred, all interest to the realty possessed by the purchaser at the sale ceased, and the title of the judgment debtor stood as if no sale had ever taken place. Such being the fact, the power of the sheriff to pass title by deed no longer existed, and any deed made by him was a nullity. It would sanction gross injustice to hold that any recital of a fact made in the deed by the sheriff would be conclusive upon the judgment debtor. Such a holding would give him authority to recite himself into a power which he in no way had, and make his deed valid when it was void at all points. It should not be held that the false recital in a sheriff's deed that no redemption had taken place can be binding when at that time the sheriff was shorn of all power to make any recital, or even to make any deed. This whole question is well disposed of by Mr. Freeman at section 325 of his work upon Executions: "A deed made by an officer is merely the execution of an authority created by statute. Unless the essential conditions prescribed by statute exist, the power to execute the deed cannot be affirmed; and an officer's deed, executed where he had no power or authority to make it, is in legal effect no deed whatever. It is absolutely void. It is impossible, owing to conflicting decisions, to say precisely what must in all cases exist to confer authority upon an officer to execute a deed. These four things may, however, be unquestioned, be affirmed to be indispensable, for without them a deed purporting to be made by an officer has no legal effect: There must exist a judgment and an execution, neither of which is void; the time for redemption must have expired without any redemption having been made; and the lands which the officer undertakes to convey must be situate within the territorial jurisdiction in which he is authorized to act."

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WORDEN. (Cr. 110.)[1]

HOMICIDE — INSTRUCTIONS — ALIBI — REASONABLE DOUBT—MURDER IN SECOND DEGREE—EVIDENCE.

1. Under Pen. Code, § 1126, which requires the jury "to receive as law what is laid down as such by the court," it is not error for the court to say, in charging the jury, "You should receive the law as I state it to be, notwithstanding you may firmly believe that I am wrong, and that the law is, or should be, otherwise."

2. It is not error for the court to correctly state the theory of the prosecution, where the jury are carefully informed that such a statement is not one of facts, but only what was claimed by the prosecution.

3. Where the record shows that two matters mentioned by the judge as defenses were in fact the only ones involved, possible error in his stating, as introductory to the charge, that defendant had introduced evidence tending to establish two defenses (describing them), was without prejudice.

4. It is not error to charge that, "when a defendant undertakes to establish an alibi, the evidence which he offers, taken with the other evidence in the case, must account for him during the whole period," where the proposition of reasonable doubt as to defendant's whereabouts is embodied in another part of the charge.

5. On a trial for murder, where defendant presented his case entirely upon the theory that he did not participate in the acts ascribed to him, and not that the acts, if proved, would not constitute murder in the first degree, and the judge, in his charge, gave the statutory definition of murder in the second degree, and did not refuse any instruction asked upon the subject by defendant, it was not error for the judge to fail to affirmatively suggest to the jury that they might convict defendant of a lesser offense.

6. In an instruction on reasonable doubt, referring to a belief founded on the evidence, the clause, "A juror is not at liberty to disbelieve as a juror what he believes as a man," is not misleading or erroneous.

7. The question, "Wouldn't the engineer have seen the rail in that position?" after stating the supposed position of the rail, is inadmissible, as asking for the opinion of the witness.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; W. H. Grant, Judge.

S. D. Worden was convicted of murder in the first degree, with the death penalty attached. From the judgment of conviction, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Strong and E. R. Bush, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald and Carroll Cook, for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The information charges the defendant, together with several other persons, with the murder of one Samuel C. Clark; and he was convicted of murder in the first degree, with the death penalty attached. He appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The bill of exceptions, which forms part of the transcript, contains a full statement of the evidence given at the trial; but the evidence seems to have been brought here mainly for the purpose of pointing certain exceptions taken to instructions given the jury by the trial judge, for the point is not made that the evidence does not sustain the verdict. Moreover, the record shows that only three exceptions were taken to rulings of the court on the admissibility of evidence, and only one of these exceptions is presented or mentioned in appellant's briefs. The whole strength and stress of appellant's argument is upon asserted errors committed by the judge of the court below in charging the jury. We have carefully examined all the instructions given; and, considering them as a whole, we see nothing in them erroneous, or prejudicial to the appellant. The appellant presented 11 written instructions, and they were all given, except the second, in lieu of which an instruction was given substantially the same as the one asked; and these instructions presented appellant's side of the case very fully, and as favorably as he could reasonably have expected. No other instructions were asked by appellant. The only hostile criticism with which the charge can be justly assailed is that upon some points it is perhaps too lengthy and elaborate, but we think that it presents a fair and correct statement of the law applicable to the case. But counsel for appellant, in a brief exceedingly well constructed, endeavor, with great acuteness and ability, to separate the charge into detached fragments, and to attack each singly, and unaided by the context. Of course, if any one independent instruction contains an absolute error upon a particular point of law, such error is not always cured by the fact that the law upon such point is correctly given in another instruction; but, as a general rule, dividing a long charge into minute parts, and analyzing and criticising each part as though it stood independent of all the others, is not a proper method of arriving at the correctness or incorrectness of the whole charge. All the features and modifications of a principle of law cannot usually be stated in one sentence. As was said by Mr. Justice McKinstry when delivering the opinion of the court in People v. Doyell, 48 Cal. 93, "We must take the charge together, and if, without straining any portion of the language, it harmonizes as a whole, and fairly and correctly presents the law bearing on the issues tried, we will not disturb the judgment because a separate instruction does not contain all the conditions and limitations which are to be gathered from the entire text." The briefs of counsel for appellant have many divisions and subdivisions, but we deem it necessary to notice only the leading objections which they make to the correctness of the charge.

We see no error in the language, "You should receive the law as I state it to be, notwithstanding you may firmly believe that I am wrong, and that the law is, or should be, otherwise." The latter part of the sentence was unnecessary, but it in no way affects the correctness of the proposition that the jury must take the law from the court, as declared in section 1126 of the Penal Code, which provides that, although the jury have the power to return a general verdict, "they are bound, nevertheless, to receive as law what is laid down as such by the court."

The statement by the judge of the theory of the prosecution was not, as contended by appellant, a statement of facts. The jury were carefully informed, both at the commencement and close of said statement, that the judge was only stating the "theory" of the prosecution,—what the prosecution claimed. There was no error in this; for instructions should be made, as far as possible, applicable to the particular features of the case on trial,—to the issues and contentions developed by the evidence and arguments of counsel. And it appears from the record that the theory of the prosecution was correctly stated. Neither was there any error in the statement of the judge of the defenses of the appellant. The deceased, Clark, was killed in this way: He was a locomotive engineer on a train moving westerly on a railroad track from the city of Sacramento towards Davisville. About two and a half miles west of Sacramento there is a trestle or bridge over a slough on which the track runs; and when the train reached that trestle the locomotive and several of the cars were thrown from the track over the trestle on the north side, and down into the water, and Clark and several other persons on the train were killed. As stated in the bill of exceptions: "The people introduced a large amount of testimony to the effect, and tending to prove, that the first rail on the east end of the trestle, towards Sacramento,—the direction from which said train of cars was coming, and on the north side of said track,—had been removed by human agency, and that the trestlework beneath the rails on the north-hand side had been weakened or destroyed by explosives in the form of giant powder applied by human agency also, and that the weakening of said track was caused by the above-mentioned facts." The people also introduced a great amount of evidence directly to the point that the appellant, with others, on the day of the catastrophe, and a short time before the approach of said train, did the acts above described which caused the wreck and the death of Clark. Now, the judge said, in his charge, that appellant had introduced evidence tending to establish two defenses, namely, that the misplaced rail was caused by climatic influences,—that is, by expansion by heat; and, secondly, "that he was not engaged in the wrecking of the train, but was in the city of Sacramento for some hours both before and after the wrecking occurred." He also said, "This second defense is called, in law, an 'alibi.'" We see nothing in this erroneous or prejudicial to appellant. In the first place, it was not said that no evidence was introduced as to other points, and the statement was properly introductory to instructions upon the two defenses named. In the second place, the record shows that the two matters mentioned by the judge as defenses were in fact the only two involved. Appellant introduced eighteen witnesses, and of these the testimony of six (Marston, Creamer, Griffith, Forsythe, Bradshaw, and Sims) was entirely confined to the condition of the tracks of roads operated by the company owning the road on which the killing of Clark took place, the general purpose being to show that the rails were too close together at the ends to allow of expansion by heat. The testimony of nine (Castello, Hinby, De Riso, Curry, Conrad, Hafer, Knox, Fickett, and Thompson) was confined entirely to the subject of an alibi; that is, it went to the point that at the time when, according to the evidence of the people, appellant was engaged in preparing the trestle for a collapse, he was at Sacramento city, or on or near the bridge wihch spans the river between said city and Yolo county,—about 2½ miles away from said trestle. And the testimony of the other three (Barton, Freeman, and Fisk) merely tended to weaken somewhat the testimony of one or two of the people's witnesses about a matter of but little importance. It is clear, therefore, that this part of the judge's charge could not have been prejudicial to appellant.

The judge charged the jury that, "when a defendant undertakes to establish an alibi, the evidence which he offers, taken with the other evidence in the case, must account for him during the whole period"; and it is contended that this part of the charge is erroneous, because it does not include the proposition of reasonable doubt whether the appellant was present. But, as before stated, it is not to be expected that all the limitations of a principle will be given in every separate sentence of a charge; and in the case at bar the doctrine of reasonable doubt was given in almost all conceivable forms, and made applicable to every phase of the case, and upon the specific question of the alibi the judge said: "But if you entertain a reasonable doubt as to his guilt, or as to his whereabouts when his presence is material, you should give him the benefit of that doubt." Therefore we see no error in the charge on this point.

The court prepared, and gave to the jury, three forms of verdict; and it is contended by appellant that in doing so the court erroneously neglected to give, as one form, "Guilty of murder in the second degree." As to this matter the bill of exceptions shows that the judge said to the jury, "There have been prepared for you, gentlemen, three blank forms of verdict, which, by consent of counsel, you will be allowed to take to your jury room"; also, that "no objection was made by the defendant or his counsel in response to such charge by the court relative to such forms of verdict, defendant's counsel remaining silent"; also, that "no instruction was, upon the trial of this cause, requested by the defendant or his counsel as to what verdicts the jury could render, or as to what constituted either the crime of murder in the first degree, murder in the second degree, or manslaughter, nor was the court requested by the defendant or his counsel to instruct the jury that it was within their province to find the defendant guilty of any lesser crime than the crime charged in the information." Moreover, it is plain from the evidence introduced by appellant, and the instructions asked by him, that he presented his case entirely upon the theory that he did not do the appalling and "most horrible" acts ascribed to him, and did not participate in such acts,—not that the acts, if proven, would not constitute murder in the first degree. In the general charge the judge gave the statutory definition of murder in the second degree, and did not refuse any instruction asked upon the subject by appellant.

Under these circumstances, it was not the duty of the judge to affirmatively suggest to the jury that they might convict appellant of a lesser offense, when not asked by appellant to do so, and when such suggestion apparently would have been against appellant's wishes; and no error was committed by not doing so.

In the briefs of counsel for appellant the subject of legal malice is largely discussed, —an admirable subject for refined disquisition; but we see nothing in the charge upon that subject that is erroneous, or substantially different from the definitions of "malice" to be found in the Codes. The same can be said as to the charge about reasonable doubt. Of course, it would be much the better course for trial judges, as has frequently been said by this court, to limit their description of reasonable doubt to language which has received repeated judicial approval; but they usually desire to add something in their own language, and in the case at bar the judge added something to the well-known definition of Chief Justice Shaw. We see nothing, however, in his charge on this subject that was erroneous, or likely to mislead the jury, even if it did not make the matter any clearer. The judge said, "If, after considering all the evidence, you can say you have an abiding conviction," etc., and then immediately said as follows: "A juror is not at liberty to disbelieve as a juror what he believes as a man." This latter clause, of course, referred to a belief founded on the evidence; and a similar instruction was held in People v. Whitney, 53 Cal. 420, to be "useless," but not erroneous or misleading. The charge fully informed the jury that an intent to take human life is a necessary element of murder in the first degree. They were told that, in order to convict the appellant of murder in the first degree, they must be convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that the appellant, either personally or in concert with others, killed the deceased, with malice aforethought, by some kind of willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing, and that "in order to constitute murder in the first degree, the intent to kill must be the result of deliberate premeditation." This principle was given to the jury in various forms, and it is beyond question that the evidence abundantly warranted the jury in finding the appellant guilty of murder in the first degree,—murder of a most aggravated and shocking character. There was an unnecessary allusion to the fact that the derailing of a train is a felony, but that in no way changed the general nature of the charge.

The one exception to the ruling of the court on the admissibility of evidence arises upon the sustaining of an objection by the prosecution to the following question asked by appellant of his witness Sims: "Q. Now, I will ask you (you need not answer, because I think there will be an objection) if this rail had been placed that way, so the flanges of the wheel would come through here (pointing), wouldn't the engineer have seen the rail in that position?" Waiving the claim made by the respondent that this exception is not properly incorporated in the bill of exceptions, the ruling of the court was not erroneous. If the matter inquired about was material, the witness could have been questioned about the supposed condition and situation of the rail, the appearance which it would have presented, etc., but whether the engineer would have seen it was certainly not a question to be determined by the opinion of the witness. If that was an issue in the case, it was one to be determined by the jury upon the facts proven. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

WILLIAM HILL CO. v. LAWLER. (S. F. 178.)[1]

PROBATE COURTS—EFFECT OF DECREE DIVIDING PROPERTY.

A decree of the superior court, in a probate proceeding, making division of the property of a testator in accordance with a petition and stipulation of the widow and residuary devisees, filed with the final account of the executors, and without notice to other parties in interest, does not affect the rights of a prior grantee of the widow, by deed conveying her interest in community property, who was not a party to the proceedings, though such decree set off the property in severalty to other devisees. Such a decree can, in any event, extend only to the succession or testamentary rights in the property.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. Dougherty, Judge.

Action by the William Hill Company against John Lawler. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lyman Green, T. J. Geary, and A. B. Ware, for appellant. J. C. Sims, for respondent.

BRITT, C. The court below rendered judgment quieting the title of plaintiff, a corporation, to an undivided one-half interest in a certain tract of land, containing about 140 acres situated in Sonoma county. Plaintiff claims to be the sole owner of the land, and to be aggrieved by the refusal of the court to so adjudge. Patrick Lawler, father of the defendant, died on September 8, 1887, being then the owner of a large ranch which included the tract in dispute. He left a will wherein he declared his whole estate to be community property, and confirmed the legal right of his wife, Bridget Lawler, in the undivided one-half thereof, made pecuniary bequests to several persons (defendant among them), and gave the residue to James Lawler and P. H. Lawler, two of his sons. The will was regularly admitted to probate in the superior court. Pending the administration of the estate of said deceased, on December 21, 1887, said Bridget Lawler made a deed of grant to the defendant, John Lawler, of an undivided one-half interest in and to the specific parcel of land which is the subject of this suit, and the deed was recorded on the following day in the office of the recorder of said county. On June 18, 1889, the court made its decree of final distribution of said estate; reciting, among other matters, that said Bridget, James, and P. H. Lawler had, by written stipulation, agreed among themselves respecting the division of the property of the estate, and that the court approved the same, and, in terms, distributing and partitioning the lands of the deceased among the three persons last named in such manner that the tract now in controversy was apportioned to said James and P. H. Lawler,—no mention being made of any interest of John therein, or of the deed to him from his mother, said Bridget. The title of James and P. H. Lawler has passed by mesne conveyances to plaintiff, and thereon it founds its right in the premises.

[1] Reversed in banc. See 48 Pac. 323, 116 Cal. 359.

Plaintiff argues that, in virtue of the deed from his mother, defendant took an interest in the land subject to administration; that one object of administration is the distribution of the property of the deceased among the persons entitled thereto; that the decree operated in rem, and so defendant is estopped to assert any claim to the res. Had measures been taken to ascertain the persons entitled to share in the distribution of the estate pursuant to section 1664, Code Civ. Proc., or to make distribution and partition among the heirs or devisees and those claiming under them, as provided in sections 1675–1686 of the Code, and the decree or order of distribution had followed thereon, then it may be that it would have the effect contended for by plaintiff; for, in either of those modes of procedure, John Lawler would have been apprised, as prescribed by the statute, of the design to determine and declare his interest, and that, as grantee of Bridget Lawler, he must, if necessary, litigate his claim. But no such course was pursued. The order of June 18, 1889, was made upon petition, accompanying the final account of the executors, and proceedings taken under sections 1634, 1665, 1666, Code Civ. Proc. There was no attempt to make partition in the manner marked out by said sections 1675--1686; the decree merely conforming, it seems, to the stipulation of the widow and residuary devisees under the will. Conceding that the court had jurisdiction to allot in this manner the lands of the estate in severalty, still the effect of its action must be measured by those provisions of the statute under which it proceeded. These make it conclusive as to the rights of heirs, legatees, and devisees (Code Civ. Proc. § 1666); that is, upon persons claiming in the capacity of heirs, legatees, or devisees. Such was the construction adopted in Chever v. Ching Hong Poy, 82 Cal. 68, 22 Pac. 1081, where it was held, accordingly, that a conveyance made by an heir of his interest in the estate, pending administration, was not affected by a subsequent decree of distribution which ignored such deed, and purported to set over to the heir the interest he had previously conveyed. The same view of the operation of such decrees obtains generally elsewhere. Hall v. Pierson, 63 Conn. 338, 28 Atl. 544; Dobberstein v. Murphy, 44 Minn. 526, 47 N. W. 171; Woerner, Adm'n, §§ 345, 563, and numerous cases cited. "The decree of distribution is conclusive only as to the succession or testamentary rights." In re Burdick's Estate (Cal.) 44 Pac. 735. John Lawler's interest in the land accrued to him neither as successor of the deceased, nor under the will. There was no voluntary submission of his claim to the court. Estate of Vaughn, 92 Cal. 192, 28 Pac. 221. Hence the decree of distribution did not conclude him. Plaintiff argues that the case is without the doctrine of Chever v. Ching Hong Poy, because there the decree set over to the heir the same interest he had already conveyed, so that the decree operated to feed the prior conveyance, while here the property described in the deed from Bridget Lawler to John was not distributed to the grantor, but to other persons. But the attempted distinction does not reach the root of the matter. That lies in the incompetence of the court, proceeding as it did in distributing the estate of Patrick Lawler, to adjudicate upon rights not necessarily involved in accomplishing the purposes of administration.

The court excluded evidence which plaintiff claims might have shown that, at the time it purchased the title of P. H. and James Lawler, the defendant was not claiming the land, but was seeking indemnity from his mother for its loss. We see no error. Defendant's deed was recorded in the proper office, and this was notice of his interest, to plaintiff at least; and there was no offer to show that plaintiff was at all influenced by any act or omission of defendant. The judgment and order denying a new trial should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

In re PEARSONS' ESTATE. (S. F. 175.)[1]

WILLS—BENEFICIARIES—ORPHAN ASYLUMS.

1. A will providing for equal distribution of property among the different orphan asylums of a city, with a request that they be designated by the judge of the probate court, does not give an arbitrary power of selection; but the action of the court in making the designation is pursuant to powers conferred on it by law.

2. The San Francisco Ladies' Protection and Relief Society, so called because organized and carried on by San Francisco ladies, the articles of which declare that "the objects and purposes of said society are to render protection and assistance to sick and dependent women and children," and which has a home in the city, where is carried on the work of caring for and educating orphans, half orphans, and abandoned children, having therein an average of 20 whole orphans, 115 half orphans, and 42 abandoned children, and from 1 to 3 destitute women, is within a bequest to "orphan asylums" of the city.

3. An orphan asylum whose home is without the city and county, but is managed by an organization within the city, and receives most of its inmates therefrom, but does not confine its benefactions to the inhabitants of the city, or in any way discriminate in their favor, is not within a bequest to "the orphan asylums of the city and county."

4. A society empowered by its charter to maintain an orphan asylum, but which is in fact a reformatory, most of its inmates being committed to it under Code, § 1388, others being sent to it by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and occasionally one being brought to it by a mother who cannot support her child, or who has a child that runs away, is not within a bequest to the "orphan asylums" of a city.

5. Institutions which did not maintain orphan asylums till after the death of testator, who provided that in a certain event specified property should be sold, and the proceeds distributed among the orphan asylums of the city, are not entitled to share in the bequest, though they had such orphan asylums before the distribution.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Hiram A. Pearsons, deceased. From a decree of distribution, certain institutions appeal. Modified.

Joseph Hutchinson, for appellant Ladies' Protection and Relief Society. E. Foulds, for appellant Bishop Armitage Church Orphanage. T. C. Coogan, for appellant Boys' and Girls' Aid Directory. Chas. F. Hanlon, for appellant Girls' Directory Orphan Asylum. A. N. Drown, Geo. W. Haight, A. H. Loughborough, Jos. Naphthaly, Thos. F. Barry, and M. C. Hassett, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. The decedent died July 7, 1889, leaving an olographic will. In it he provided that in a certain event (which has occurred) specified property should be sold, and that "the proceeds of such sale be equally distributed among the different orphan asylums of the city and county of San Francisco, and said asylums I request to be designated by the judge of the probate court." The property was sold, and a large sum realized. There were 13 different applications for a share of the fund, each applicant claiming to be an orphan asylum of the city and county of San Francisco, and asking that a partial distribution be made. The court found that of the money in the hands of the executor $100,000 could be distributed without danger to creditors, and that such sum did not constitute one-third in value of the estate. The court made a decree distributing that sum, and designated five only of the applicants as orphan asylums of the city and county of San Francisco. These are the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum, the San Francisco Protestant Orphan Asylum, the Maria Kipp Church Orphanage, the St. Vincent Orphan Asylum, and the Pacific Hebrew Orphan Asylum. Four of the eight institutions whose claims were rejected appealed. They are the San Francisco Ladies' Protection and Relief Society, the Bishop Armitage Church Orphanage, the Boys' and Girls' Aid Society, and the Girls' Directory Orphan Asylum.

Respondents raise a preliminary point that it matters not whether the appellants are orphan asylums of the city and county of San Francisco or not, because, they say, the will gave to the judge of the probate court the power of selection, and that selection, having been made, is conclusive. This must mean that the judge was not acting simply as judge, exercising functions conferred upon him by law, but was acting under a power contained in the will. A mere statement of the proposition disposes of it. The judge could not at the same time act as trustee of a power under the will and as judge. The principle is correctly enunciated in Druid Park Heights Co. v. Oettinger, 53 Md. 46, as follows: "In this state, as in almost all the United States, courts of equity take the supervision of all trusts. 'Relief has been decreed when the original trustees declined to act, or were desirous of being discharged, or had absconded, or were incapable of acting through age or infirmity, or could not discharge the trust through disagreement amongst themselves, or had been guilty of breaches of trust, or had become bankrupt.' Hill, Trustees, 290, 291. The substituted trustee, when so appointed and qualified, sustains to the estate the character of trustee as fully as if he had been originally appointed. Cole v. Wade, 16 Ves. 44. But where the discretionary powers are such as would not belong to the court because of its jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the trust, independent of the authority of the will,—as, for instance, where the power is one of selecting the beneficiaries to enjoy the testator's bounty,—the court will not exercise it, and, under the rules of law, cannot confer such discretion on a trustee." But there is no indication of such intention in the will. The "different orphan asylums" plainly means all the orphan asylums, and these—that is, all the orphan asylums—the court is asked to designate. This clause was unnecessary, but it is not inoperative. The presumption undoubtedly is that no clause is redundant or unnecessary. But this is a presumption easily overcome, and such repetitions and unnecessary expressions are quite common in wills. They are sometimes inserted to remove doubts or make plain some previous clause. It is not inconsistent with the previous clause requiring a division among the asylums, and must be so construed as to harmonize with it.

Suppose Pearsons had acquired, subsequently to the execution of the will, a residence in the county of Alameda, which residence he retained until his death; would it be held that the probate judge of San Francisco was intended? In what way could the probate judge of San Francisco have made the selection? And who is the probate judge of San Francisco? There is no probate court in the city and county of San Francisco, and no probate judge. The superior court has jurisdiction of probate matters. This court has twelve judges. No one is especially designated for probate jurisdiction, and there is no law authorizing such designation. Any one may exercise probate jurisdiction, and any or all may participate in making a decree of distribution. There is nothing in the record to show that the court acted otherwise than as a court in the exercise of the powers conferred upon it by law, and we must presume it so acted. To determine what institutions are orphan asylums of San Francisco involves the exercise of judicial functions. To choose from these institutions certain ones, exercising the discretion in accordance with no rule laid down in the will, is not the exercise of judicial functions. A judge determines existing rights, but does not create rights by the exercise of an uncontrolled volition. A testator could not impose such a duty upon a court. He may, however, by his will, confer rights upon others who may assert them before a court, and thus require a designation according to a rule indicated. It remains to determine from the record whether any of the appellants are orphan asylums of the city and county of San Francisco, and whether St. Vincent Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum is such.

The most prominent idea of an asylum is that it is a place of safety,—a place of refuge, a retreat, a sanctuary. An orphan asylum, then, is a place of refuge for orphan children,—a home. Children are naturally dependent, and all need a home and protection. Indigent orphans have no home unless it is supplied by charity. To afford such a home, with support and protection, orphan asylums are provided by the humane. The asylum is undoubtedly the home. But these must be maintained by individuals or institutions. The management may be in San Francisco and the home elsewhere, or vice versa. Perhaps an asylum might be called an asylum of the city and county of San Francisco because maintained by the municipality, irrespective of the location of the home. So, too, if it were exclusively or in some special sense devoted to San Francisco orphans. No such San Francisco asylums are shown to exist. San Francisco people or corporations might maintain asylums in any part of the world, but those outside of the city would not be orphan asylums of the city and county of San Francisco in the sense in which those words are used in the will. As there is no asylum peculiarly devoted to the care of San Francisco orphans, this benefaction must be confined to asylums whose home is in San Francisco.

The San Francisco Ladies' Protection and Relief Society, on its appeal, makes two points: (1) The court erred in holding that it is not an orphan asylum of the city and county of San Francisco; (2) in holding that the St. Vincent Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum is an orphan asylum of the city and county of San Francisco. The appellant society was incorporated on the 11th day of August, 1854. As to the purposes of the society, the articles state: "The objects and purposes of said society are to render protection and assistance to sick and dependent women and children." The declared purposes are sufficiently comprehensive to enable the society to maintain a hospital, a school, and an asylum, or either. The work actually done is described by Mrs. Adams, one of the managers, as follows: "We have a home in San Francisco, on Franklin street, running from Post to Geary; and we carry on there the work of an asylum for protecting, caring for, and educating orphans, half orphans, and abandoned children. During the ten years last past, should think we have had at the home, on an average, monthly, twenty whole orphans, one hundred and fifteen half orphans, and forty-two abandoned children. It is called the San Francisco Ladies' Protection and Relief Society, because it was organized and has always been carried on by San Francisco ladies, and not because we have had under our care and protection from time to time one or more destitute women. We have usually had at the home from one to three destitute women. They do a little work for the institution, and are given their living and a home. I do not believe we have had, altogether, a dozen women there during the ten years last past. We take children when they are from three to twelve years old, and keep them until we get homes for them." Respondents admit that appellant maintains an asylum, but deny that it is distinctly an orphan asylum, although it will necessarily have orphans among its inmates. It was not organized, and has not been conducted, they say, to maintain orphans as such, nor because they are orphans, but orphans are admitted because they are among the sick and dependent. What this appellant does in this respect is precisely what all the other applicants to share in the bounty have done. All, with the possible exception of the Protestant Orphan Asylum and the Hebrew Asylum, receive abandoned and destitute children, though not orphans; and no asylum receives orphans merely because they are orphans as a charity. Only the indigent are entitled to be so received. The fact that the phrase "orphan asylum" does not occur in the name of the appellant is of no consequence. In St. Luke's Home for Indigent Females v. Association for Relief of Respectable Aged Indigent Females, 52 N. Y. 191, the bequest was to a specified institution, and a mistake was made in the name. There was no institution bearing the precise name. In determining among different claimants which was entitled, naturally similarity of name was of first importance, and was so because the testator had attempted to name the legatee. Here the bequest is to a class, and we must presume the testator had in his mind only the class. He does not seem to have cared which got his bequest, further than that all of the designated class should share it.

The St. Vincent Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum is maintained by a corporation which, by its articles, appears to have been incorporated for "the administration of said temporalities of the said Roman Catholic Church in the said diocese of San Francisco, and the management of the estate and property of said church." To maintain an orphan asylum was not one of the expressed purposes of this corporation. It is said that the diocese extends from latitude 37 deg. 13 min. N., to 42 deg. N.; and from the Pacific Ocean, on the west, to the Colorado river, on the east. The extent and scope of this corporation is very great, and certainly it was not formed expressly to maintain such asylums, nor is such purpose disclosed in the articles. It is said, however, that it maintains several orphan asylums within the diocese, and its right to do so has never been questioned. The appellant is actually maintaining an orphan asylum of the same precise character in this respect as those mentioned by the applicants. Unless its action were ultra vires, and perhaps even if it were, it must be rated as an orphan asylum of the city and county of San Francisco. The St. Vincent Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum and the Bishop Armitage Church Orphanage stand, with reference to this bequest, in precisely the same position. The home of each is without the city and county, and each is managed by organizations within the city. Each receives most of its inmates from San Francisco, but neither confines its benefactions to the inhabitants of the city, or in any way discriminates in their favor. It is said that there is a difference in favor of St. Vincent, because St. Joseph is an asylum of the city and county of San Francisco for infant orphans, and that, when boys in St. Joseph reach the age of seven, they are sent to St. Vincent. But St. Joseph is separately incorporated, and has asserted a separate claim to a share of the bequest. If it is an asylum, it should have been so recognized, and allowed a share of the bequest. It has not appealed, and the facts in regard to it are not shown. We must presume that the court correctly held that it was not an asylum. If it were such, however, that would not help the claim of St. Vincent. It is said that St. Vincent is the largest asylum, and the only one controlled by the archbishop which could claim the bounty. We recognize the beneficent character of the charity there administered, and its extent. All the claimants are worthy, and all efforts to share in the fund unselfish. But we are not authorized to select the most worthy charities, or to distribute the fund in a way which will be thought fair between different religious denominations. It is not our function to distribute it at all, except by ascertaining, as best we may, who are the beneficiaries indicated in the will. Both of these institutions are most worthy, but neither maintains an orphan asylum in the city and county of San Francisco, and only such are indicated in Pearsons' will.

The claim of the Boys' and Girls' Aid Society was, I think, properly denied. That society is by its charter empowered to maintain an orphan asylum, but it has not done so. It is a reformatory. Most of its inmates were committed to it under the provisions of section 1388, Pen. Code. The superintendent, while on the stand, was asked to account for the others, and replied as follows: "The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children sends them to us. A mother who can't support her child may bring it to us, and sometimes a mother who has a boy who won't stay home, but runs away, brings him to us."

The Girls' Directory Orphan Asylum was incorporated in January, 1894, some four years after Pearsons' death. Before that time a charity had been conducted by some sisters of St. Francis. It was voluntary work, conducted without any special organization or any statement of a formal plan of proceeding. They had a home, and received their first inmate May 22, 1888. She was discharged May 31, 1888. The next inmate was received June 16, 1888, and discharged August 6, 1888. It does not appear from the record that prior to Pearsons' death it was known as an orphan asylum. In the Directory of 1887 it was published thus: "Girls' Directory, established in San Francisco in 1887. Objects: This home is a charitable institution, where poor girls of all denominations can find shelter until work can be obtained, and also for poor abandoned children." It seems that the sisters did not authorize this publication, but it correctly described the charitable work performed by the sisters, so far as disclosed by the record. After Pearsons' death, in 1890, the charitable work increased, and, perhaps, it may be said the sisters were conducting an orphan asylum. At the time of Pearsons' death there were under the care of the sisters 17 orphans and half orphans. Why they were there, except that they were destitute and needy, the record does not show. The presumption is that the judge decided the matter correctly, and I do not think this appellant has shown error.

Counsel for this appellant, while claiming that even at the time of Pearsons' death these sisters were maintaining an orphan asylum, contends that the real question is whether at the time of the distribution the institution is maintaining such asylum. Manifestly, this cannot be so. The rights vested at the time of the testator's death. No new claimants who were not conducting orphan asylums when Pearsons died could come in and share in the fund, the right to which had become vested. Counsel suggests that an institution which was maintaining an asylum when Pearsons died might have ceased to do so before the decree of distribution was entered. What ought to be done in such a case, should it arise, will demand the serious consideration of the court. But the possibility that it may happen is not sufficient to change the rule that such legacies vest at the death of the testator. The cause is remanded, and the probate court is directed to modify the decree in accordance with this opinion.

THURBER v. THURBER. (S. F. 235.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug 3, 1896.)

CHANGE OF VENUE—AFFIDAVITS.

Where an action—which should be brought in the county where defendant lives, but which Code Civ. Proc. § 395, provides may be tried in any county which plaintiff may designate, if defendant resides in the state, and the county in which he resides is "unknown to plaintiff"—is brought in a county other than that of defendant's residence, it cannot be retained in such county, against defendant's motion to change the place of trial, supported by his affidavit of residence in another county, on the mere affidavit of plaintiff that at the time of filing the complaint the county in which defendant lived was unknown to plaintiff, but it should be shown that plaintiff used diligence to ascertain such residence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county.

Action by Isaac L. Thurber against Alfred S. Thurber. Motion to change place of trial was denied, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

E. M. Morgan and I. E. Segur, for appellant. J. H. Skirm, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of the county of Santa Cruz denying a motion of defendant to change the place of trial of the cause from said county of Santa Cruz to the city and county of San Francisco. The action was commenced November 30, 1894, to recover money from the defendant. The summons was served upon the defendant, at the city and county of San Francisco, on the 15th day of April, 1895. Defendant appeared in due time, filed a demurrer, an affidavit of merits and showing that he was a resident of the city and county of San Francisco, a demand for a change of the place of trial from the county of Santa Cruz to the city and county of San Francisco, together with a notice that on the 27th day of May, 1895, he would move the court, upon the affidavit and demand aforesaid, for an order changing the place of trial as aforesaid. The affidavit of defendant, Thurber, stated "that he now is, and for several months last past has been, an actual and bona fide resident of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California," but did not, in terms, state that he was such resident at the date of the commencement of the action. Subsequently, and before the hearing of the motion, the defendant filed sundry affidavits showing his residence to have been in the city and county of San Francisco at and prior to the commencement of the action, and that he was still a resident thereof, etc. Plaintiff thereupon filed a counter affidavit, in which he stated that "at the time of the filing of the complaint in the said action, on the 30th day of November, 1894, the county in which the said defendant above named, the said Alfred S. Thurber, then resided, was unknown to the said plaintiff; that the said defendant was at the time of the commencement of the said action a resident of the state of California." These later affidavits were evidently by leave of the court or by consent of parties, as they were used without objection at the hearing. The court below refused the motion to change the place of trial upon the ground that the action was one for the recovery of money, and the place of trial is governed by section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and upon the ground that it was "an undisputed fact that the defendant, at the commencement of this action, resided in the state, and that the county of his residence was unknown to plaintiff." The propriety of this ruling is drawn in question by the appeal.

This is one of the actions in which the venue should be laid in the county in which the defendants, or some of them, reside. Section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides, however, among other things, that if the defendants reside in the state, "and the county in which they reside is unknown to the plaintiff, the same may be tried in any county which the plaintiff may designate." The question is as to the sufficiency of the affidavit of the plaintiff to retain the cause in the county of Santa Cruz, as against affidavits showing, without conflict, that he resided with his family in San Francisco. The general rule is that, in actions other than those mentioned in sections 392 and 393 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the defendant who is sued without the county of his residence may, upon a proper showing made in due time, have the place of trial changed to the county of his residence. Watkins v. Degener, 63 Cal. 500. To this general rule there is the exception that if the defendant is a nonresident of the state, or if a resident of the state and the county of his residence be unknown, he may be sued in any county of the state designated by plaintiff. In Loehr v. Latham, 15 Cal. 418, which was upon motion to change the place of trial, and which motion was granted by the court upon the ground of the nonresidence of the defendant in the county where the action was commenced, plaintiff had evidently, judging from the opinion of Baldwin, J., filed an affidavit similar to the one here, under a statute containing a clause precisely the same as that of section 395 of our Code of Civil Procedure (St. 1858, p. 82). Baldwin, J., said: "I concur in the judgment of reversal. I think, however, that the statute of 1858 authorizes suit to be brought in any county designated in the complaint, when the residence of the defendant is unknown. But this provision must receive a reasonable construction. A willful or careless ignorance of the residence of the defendant does not put it in the power of the plaintiff to sue him in any county of the state, however remote from his residence; for, if this were so, the effect of the rule would be practically to repeal this provision requiring suit to be brought in the county of the residence of defendant. It would be putting it in the power of the plaintiff, by keeping ignorant of the facts, or feigning ignorance, to sue where he pleased, and thus fraud would be encouraged and oppression practiced. To resist the application of the defendant, the plaintiff should have shown that he used all proper diligence to ascertain the residence of defendant before suit, and failed. He does not show this by his affidavit, or otherwise." Cope, J., said: "I concur in the judgment of reversal, upon the ground that the affidavit of the plaintiff does not show that he used due diligence to ascertain the residence of the defendant." This decision has not been overruled or questioned, so far as we are informed. The reasons for enforcing the rule enunciated by Mr. Justice Baldwin are aptly put, and cogent, and the practice indicated should be upheld and enforced. It follows that the affidavit of plaintiff was insufficient to retain the cause in the county of Santa Cruz. We recommend that the order appealed from be reversed, and the court below be directed to enter an order transferring the cause to the city and county of San Francisco for trial.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is reversed, and the court below directed to enter an order transferring the cause to the city and county of San Francisco for trial.

NEALE v. BARDUE et al. (Sac. 108.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 3, 1896.)

QUIETING TITLE—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action to quiet title and for other relief, the complaint is sufficient to support a judgment canceling and setting aside a certificate of redemption issued to defendant where it is alleged that the realty in controversy was never redeemed by anybody from the sale made by the sheriff to plaintiff's grantor, and that defendant was not the successor in interest of the judgment debtor, and not entitled to redeem.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Amador county.

Action by Vincent Neale against W. N. Bardue and others to quiet title and for other relief. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Vincent Neale, in pro. per. Wm. J. Magee and H. V. Morehouse, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. In this case the pleader has attempted by his complaint to set out a combination of causes of action. In his prayer for judgment, he asks to have his title to certain realty quieted; that a certificate of redemption issued by the sheriff to the defendant Bardue be set aside and canceled, and the sheriff issue a deed to him as the successor in interest of the purchaser at the sale; that an injunction issue restraining the further commission of waste; and that a money judgment be decreed in the sum of $5,000. Allegations may be found in the complaint bearing upon all these questions. A general demurrer was sustained to the pleading, upon the ground that it failed to state a cause of action, and plaintiff appeals.

It must be borne in mind that no misjoinder of causes of action or parties defendant is here involved; but the single question presents itself, does this complaint state any cause of action, however defective, of which a court of equity should take cognizance? Without passing upon the sufficiency of other causes of action attempted to be set out, we think the complaint sufficient to support a judgment canceling and setting aside the certificate of redemption issued to defendant Bardue. There is an allegation that this realty was never redeemed by anybody from the sale made by the sheriff to plaintiff's grantor, and we find a further allegation that defendant was not the successor in interest of the judgment debtor, and not entitled to redeem. Under such circumstances, the plaintiff, standing in the shoes of the purchaser at the sale, is entitled to have the certificate of redemption issued to defendant canceled and annulled. It is claimed by defendant Bardue that plaintiff ratified the redemption by accepting the redemption money. We find nothing in the complaint showing any ratification or estoppel which could be urged against plaintiff as to any matter of redemption. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

CHETWOOD v. CALIFORNIA NAT. BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 266.)

NATIONAL BANKS—AGENT TO SUCCEED RECEIVER—RIGHT TO PROCEEDS OF ACTION BY STOCKHOLDER.

1. 27 Stat. 345, c. 360, § 3, authorizes the election of an agent by the stockholders of a national bank in the hands of a receiver when all indebtedness to outside creditors has been paid, and provides that such agent, after giving bond, shall be vested with the control of the bank's affairs by the controller and receiver, being accountable to the circuit or district court of the United States. Held, that such agent takes the place of the receiver, and is at least a quasi public officer, the regularity and validity of whose appointment cannot be questioned in a collateral proceeding.

2. Where an action brought by a stockholder in a national bank, in behalf of the corporation while in the hands of a receiver, has terminated, an agent of the corporation elected to succeed the receiver as provided by law, and charged with the duty of controlling and disposing of its assets and of distributing the proceeds, is entitled to receive the proceeds of such action, less a reasonable allowance to the plaintiff for his costs, disbursements, and attorney's fees.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. Murphy, Judge.

Action by John Chetwood, Jr., against the California National Bank of San Francisco and others. From an order after judgment, T. K. Stateler, agent in charge of the affairs of defendant bank, appeals. Reversed.

Pierson & Mitchell and R. A. Friederich, for appellant. John Chetwood, Jr., and A. W. Thompson, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal from an order made in the above-entitled case after the entry of final judgment therein. The following facts are necessary to an understanding of the contention: The California National Bank of San Francisco was insolvent, and its affairs were in the hands of a receiver appointed by the controller of the currency at the time when Chetwood, as a stockholder of the bank, instituted this action on its behalf against certain directors to recover damages for moneys alleged to have been lost to the bank by reason of their mismanagement of its affairs. The receiver continued in charge of the affairs of the bank, and was made a party defendant in the action. Thereafter, at a stockholders' meeting, it was determined that the receiver should not be continued in office to wind up the affairs of the association, and that an agent should be elected for that purpose, and the appellant Stateler was elected such agent. The authority for these proceedings is found in the act of congress which provides as follows (27 Stat. 345, c. 360, § 3): "Whenever any association shall have been placed in the hands of a receiver, and when the controller of the currency shall have paid to each and every creditor of such association, not including shareholders who are creditors of such association, whose claim or claims as such creditor shall have been proved and allowed as therein prescribed, the full amount of such claim and all expenses of the receivership, and the redemption of the circulating notes of such association shall have been provided for by depositing lawful moneys of the United States with the treasurer of the United States, the controller of the currency shall call a meeting of the shareholders of such association by giving notice thereof," etc. "At such meeting the shareholders shall determine whether the receiver shall be continued and shall wind up the affairs of such association, or whether an agent shall be elected for that purpose. After the election of the agent, and after the execution by the shareholders of a bond to the satisfaction of the controller of the currency, and filed with him, conditioned for the payment and discharge in full of each and every claim that may thereafter be proved and allowed, and for the faithful performance of all the duties of the agent's trust, the controller and the receiver shall thereupon transfer and deliver to such agent all the undivided or uncollected or other assets of such association then remaining in the hands or subject to the order or control of said controller and the said receiver, or either of them, and for this purpose the said controller and said receiver are hereby severally empowered and directed to execute any deed, assignment, transfer or other instrument in writing that may be necessary and proper, and upon the execution and delivery of such instrument to the said agent the said controller and the said receiver shall by virtue of this act be discharged from any and all liabilities to such association. Upon receiving such deed, assignment, transfer or other instrument, the person elected such agent shall hold, control and dispose of the assets and property of such association which he may receive under the terms thereof for the benefit of the shareholders of such association, and he may in his own name, or in the name of such association, sue and be sued, and do all other lawful acts and things necessary to finally settle and distribute the assets and property in his hands, and may sell, compromise or compound the debts due to such association, with the consent and approval of the circuit or district court of the United States for the district where the business of such association was carried on, and shall at the conclusion of his trust render to such district or circuit court a full account of all his proceedings, receipts and expenditures as such agent, which court shall upon due notice settle and adjust such accounts and discharge said agent and the sureties upon said bond." The appellant, Stateler, received from the controller of the currency, and from Young, the receiver of the California National Bank, the certificate, deed, assignment, and transfer contemplated by the act, which recited that the shareholders of the bank, called to meeting by the controller, after due notice given as required by law, had elected an agent for the bank as provided by the act, and that Stateler was duly elected such agent, and the required bonds had been executed and filed by the shareholders to the satisfaction of the controller, as required by law. Stateler thereupon entered upon the discharge of the duties of his trust, and, after the entry of judgment in the case of Chetwood v. The California National Bank of San Francisco, petitioned the court for an order requiring Chetwood to turn over to him, as agent of the bank, $27,500 received by Chetwood in that action. The court refusing to make the order, this appeal is taken.

Considerable attention is devoted in the briefs to a discussion of the regularity and validity of the proceedings of the shareholders which terminated in the election of Stateler as agent, and the assignment to him by the controller and the receiver of the assets of the corporation. Into these questions we do not deem it necessary to enter. By the provisions of the act itself, Stateler succeeded the receiver in the performance of the duties which otherwise would have pertained to the receiver. Though chosen by the stockholders, he received his commission as agent from the controller, with whom a bond was filed for the faithful performance of his trust. In the conduct of that trust he is placed under the direction and control of the circuit court, to which he must apply before he can compromise debts or claims of the corporation, and before which he must go to make his report and receive his discharge. The agent therefore stands in loco the receiver, and is in fact the receiver, under a varied form of appointment, and under a different name. It is held that the receiver is an officer of the United States. Platt v. Beach, 1 Thomp. Nat. Bank Cas. 182, Fed. Cas. No. 11,215; Stanton v. Wilkeson, 1 Browne, Nat. Bank Cas. 162, Fed. Cas. No. 13,299; Frelinghuysen v. Baldwin, 12 Fed. 395; Price v. Abbott, 17 Fed. 506. If the agent be not also in strictness a public officer of the United States, he is at least a quasi public officer. In McConville v. Gilmour, 36 Fed. 277, the circuit court enters into a long and elaborate discussion of the functions and status of this officer, and reaches the conclusion that "the agent is an officer of the United States in every sense that the receiver is." Such being the case, and Stateler being de facto the agent, and presenting his commission from the controller, reciting his appointment, and the regularity of the proceedings attending it, the question of the regularity of his appointment is not one to be raised upon collateral attack in this action.

Under this condition of affair, it still remains to be considered whether he is entitled to have paid over to him the moneys that had been collected. The circumstances under which the $27,500 were paid have been fully set forth in the opinion filed in another appeal in this action. Chetwood v. Bank (S. F. 177; filed July 22, 1896) 45 Pac. 704. The shareholder who sues on behalf of the corporation is unquestionably entitled to conduct, manage, and control the litigation until a final determination thereof. Thereafter, in the case of a corporation not under disability, and where no good reason appears to the court why it should not be allowed to take into possession and dispose of the judgment recovered (Fox v. Mining Co., 108 Cal. 475, 41 Pac. 328), it becomes the duty of the shareholder, after reasonable allowance made for costs and expenses of litigation, to restore to the corporation the funds in his possession. In this case, while the corporation, as a corporation, was still in existence, it was not conducting or operating its business, and its assets, under the laws of the United States, had passed into the hands of the receiver, and from his hands to those of his successor,—the agent. The latter was charged with the explicit duty of collecting the assets, and distributing them ratably. If necessary, he could sue or be sued. There can be no doubt but that the receiver or agent would be entitled, where litigation had come to an end with moneys in the hands of the plaintiff stockholder under a judgment rendered in his favor on behalf of the corporation, to invoke the aid of the court, and to receive at its hands an order directing the payment of those moneys to him for the purposes of his trust; and in this case we entertain no doubt but that the appellant would be entitled so to do if it be found that the litigation in question is at an end. If we were to accept the statement of respondent's brief in this regard, no difficulty would here be presented. Respondent states "that Chetwood prosecuted this present action, which resulted in judgments severally against Thompson for $20,000, Wilson for $7,500, and Thomas for $139,738"; but in fact there was no judgment, severally or collectively, entered against Thompson and Wilson, or either of them, for $20,000, or $7,500, or for any other sum whatsoever. As set forth in the opinion upon the former appeal, above referred to, after the court had ordered judgment against the three, and appointed a referee to take an accounting to fix the amount thereof, Thompson and Wilson procured from plaintiff a retraxit, and a judgment of dismissal, by the payment to him of $27,500. The only judgments which were entered in that case were the judgments of dismissal in favor of Thompson and Wilson, and the judgment against Thomas for $139,000; but, as in the former opinion discussed and decided, the payment of $27,500 was a satisfaction of plaintiff's claim against the three defendants, and the defendant Thomas became entitled to a judgment in his favor thereby. That litigation then and there came to an end, as to the defendants Thompson and Wilson, because they had paid $27,500 for a retraxit of the cause of action in tort against them; as to Thomas, because the release and discharge of his alleged joint tort feasors operated in law to release him. An end to that litigation having been thus reached, the agent was entitled to have the proceeds of it, after reasonable deductions, paid over to him. Such was his demand, and it should have been granted. The order is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter the order prayed for, after making reasonable allowance to plaintiff, Chetwood, for his costs, disbursements, and attorney's fees in the said action as contemplated by law.

QUINCHARD v. BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF ALAMEDA et al. (S. F. 80.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 7, 1896.)

CERTIORARI—STATUTORY OFFICE OF WRIT—REVIEWING ACTION OF MUNICIPAL AUTHORITIES—STREET IMPROVEMENTS—PRACTICE.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1068, a writ of certiorari is to be issued only when the jurisdiction of an inferior tribunal, board, or officer has been exceeded, and there is no appeal, nor any plain and adequate remedy, and under such provisions the action of the authorities of a city or town in ordering and making street improvements cannot be reviewed by certiorari at the suit of a property owner who is liable to assessment therefor, as any want of jurisdiction is available as a defense in proceedings to collect such assessment.

2. The action of the authorities of a municipal corporation in ordering street improvements is legislative in character, and the making of contracts and assessments for such improvements is ministerial, the assessment under the statute being merely an apportionment by the superintendent of the expense on property fronting on the street in accordance with the rule fixed by the legislature, and they cannot, therefore, be reviewed by certiorari.

3. The office of a writ of certiorari being limited to an inquiry into the jurisdiction of an inferior tribunal or officer, it is improper to join in the same proceedings tribunals or officers exercising separate and distinct jurisdictions, or persons having no voice in the proceedings sought to be reviewed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, F. W. Henshaw, and John Ellsworth, Judges.

Certiorari by Quinchard against the board of trustees of Alameda and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and respondents appeal. Reversed.

R. M. F. Soto, for appellant. Chickering, Thomas & Gregory and E. K. Taylor, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff obtained a writ of review from the superior court for the purpose of annulling an order passed by the board of trustees of Alameda for the improvement of a certain street in that city, and all subsequent proceedings in reference thereto. Upon the return to the writ, and after a hearing thereon, the court rendered its judgment annulling the order for the improvement, "and that all acts or proceedings taken or had, done or performed, by the said board of trustees and by the said superintendent of streets, respondents, subsequent to the said 23d day of March, 1891, appearing in and by the returns herein, be, and the same are hereby, annulled and held for naught." From this judgment the respondents to the writ have appealed.

The plaintiff does not contend that the resolution of intention to order the improvement is insufficient, or that it was not properly passed by the board of trustees, or that the notices and other proceedings required by the street improvement act in order to give to the board of trustees jurisdiction to order the improvement were not properly given; but it is claimed that the proceedings subsequent thereto were of such a character as to vitiate the order, as well as the contract for doing the work, and the assessment issued therefor. Counsel have discussed very fully the sufficiency of these subsequent proceedings, but from the conclusion we have reached upon the proposition of the appellants that the writ was improperly issued, it is unnecessary to pass upon the sufficiency of these proceedings. At common law the writ of certiorari was employed for the purpose of reviewing the proceedings of inferior tribunals in their exercise of judicial powers, and was issued in cases where the final determinations of those tribunals were not subject to review in any other mode. The writ was considered an extraordinary legal remedy, and was issued in the discretion of the court, and only when there was no other mode of review. This discretion, however, was not arbitrary, but was only a legal discretion, controlled by principles of law, and, if improperly exercised, was subject to be corrected on appeal. Board of Sup'rs v. Magoon, 109 Ill. 142. As a street assessment in this state can be collected only by means of foreclosure in a court of record, and as the facts relied upon by the plaintiff herein would be available in defense of such action, and, if deemed sufficient to establish a want of jurisdiction either to order the improvement or to award the contract, would defeat the action, the discretion of the court would have been properly exercised in denying the writ. Spooner v. City of Seattle, 6 Wash. 370, 33 Pac. 963; People v. Myers, 135 N. Y. 465, 32 N. E. 241. The writ should never be employed as a substitute for an action to remove a cloud from a title. The scope of the writ has been limited in this state by the provisions of section 1068, Code Civ. Proc., and it is to be issued only "when an inferior tribunal, board, or officer exercising judicial functions, has exceeded the jurisdiction of such tribunal, board or officer, and there is no appeal, nor in the judgment of the court any plain, speedy and adequate remedy"; and by section 1074: "The review upon this writ cannot be extended further than to determine whether the inferior tribunal, board or officer has regularly pursued the authority of such tribunal, board or officer." In Central Pac. R. Co. v. Board of Equalization of Placer Co., 43 Cal. 365, it was held that the clause in section 1074, "whether the inferior tribunal has regularly pursued the authority of such tribunal," is to be construed as the equivalent of the clause, "has exceeded the jurisdiction of such tribunal," in section 1068. The character of the act or determination sought to be reviewed, rather than of the tribunal or officer by which the act or determination is made, is the test for determining whether the writ should be issued, for it is only a determination which is made "when exercising judicial functions" that can be reviewed. "The officer or tribunal to whom the writ of certiorari is issued must be an inferior officer or tribunal exercising judicial functions, and the proceeding to be brought up for review must be a judicial proceeding." People v. Bush, 40 Cal. 344.

The functions exercised by a municipal corporation may be legislative, administrative, or judicial, but only the acts done by it "when exercising judicial functions" can be reviewed under this procedure. "This writ does not lie under our laws to review the action of any tribunal, board or officer in the exercise of functions which are legislative in their character." People v. Oakland Board of Education, 54 Cal. 375. Whether an existing street shall be improved is a question to be addressed to the governing body of a municipality in its legislative capacity, and its determination upon that question, as well as upon the character of the improvement to be made, is a legislative act. Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 94, 927; Creighton v. Manson, 27 Cal. 613; De Witt v. Duncan, 46 Cal. 343; Bolton v. Gilleran, 105 Cal. 244, 38 Pac. 881. The act does not cease to be legislative because the members of the city council are required to exercise their judgment in determining whether the improvement shall be made. The judgment which they exercise in ordering the improvement is not a determination of the rights of an individual under existing laws, but is the conclusion or opinion which they form in the exercise of the discretionary power that has been intrusted to them, and upon a consideration of the public welfare and demands for which they are to provide. This discretion and opinion is a part of the legislative power that has been conferred upon the city, and is of the same character as that exercised by the legislature itself in providing for the general welfare of the state, and is equally independent of supervision by the judiciary. The adoption by the city council of an order for the improvement of a street is not in the nature of a judgment which is binding upon the city, but is merely the declaration of a purpose, and is only a step taken by it in contemplation of the improvement, from which it may recede at any time before a contract for the improvement has been awarded. The fact that a public agent exercises judgment and discretion in the performance of his duties does not make his action or powers judicial in their character. People v. Walter, 68 N. Y. 403; People v. Board of Commissioners, etc., of New York City, 97 N. Y. 37; In re Wilson, 32 Minn. 145, 19 N. W. 723. The distinction between a judicial and a legislative act was pointed out by Field, J., in the Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 761, as follows: "The one determines what the law is, and what the rights of parties are with reference to transactions already had; the other prescribes what the law shall be in future cases arising under it." In People v. Oakland Board of Education, supra, this rule was adopted by this court as correct, and it was said, with reference to the matter then before the court: "The board acted upon the proposition before it as one of policy or expediency, aiming to adopt that which in its judgment would be best for the constituency which it represented. Its action was then political or legislative, and was in no proper sense judicial in its character. It is conceded that the board exercised its judgment in the action which it took, but this it was called to do in the exercise of its legislative functions. It is apparent that the exercise of judgment is not the criterion by which this proceeding must be viewed to determine its character. To render it the exercise of a judicial function, its judgment must act in a matter which is judicial in the sense above indicated." In the opinion given by Mr. Justice McKinstry in Spring Valley Water Works v. Bryant, 52 Cal. 132, this subject received an extended examination, and it was said: "From the foregoing and other cases heretofore decided it sufficiently appears that it has always been considered by this court that the office of certiorari is to bring here for review the proceedings of governmental boards exercising a mixed authority, only when the matter is one in which they have acted judicially." See, also, People v. Supervisors of St. Lawrence Co., 25 Hun, 131; In re Mt. Morris Square, 2 Hill, 14; People v. Board of Health of New York City, 33 Barb. 344; People v. Board of Supervisors of Livingston Co., 43 Barb. 232; Townsend v. Copeland, 56 Cal. 612. Under the provisions of the street-assessment act, the proceedings of the city council for the improvement of a street—the resolution of intention, the order directing the improvement, the invitation for proposals, the award of the contract—are all legislative in character. With the award of the contract, unless there shall afterwards be an appeal from some act of the superintendent of streets, the functions of the council cease, and those of the superintendent begin. His acts—the entering into the contract, the acceptance of the bond, the fixing the time for performing the contract, the acceptance of the work, and the making of the assessment—are ministerial in their character, and do not call for the exercise of judicial functions.

Although the question has not been discussed by counsel, we do not wish to be understood as sanctioning, even by silence, the practice herein adopted by the plaintiff in joining in the writ the superintendent of streets and the contractor with the board of trustees. The statute provides that the writ is to be directed to the inferior tribunal, board, or officer, or to any other person having the custody of the record or proceedings to be certified (Code Civ. Proc. § 1070), and, as the review is limited to examining the jurisdiction of the board or officer to whom the writ is issued, there is a manifest impropriety in joining in the same proceeding tribunals or officers who exercise a jurisdiction separate and distinct from each other. Jurisdiction is, in its nature, an entirety, and exclusive in the body or person upon whom it has been conferred; and a writ of certiorari directed to different officers having no joint or common duties, but acting each independently of the other, is unauthorized. People v. Walter, 68 N. Y. 403; Starr v. Rochester, 6 Wend. 564. In the matter sought to be reviewed the functions of the superintendent of streets and of the board of trustees are entirely distinct, and that officer should not have been included in the writ. It is difficult to see upon what grounds the contractor was joined with the others, as no jurisdiction is exercised by him, and he did not even make any return to the writ. The superintendent of streets can exercise no jurisdiction until after the board of trustees have by their acts conferred such jurisdiction upon him, and the jurisdiction which he exercises is distinct from that exercised by the trustees. An appeal may be taken to them from the assessment made by him, and from other acts or determinations of his. Upon such appeal the city council for the first time exercises judicial functions (see Barber v. San Francisco, 42 Cal. 630); but the making of the assessment by the superintendent is but a clerical or ministerial act. Under the system adopted in this state the assessment consists merely in an apportionment of the expenses of the work upon the land fronting thereon. The rule for this apportionment has been fixed by the legislature, and the superintendent of streets, in making the assessment, is not in the exercise of any judgment or discretion, but merely performs the clerical functions of making an arithmetical computation of the amount to be charged against each lot. Bolton v. Gilleran, supra. The cases cited from other states, where the assessment upon each lot is to be made according to the benefits which that lot has received from the improvement, and in which it has been held that the parties to be affected by his acts are entitled to notice, and an opportunity to be heard before a legal charge can be made against their property, are, therefore, inapplicable. The statute, moreover, provides for an appeal to the city council from the act of the superintendent in making the assessment, and thus by express terms takes away the right to invoke the aid of a court to set aside the assessment by means of a writ of review. Wright v. Commissioners, 150 Ill. 138, 36 N. E. 980; People v. Thayer, 88 Hun, 136, 34 N. Y. Supp. 592. In the present case such appeal was taken, and the assessment affirmed. The judgment is reversed, and the superior court is directed to dismiss the writ.

In re BOODY'S ESTATE. (Sac. 199.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE—SEPARATE ESTATE—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—PRESUMPTION—DESCENT.

1. The presumption is that lands purchased during marriage are community property; and where parties claiming the property as the separate estate of the husband have not only failed to show that the husband paid for any of the land out of moneys belonging to his separate estate, but have failed to show that at the times of the various purchases he was possessed of any separate property whatsoever, the presumption becomes conclusive.

2. A naked right of partnership possession in lands before marriage is not such a right as to give one of the partners an equity to which the subsequently acquired title to a portion of the land so held could attach, as his separate estate, after marriage.

3. On the death of a husband, intestate and without issue, the widow is entitled to three-fourths of the community property, and her heirs take in like proportion.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Joseph B. Boody, deceased, the heirs of his deceased wife, Elizabeth Boody, appeal from an order distributing the real estate as the separate property of the decedent. Reversed.

Minor & Ashley and Nicol & Orr, for appellants. Baldwin & Thompson and Woods & Levinsky, for respondents.

VAN FLEET, J. This is an appeal from an order of partial distribution, distributing certain parcels of real estate belonging to said estate; and the only question involved is whether the lands were community property, or the separate property of the deceased. The deceased, Joseph B. Boody, died intestate, in the county of San Joaquin, November 7, 1893, without issue, leaving, him surviving, as his heirs at law, Elizabeth Boody, his wife, a sister, and the children of a deceased brother. Elizabeth Boody, the wife, died intestate November 10, 1893, without issue, leaving, as her next of kin and heirs at law, a sister, one child of a deceased sister, and the children of certain deceased brothers. The heirs of Elizabeth Boody claimed, on the distribution, that the property in controversy was the community property of Joseph B. and Elizabeth Boody, and that they were entitled, of right, to have distributed to them three-fourths thereof. The court below denied this claim. It found that all of the real estate involved was the separate property of Joseph B. Boody, and accordingly distributed to the heirs of Elizabeth but one-half thereof. The latter appeal, contending that the finding as to the separate character of the property is not warranted by the evidence.

It appeared, without conflict, that Joseph B. and Elizabeth Boody were married in 1857, and that the title to all of the real estate in question was acquired long subsequent thereto,—the first parcel in March, 1867, and the various other parcels at different dates thereafter,—and that all of said lands were acquired by purchase. The only evidence, other than that of the record title, bearing upon the circumstances under which any of the land was acquired, relates to two pieces,—one known as the "Locust Shade Place"; and the other, the "Swamp-Land Tract." The evidence tends to show that at and prior to the date of his marriage the deceased, Boody, and one T. P. Heath, were in possession of these two pieces of land, then public, unsurveyed lands, and were farming in partnership, cultivating the land to grain. The extent of their possessory holding does not appear, but they owned some stock and farming implements, and raised sometimes as high as two or three hundred acres of grain. It does not appear what the value of the partnership property was, or whether they were indebted to any extent, or how much, if anything, was realized from their operations, over and above expenses. Some of the witnesses on behalf of respondents testified, in a general way, that Boody & Heath were regarded in the community as successful farmers, and were reputed to have money to loan; but none of the witnesses knew anything of their affairs, except through general current rumor in the neighborhood. The testimony of Albert Drouillard, a witness on behalf of respondents, very fairly illustrates the character of the evidence relied upon to establish the separate character of the property. He testified: "I knew T. P. Heath and J. B. Boody. First met them in 1856. They were living together at that time on what is called the 'Locust Shade Place,' on the road from Stockton to Lockford. Heath and Boody were living together. I know the lands afterwards obtained by Mr. Heath as swamp and overflowed lands. Mr. Heath was farming that land in 1856; that is, the swamp and overflowed lands. * * * I knew the firm of Heath & Boody in 1854. They were farmers,—farming together in common. I couldn't tell you how much land they did farm; quite extensive farmers. I threshed there in 1856. I suppose there must have been three hundred acres of grain. I could not tell how many cattle or farming implements they had, or how much grain they raised that year. * * * They were considered successful farmers, and were, I think, in stock-raising also." On cross-examination the witness testified: "In the summer of 1856 I assisted Heath & Boody in threshing. I do not know how much grain was raised, or what it sold for. I don't know whether they were indebted at that time, or not. I don't know what became of the money realized from the sale of crops. I don't know anything personally about their affairs, or if they had a dollar over and above their debts at that time. I don't know whether any profit was realized from this crop of wheat. I know nothing about their financial or business affairs, except that people said they were successful farmers. I knew they farmed well. I know something about it, for I saw their farming. It is a fact, though, that men farm well, and get poor, and the raising of good crops is no evidence that a man is getting ahead." The evidence on behalf of appellants, on the other hand, tended to show that the partners did not have any considerable means at or about the time of the marriage of Boody. Mrs. Heath, who was a sister of Mrs. Boody, and who was married to Heath about a year after the marriage of the Boodys, testified that she loaned Boody & Heath four or five hundred dollars shortly prior to her marriage, which they used in their business, and that she never knew, at or prior to her marriage, of either Heath or Boody being possessed of considerable means. The evidence is wholly silent as to any means or property owned by Boody, other than his interest in the partnership property, at the time of his marriage. The partnership seems to have been continued after the marriage, but how long does not appear. In 1866, the land having been theretofore surveyed and the township plat filed in the local office, Boody filed a declaratory statement on the legal subdivisions covering the "Locust Shade Place," and thereafter made proof of his pre-emption right to said land, and paid for the same, and in June, 1868, received a patent therefor from the government. About the same time, Heath made application for, and purchased from the state, as swamp and overflowed land, the legal subdivisions embracing the "Swamp-Land Tract," theretofore occupied by them. Thereafter, in 1872, Heath, for an expressed consideration of one dollar, conveyed to Boody an undivided one-half of the swamp land; and Boody, for a like consideration, conveyed to Heath an undivided half of the land pre-empted by him. The other parcels in controversy were all purchased from private parties. This is substantially the evidence upon which the finding as to the separate character of the property is based, and we regard it as wholly insufficient to sustain that finding.

The purchase of the lands having been made during marriage, the presumption is that it was community property, and this presumption could be overthrown only by evidence, of a clear, certain, and convincing character, establishing the contrary; and the burden of this showing rested with the parties claiming the separate character of the property. In the absence of such proof, the presumption as to the community character of the property was absolute and conclusive. Meyer v. Kinzer, 12 Cal. 247; Morgan v. Lones, 78 Cal. 62, 20 Pac. 248; Dimmick v. Dimmick, 95 Cal. 327, 30 Pac. 547. This requirement of the law is not satisfied by the evidence before us, nor is the evidence sufficient to raise a substantial conflict when opposed by the presumption. It would be only by the aid of the vaguest conjecture or surmise that it could be said that any of the lands owned by Boody at his death were acquired by his separate means. The evidence not only fails to show that he paid for any of the land out of moneys belonging to his separate estate, but it fails to show that he was possessed, at the times of the various purchases, of any separate property whatsoever. It does not even follow, necessarily, that, because he may have had some separate property at his marriage, he had any such 10 years later, when he bought the first piece of land. The vicissitudes of life are such that he may have lost all such means, and have possessed, at the time of these various purchases, nothing but property earned by the community. It was incumbent upon the parties claiming the land as separate estate to trace clearly the sources of the particular funds with which the lands were purchased to the separate property of Boody, "not by way of surmises and probabilities, but by plain and connected channels." Dimmick v. Dimmick, supra. This the evidence wholly fails to do, and does not constitute a sufficient basis for the finding rested upon it.

The doctrine of Harris v. Harris, 71 Cal. 314, 12 Pac. 274, and In re Lamb, 95 Cal. 397, 30 Pac. 568, has no application to the circumstances of this case. In both those cases legal steps had been initiated by the filing of application, prior to the marriage, to procure title to the land from the government. This fact was held to create an equity to which the legal title, when acquired, would relate back, and constitute the land separate estate, although the title was not actually acquired until after marriage. Here no such fact exists. Nothing but the naked right of possession, and that a joint one in the partnership of Boody & Heath, existed in any of the lands here involved. This certainly was not such a right as to give one of the partners an equity to which the subsequently acquired title to a portion of the land so held could attach.

Respondents' contention that, whether the lands were community property or separate property, in either event appellants received all they were entitled to take, is untenable. If the lands were community property, Elizabeth Boody was entitled, at the death of the husband, without descendants, to three-fourths of such property; and the appellants, standing in her shoes, take in like proportion. Civ. Code, § 1402; Jewell v. Jewell, 28 Cal. 232. The order is reversed.

PEOPLE v. MAYES. (Cr. 154.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 7, 1896.)

CRIMINAL LAW—TRIAL—CONDUCT OF COUNSEL—IMPEACHING EVIDENCE—JUDICIAL NOTICE—ORDER OF PROOF.

1. A verdict of conviction, sustained by the trial court, will not be set aside on appeal on account of the conduct of the prosecuting attorney, unless it was such as clearly would result in injustice to the prisoner.

2. It cannot be assumed that a jury were influenced by statements in regard to the evidence made by the court in ruling upon objections, when they were instructed to disregard such statements.

3. A defendant who testifies as a witness is subject to the same rules as to impeachment as other witnesses, and it is not error to permit other witnesses to testify as to his general reputation; such testimony being properly limited, by an instruction, to the question of his credibility.

4. On cross-examination of a witness who has given testimony either sustaining or impeaching the credibility of another witness, it is permissible to question him with reference to his knowledge of specific acts, or as to the acts themselves.

5. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, subd. 8, declaring that a court takes judicial notice of the laws of nature and the measure of time, and may resort for its aid to appropriate books of reference, and section 2102, providing that whenever the knowledge of the court is, by the Code, made evidence of a fact, it is to declare such knowledge to the jury, who are bound to accept it, a court may properly state to a jury the time when the moon rose on a given date, though no evidence on the subject was introduced.

6. The accuracy of a statement made to a jury by the court, in an instruction, of a fact of which courts take judicial notice, cannot be questioned by an affidavit filed on motion for a new trial, which does not affirmatively show error.

7. The order of proof is a matter within the discretion of the court, and the admission of testimony which, though not proper when admitted, was made so by evidence subsequently introduced, is not error.

8. It was not error to recall a jury and give an additional instruction in the absence of a defendant's counsel, where defendant was himself present, and his counsel could not be found; an exception being given defendant.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Mayes was convicted of a felony, and appeals. Affirmed.

R. A. Ling and W. A. Ryan, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The appellant was convicted of felony, in stealing a blue steer, and has appealed from the judgment thereon, and from an order denying a new trial. The evidence connecting him with the taking of the animal was sharply conflicting, and testimony impeaching nearly all of the witnesses who testified on either side of the case was presented to the jury. Under these circumstances, the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict is not open for examination.

Appellant contends that the conduct of the district attorney was such as to prejudice his case before the jury, and to prevent him from having a fair and impartial trial. While it may be conceded that the language of this officer was not at all times characterized by the urbanity of a Chesterfield, and that his manner, so far as it can be gathered from the record, was somewhat brusque, we cannot say that it was of such a character as to have interfered with the judgment of the jury upon the evidence before them. Although it is desirable that the amenities of social and professional intercourse should be observed in the court room, it must also be borne in mind that the temperament and mental peculiarities of individual attorneys are so diverse that all are unable to try a cause by the same rules of conduct. Much must be left to the discretion of the trial judge, in determining whether an attorney oversteps the bounds of legal propriety in his conduct of the trial; and, unless it clearly appears to the contrary, the judgment of the trial court that his conduct has wrought no prejudice to the defendant will not be set aside. Counsel's conduct must reach a course of proceeding militating against justice, and the fair and orderly conduct which should characterize judicial proceedings in criminal cases, before error can be predicated of it. There must be willful error, persisted in for an illegitimate purpose, followed by injustice to the prisoner. People v. Ward, 105 Cal. 340, 38 Pac. 945.

Exceptions were taken to statements made by the court during the trial, concerning the testimony of witnesses, as being an invasion of the province of the jury. These statements were made in answer to objections by counsel to the admission of certain testimony, or in ruling upon such objections, and were in no respect instructions to the jury with reference to the evidence. It very frequently occurs, at a trial, that the sufficiency of an objection to a question depends upon the presence of other evidence in the case,—such as whether it is proper cross-examination, or relevant to what was stated on direct examination; whether a proper foundation has been laid; whether the form of the question properly meets the statement of a witness already given; whether the testimony offered is merely cumulative. Such objections are directed to the court, and, for the purpose of sustaining its ruling, it is frequently necessary for it to state to counsel evidence that has already been given, in order that the correctness of its ruling may be apparent. While the jury may hear what is said by the court, its remarks, or its statement of the evidence, are not in the nature of an instruction to them, and it is not to be assumed that they will be influenced by them. The court instructed the jury, when the cause was submitted to them for their verdict, to disregard any such statement, or any intimation that might have been made of its view upon any question of fact, and to determine all questions of fact upon the evidence alone. The observations of the court in People v. Northey, 77 Cal. 618, 19 Pac. 870, and 20 Pac. 129, may with propriety be here repeated: "We think that these observations to the jury, made to them by the court when giving them directions by which to guide their conduct in the consideration of the case, were sufficient to remove all apprehension that the remarks of the court above referred to would have any effect on their minds prejudicial to the defendant. To hold otherwise would be to attribute to the jurors a lack of ordinary intelligence, and this we are bound to presume, from their selection to try the cause, they possessed."

The defendant was a witness in his own behalf, and the prosecution, in rebuttal, asked certain witnesses, who were called for the purpose of impeaching his testimony, concerning his general reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity. Defendant's counsel objected to these questions upon the ground that his character could not be put in question, and that the presumption that he has a good character could not be thus impeached. The court overruled the objection, and stated to his counsel that they could submit an instruction, which would be given, that the impeaching testimony would be considered only as bearing upon his credibility, and not as affecting his character as a defendant. The jury were subsequently instructed by the court that "the character of the defendant in this case is presumed to be good, in the traits involved in the crime with which he is charged, and any proof offered in regard to his general reputation only goes to his credibility as a witness, and not otherwise." There was no error in this. When the defendant offered himself as a witness in the case, his testimony was subject to the same rules as the testimony of any other witness, and he could be impeached in the same mode as could any other witness. See People v. Gallagher, 100 Cal. 466, 35 Pac. 80; People v. Hickman (Cal.) 45 Pac. 175. The impeaching questions were authorized by section 2051, Code Civ. Proc. Neither did the court err in permitting the prosecution, upon cross-examination of the witnesses called in behalf of the defendant to sustain his credibility as a witness, to question them in reference to his reputation for honesty and integrity. They had testified in their direct examination, presumably in response to questions put to them in his behalf, that his reputation for these traits was good, and their testimony in that respect was open to a full cross-examination.

Witnesses were also called on behalf of the defendant for the purpose of sustaining the testimony of other witnesses that the prosecution had attempted to impeach, and upon the cross-examination of these witnesses the prosecution was allowed to question them with reference to specific acts. While it is not permissible to give evidence of wrongful acts for the purpose of impeaching a witness, it is proper, upon cross-examination of a witness who has given testimony, either for sustaining or impeaching the credibility of another witness, to question him with reference to his knowledge of specific acts, and with reference to the specific acts themselves, for the purpose of overcoming the effect of his testimony upon the direct examination.

A witness on behalf of the defendant testified that on the night when the animal was taken he met Ruiz, one of the witnesses for the prosecution, driving a dark-colored animal; that the moon was up and shining, and the night was pretty light. On being asked what time of the night it was, he said that he was unable to tell, but thought that it was "along about ten o'clock, somewheres about there, I suppose," and at another time he said that it was "betwixt nine and ten, I suppose." The court instructed the jury, as a matter of judicial knowledge, that the moon on that night rose at 10:57 p. m. It does not appear that any evidence upon that point had been offered at the trial, nor was such evidence necessary. People v. Chee Kee, 61 Cal. 404. Section 1875, subd. 8, Code Civ. Proc., declares that courts take judicial knowledge of "the laws of nature, the measure of time, and the geographical conditions and political history of the world," and that "the court may resort for its aid to appropriate books or documents of reference"; and section 2102, Code Civ. Proc., declares, "Whenever the knowledge of the court is by this Code made evidence of a fact, the court is to declare such knowledge to the jury, who are bound to adopt it." "Judicial notice will be taken of the time the moon rises and sets on the several days of the year, as well as of the succession of the seasons, the difference of time in different longitudes, and the constant and invariable course of nature." Case v. Perew, 46 Hun, 57. See, also, State v. Morris, 47 Conn. 179; Munshower v. State, 55 Md. 11. Upon his motion for a new trial the appellant assigned the above instruction as error, and, in support thereof, presented an affidavit by Lewis Swift that on that night the moon rose at 10:35 p. m. No precedent in support of the practice of showing by affidavits that the court erred in instructing a jury upon matters within its judicial knowledge has been cited to our attention, and we are of the opinion such practice ought not to prevail. The judicial notice which courts take of matters of fact embraces those facts which are within the common knowledge of all, or are of such general notoriety as to need no evidence in their support, and also those matters which do not depend upon the weight of conflicting evidence, but are in their nature fixed and uniform, and may be determined by mere inspection, as of a public document, or by demonstration, as in the calculations of an exact science. These matters may not be within the personal knowledge of the judge who presides over the court, but, if a knowledge of them is necessary for a proper determination of the issues in the case, he is authorized to avail himself of any source of information which he may deem authentic, either by inquiring of others, or by the examination of books, or by receiving the testimony of witnesses. Rogers v. Cady, 104 Cal. 290, 38 Pac. 81. As this knowledge of the court does not depend upon the weight of evidence, and is not to be determined upon a consideration of the credibility of witnesses, it is evident that, when the court has stated to the jury a fact of which it takes judicial knowledge, the correctness of such statement is not to be controverted or set aside on an appeal by affidavits which are merely contradictory of the correctness of such statement. The appellate court takes judicial notice of the fact, in the same manner as does the trial court; but, in the absence of any personal knowledge of the fact by the individual members of the court, the fact as stated by the court below will be assumed to be correct, and the appellant will be required to show affirmatively that the court erred in its statement of it. The record does not show the means or sources from which the court obtained its knowledge of this fact,—whether from information derived from others, or from books, or by means of an individual calculation; and, although it appears from an affidavit on behalf of the appellant that the times of the rising of the moon, in the Family Christian Almanac, are correct, and that the ordinary almanacs found in drug stores, and sometimes called "patent-medicine almanacs," are not reliable, the time stated in either of these almanacs at which the moon rose on that night is not given, nor does it appear that the court below referred to either of them. While it is said in the affidavit of Swift that his statement is "made from accurate, correct, and reliable astronomical observations, calculations, and data," he does not state that he made the calculations, or the person by whom they were made; so that his affidavit is in reality of no higher grade than hearsay, and is insufficient to overcome the presumption of the correctness of the court's statement to the jury.

Numerous exceptions were made on behalf of the defendant to the rulings of the court on the admission of evidence, but none of them are of a nature to require particular consideration. There was no error in permitting answers to the questions, in the early part of the trial, relating to George Vandekarr. Ruiz subsequently testified that Vandekarr and the defendant were driving the steer together on the night it was taken, and these questions relating to Vandekarr would have been proper after the testimony of Ruiz had been given. That they were admitted out of the proper order of developing the case does not constitute error. The order of proof is a matter within the discretion of the court. The statement by Ruiz that Vandekarr told him that the defendant had lost a hat while they were chasing the steer was not hearsay, as Ruiz testified that it was told in the presence of the defendant, and also that the defendant at the same time gave the reason why he lost it.

The court did not err in refusing to give the instructions asked by the defendant. No error was committed by recalling the jury, and giving an additional instruction, in the absence of the defendant's counsel. The defendant was himself present, and the court directed that an exception be entered in his behalf to the instruction thus given. It is stated in the bill of exceptions that before giving the instruction the court caused his attorneys to be called, and searched for in the courthouse, and also sent officers to look for them, but that they were not found. The judgment and order are affirmed.

SANTA CRUZ ROCK-PAVEMENT CO v. BRODERICK, Auditor. (S. F. 380.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 7, 1896.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—STREET IMPROVEMENT—AUTHORIZED CONTRACT—EQUITABLE CONSIDERATION—RECOVERY.

1. The requirement of Street Improvement Act (St. 1885, p. 149) § 5, that, before the awarding of any contract by the city council for any work authorized by the act, the city council shall invite sealed proposals, and shall award the contract to the lowest bidder, applies to every contract authorized by the act, irrespective of the character of the street on which the work is to be done, or of the mode in which the expense is to be paid.

2. St. 1885, p. 160, § 20, which provides for the acceptance of a street by the city council, and that it shall thereafter "be kept in repair and improved by the said municipality, the expense thereof to be paid out of a fund to be provided by said council, for that purpose," merely fixes the obligation upon the city to bear the entire expense of such improvement, and does not take such accepted street out of the jurisdiction conferred on the city council by section 1, to order its improvement, which must in all instances be done under the proceedings described in the act.

3. Under provisions authorizing the repair of streets under certain conditions, the term "repair" does not include an original improvement of the street, or work of a character different from that previously done.

4. A municipality cannot disregard the restrictions which its charter places upon its power of contracting, and, after a contract entered into in disregard of such restrictions has been performed, a subsequent promise to pay for such performance cannot be enforced.

5. Where one has performed a contract for a city, which he knowingly entered into in disregard of statutory requirements, he cannot claim an equitable consideration by reason of its performance.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Proceedings in mandamus by the Santa Cruz Rock-Pavement Company against William Broderick, auditor, to compel him to audit and allow a claim for street paving. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, Denson & De Haven, and Garler, Boalt & Bishop, for appellant. Garret W. McEnerney and Charles F. Hanlon, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco passed a resolution, July 8, 1895, directing the superintendent of streets to enter into a contract with the appellant to pave Van Ness avenue from Pacific avenue to Jackson street with bituminous rock, at the rate of seven cents per square foot. Under the contract entered into by virtue of said resolution, the appellant completed the work therein named, and thereafter presented its demand, duly verified, to be paid out of the street department fund, for the sum of $1,447.99; and on October 28, 1895, the board of supervisors passed an authorization for the payment of said demand. Upon its presentation to the respondent, who is the auditor of said city and county, that officer refused to indorse his allowance thereon, or in any way to approve or allow the same, whereupon the appellant instituted the present proceeding to compel him to audit and allow said claim. The respondent set up, as an answer to the application, that, in passing the resolution authorizing the contract with the appellant, the board of supervisors acted in excess of its jurisdiction and authority, and that the contract itself was invalid, for the reason that no proposals or bidding therefor were invited by the board of supervisors, and that the contract was let without any opportunity for competition. It was shown at the hearing in the superior court that the roadway of Van Ness avenue from Pacific avenue to Jackson street was accepted by the board of supervisors, February 24, 1880, under the provisions of the act amendatory of the street law, passed April 4, 1870. It was admitted on behalf of the petitioner that none of the acts or steps provided for by section 3 or by section 5 of the street improvement act of March 18, 1885, had been taken or done; that no invitations for sealed proposals or bids for doing the work had been given; and that the contract for the work was made solely by virtue of the resolution of July 8, 1895. The court granted a nonsuit, and denied the petitioner's application for the writ of mandate. Judgment was thereupon entered in favor of the defendant, from which the plaintiff has appealed.

[1] Rehearing denied.

Section 5 of the street improvement act (St. 1889, p. 160) declares that, "before the awarding of any contract by the city council for doing any work authorized by this act, the city council shall cause notice with specifications to be posted conspicuously for five days, on or near the council chamber door of said council, inviting sealed proposals or bids for doing the work ordered," and that the notice of this posting shall be published in the official paper. The section then provides the mode of making proposals for doing the work, and that they shall be examined and declared by the city council in open session, and that "the city council may reject any and all proposals or bids should it deem this for the public good, and also the bid of any party who has been delinquent and unfaithful in any former contract with the municipality, and shall reject all proposals or bids other than the lowest regular proposal or bid of any responsible bidder, and may award the contract for said work or improvement to the lowest responsible bidder, at the prices named in his bid, which award shall be approved by the mayor or a three-fourths vote of the city council." The requirement that the city council shall reject all proposals or bids other than the lowest regular proposal or bid of any responsible bidder is equivalent to a declaration that it shall not accept any other proposal, although it is not required to accept the lowest bid, since it may, in its consideration for the public good, reject all the bids. The requirement that it shall invite sealed proposals before awarding a contract, as well as its obligation to award the contract to the lowest responsible bidder, is, however, universal, and applies to "any" contract for doing "any" work authorized by the act, irrespective of the character of the street upon which the work is to be done, or of the mode in which the expense is to be paid. Section 20 of the act provides for the acceptance of a street by the city council after it has been once fully constructed, and certain improvements laid therein, and that it shall thereafter "be kept in repair and improved by the said municipality, the expense thereof to be paid out of a fund to be provided by said council for that purpose"; and in subdivision 2 of section 7 it is provided that "after such acceptance the expense of all work thereafter done thereon shall be paid by said city out of the street department fund." There is, however, no provision in the act which authorizes any different procedure for a contract to do work upon an accepted street from that which is required for work to be done upon an unaccepted street; and the reason for requiring competition, and awarding the contract to the lowest bidder, would seem to be as great when the compensation is to be paid out of the city treasury as when it is to be collected from the owners of the abutting land. The advertising for bids is made by the act a condition precedent to the exercise of the power to award "any" contract, and is a limitation upon the mode in which the previous order for the improvement of the street is to be made effective. Until proposals have been received in accordance with such notice, the city council has no jurisdiction to enter into a contract for the improvement. In Raisch v. San Francisco, 80 Cal. 1, 22 Pac. 22, the same question was under consideration; and it was held that the provisions of the act were equally applicable to a contract for work done upon an accepted street, for which payment is to be made directly from the city treasury, as when the expense of the work is to be collected through an assessment upon the adjacent land. In that case the supervisors had extended the time for the completion of a contract after the time fixed therefor by the contract had expired, and it was urged that as the city alone was interested in the contract, and the extension had been made by its own representatives,—the board of supervisors,—the objection was not available to defeat its liability; but the court held that the question was not one of estoppel, but of the construction of a statute and of the power to be exercised thereunder, saying: "The provision which forbids extensions of time after the expiration of the contract time is general and comprehensive, and applies to all contracts made under the act. There is nothing in the language used to limit it to any particular class of contracts, or to any particular class of streets; and we could not, without ingrafting an exception upon the statute, sustain the contention of the appellant in this regard." The same principles require us to hold that the board of supervisors had no power to direct the superintendent to enter into a contract for doing the work in the present case, unless it had been awarded to the lowest responsible bidder, after proposals to do the work had been invited under the provisions of section 5.

The board of supervisors has no plenary authority to improve its streets, either by virtue of the consolidation act, or under the provisions of the street improvement act. Its power upon this subject, which was originally included in the consolidation act, was expressly repealed by subsequent acts of the legislature, and these, in turn, have been superseded by the statute commonly called the "Vrooman Act." To the latter act alone must it look for all authority in the matter, and, under the familiar rule that the mode is the measure of the power, this authority is limited by the requirements therein provided for its exercise. The power to order the improvement of an accepted street is not conferred by section 20. That section merely fixes the obligation upon the city to bear the entire expense of such improvement.

The power to order the work is conferred by the first section of the act, and the character of the work which may be ordered is defined in the second section. Section 1 of the act gives to the city council jurisdiction to order any of the work mentioned in section 2 to be done upon the streets of the city; and the jurisdiction or power with which the council is thus invested extends to "all streets, lanes, alleys, places or courts" in the city, and is in all cases to be exercised "under the provisions hereinafter described." The subsequent provision in section 20 for accepting a street after certain work has been done therein does not take such accepted street from the jurisdiction thus conferred upon the city council. The accepted street still remains subject to the power of the city council to order its improvement, and the provision in section 20 requiring the municipality to improve such street at its own expense is subordinate to the provision in section 2 that the city council shall order such improvement "whenever the public interest or convenience may require"; but whenever such order is made the provision of section 1 requires that the work must be done "under the proceedings" described in the act.

The facts shown by the record herein do not present for determination the power of the city to "repair" an accepted street under the provisions of section 25 of the act. The contract in question does not purport to be for repairing the street, its terms being "to pave the following streets with bituminous rock laid on a macadam foundation"; and it is not alleged, nor was it shown at the trial, that the street in question had ever been paved with bituminous rock. It would be in violation of a proper construction of the term "repair" to hold that it included an original improvement of the street, or work of a different character from that previously done thereon. The provisions of the first part of section 25 do not, by their terms, apply to accepted streets, but merely authorize the city council to "repair" streets upon which certain work has been done; and the provisions of the latter part of the section, requiring advertising and assessment when the work to be done upon an unaccepted street is new work of the same character as had been previously done, cannot be construed as importing into the first part of the section a condition that the repairs therein authorized are to be made upon an accepted street. We must assume that if the legislature had intended that the express provision which it made in section 20 for the improvement and repair of accepted streets, and for a fund out of which the expense should be paid, should be superseded by the provisions of section 25, it would have so declared in some direct or unequivocal language.

We do not hold that, before the city council can order the improvement of an accepted street, it is requisite to observe all the steps prescribed in section 3 of the act. By their very terms, it is seen that they are intended solely for the benefit and protection of the owners of the property which may be assessed for the expense of the work; but, if no part of this expense is to be charged against the property, many, if not all, of these steps would be vain and purposeless, and without the scope of the statute. The purpose and scope of these requirements is indicated by the provision that after they have been observed "the city council shall be deemed to have acquired jurisdiction to order any of the work to be done." The term "jurisdiction" implies that the person or tribunal which has "acquired" it is thereby empowered to declare or establish an enforceable charge or liability against the person or subject over which it has been acquired; but, in the matter under consideration, if no charge or lien is to be established against the adjacent property, the necessity of thus acquiring jurisdiction therefor does not arise.

The proposition that because the board of supervisors have passed an authorization for payment for the work after its completion, entitles the plaintiff to recover, cannot be maintained. This proposition is independent of the proceedings under the street improvement act, and concedes the invalidity of this proceeding, but rests upon the estoppel against the city by virtue of its promise to pay for the benefits received by it by reason of the performance of the contract. The invalidity of the plaintiff's contract under the street improvement act places it in the same position as any other person dealing with the city under the authority conferred upon its board of supervisors. If the board of supervisors did not have authority to enter into the contract, they could not bind the city by a subsequent authorization for the payment of the contract price. The provision of section 67 of the consolidation act, "The powers of the board of supervisors are those granted in this act, and they are prohibited to exercise any others," and the provisions of section 98 of the same act, "If any expenditures not authorized by this act be incurred, they can never be paid out of the treasury, nor shall they be deemed to constitute or lay the foundation of any claim, demand or liability, legal, equitable or otherwise, against the said city and county," preclude any right of recovery by reason of such resolution. In entering into the contract, the plaintiff was charged with knowledge of all the limitations upon the powers of the board of supervisors. He knew that the board had no power to authorize the contract for doing the work unless it had invited sealed proposals therefor, and he entered into the contract with the knowledge that he had not made any proposal for doing the work. Having thus performed a contract which he knowingly entered into in disregard of statutory requirements, he is not in a position to claim any equitable consideration by reason of its performance. To hold that a municipality may disregard the restrictions which its charter places upon its power of contracting, and that, after a contract entered into in disregard of such restrictions has been performed, its subsequent promise to pay for such performance may be enforced, would set at naught all limitations upon municipal powers, and, as was said in Sutro v. Pettit, 74 Cal. 337, 16 Pac. 9, "put the people in the complete power of careless or unscrupulous officers." The judgment is affirmed.

MURPHY v. WATERHOUSE (PACIFIC BANK, Intervener. S. F. 199).

(Supreme Court of California. July 23, 1896.)

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT — NEGOTIATIONS — PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS—WITNESS—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

1. Where two persons are negotiating with each other in the presence of the attorney of one of them, their communications, as between themselves, are not privileged, and either can compel the attorney to testify against the other as to their negotiations. In re Bauer's Estate, 21 Pac. 759, 79 Cal. 304, followed.

2. Where a witness has been erroneously held incompetent, and it appears that, if his testimony had corroborated that of the appellant, the verdict might have been different, the judgment will be reversed.

3. In a civil case, it is error to charge that there must be evidence sufficient "to convince their minds" of any fact necessary to be shown by either party, since the weight of evidence, or preponderance of probability, is sufficient.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Samuel G. Murphy against Columbus Waterhouse on a promissory note. The Pacific Bank intervened. From a judgment in favor of the intervener, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Denson & De Haven and Dorn & Dorn, for appellant. Sawyer & Burnett, for intervener. Lindley & Eickhoff, for plaintiff.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought upon a promissory note for $10,000 made by the defendant, Waterhouse, to the Pacific Bank, and alleged to have been assigned by said bank to the plaintiff, Murphy. Afterwards, however, the plaintiff, Murphy, withdrew his claims to the note; and the contest was thereafter between the Pacific Bank, intervener, and the defendant, Waterhouse. The case was tried with a jury, who returned a verdict in favor of the intervener for the amount of the face of the note. Defendant, Waterhouse, appeals from the judgment.

The defense set up by the appellant, Waterhouse, was that there was no consideration for the note. The facts alleged by him were that the Pacific Bank requested appellant to place the apparent or record title of 300 shares of the stock of the People's Home Savings Bank in his name, for the benefit of the said Pacific Bank; that appellant was to hold said stock in trust for said Pacific Bank; that the promissory note sued on in this action was given by appellant to said Pacific Bank for the purpose of protecting said bank in case of the death of defendant, or any other contingency, and as collateral security for the performance by appellant of his agreement to hold said stock of the People's Home Savings Bank in trust for the said Pacific Bank; that the real ownership of the stock was to remain in the Pacific Bank; and that appellant had the right at any time to transfer the stock to the said Pacific Bank, and receive back the said note. At the trial of the cause the appellant testified substantially to the matters of defense above stated. He then called as a witness D. S. Dorn, who is an attorney at law, and proposed to prove by him, in substance, that he was present when the said contract testified to by appellant was made between him and one McDonald, who was acting for said Pacific Bank, and witnessed the contract. The intervener objected to any testimony of said Dorn as to anything that passed on said occasion between the appellant and said McDonald, upon the ground that said Dorn was at that time the attorney and counselor for said Pacific Bank, and that anything that occurred upon said occasion should be excluded, because privileged as a communication between client and attorney. The objection was sustained, and the appellant excepted. This ruling of the court excluding the offered testimony of Dorn was clearly erroneous. It appears, we think, very plainly, from the testimony of Dorn, that at the time of the transaction referred to he was also the attorney for the appellant, Waterhouse. Assuming that to be the fact, then the point was expressly decided in favor of the contention of appellant by this court in Re Bauer's Estate, 79 Cal. 304, 21 Pac. 762. In that case this court said: "When two persons address a lawyer as their common agent, their communications to the lawyer, so far as concerns strangers, will be privileged; but as to themselves they stand on the same footing as to the lawyer, and either can compel him to testify against the other as to their negotiations;" citing numerous authorities. The rule, however, is the same where the witness is attorney for only one of the contracting parties. Where two persons are negotiating with each other in the presence of the attorney of one of the parties, the very nature of the transaction, and the circumstances surrounding it, are inconsistent with the notion of a confidential communication between one of the parties and his attorney, who happens to be present. "The rule deducible from the authorities is that all communications made by a client to his counsel for the purpose of professional advice or assistance are privileged, whether such advice relates to a suit pending, one contemplated, or any matter proper for such advice or aid; that, where the communications are made in the presence of all the parties to the controversy, they are not privileged, but the evidence is competent between such parties." Britton v. Lorenz, 45 N. Y. 51. In Coveney v. Tannahill, 1 Hill, 33, the court say: "It is not necessary that a man should have an attorney to hear his dealings with third persons, and, if one is called in, I see no reason why he, like any other person, should not be sworn to prove what was done. * * * What was done and said between the plaintiff and Tannahill in the way of business cannot be turned into a confidential communication between attorney and client merely because the plaintiff had an attorney present to hear and see what took place. No secret was confided to the attorney, and he might have been required to answer, not only when and where the account was signed, but as to everything that was done and said between the plaintiff and Tannahill on that occasion, so far as the matter would be pertinent if proved by any other witness. If any communications passed between the attorney and client apart from Tannahill, these may be privileged, but nothing else." In Hughes v. Boone, 9 S. E. 286, the supreme court of North Carolina say: "So, too, it has been held by numerous adjudications, the rule does not apply to communications between parties to an agreement made before an attorney, or between such parties and the attorney of one of them, or when made by one party, to his counsel, in the presence of the other party, or where made by one party to the attorney of the other party." In 1 Greenl. Ev. § 245, it is said, among other things, that an attorney may be compelled to disclose "a statement made by him [the client] to the adverse party." In Griffith v. Davies, 5 Barn. & Adol. 502, it was held that "the fact of the witness having been present as attorney on one side does not prevent his giving evidence of a conversation between the parties." See, also, Hurlburt v. Hurlburt, 128 N. Y. 420, 28 N. E. 651; Michael v. Foil, 100 N. C. 178, 6 S. E. 264; Hanlon v. Doherty, 109 Ind. 37, 9 N. E. 782; Greenl. Ev. §§ 244, 245, and notes; Gallagher v. Williamson, 23 Cal. 331. The provision contained in subdivision 2 of section 1881 of our Code of Civil Procedure is merely a declaration, without any substantial modification, of a principle that has always obtained. Hurlburt v. Hurlburt, supra. It was therefore perfectly competent for appellant to prove by Dorn what occurred between the appellant and McDonald, acting for the bank, at the time when, as appellant claims, the transaction took place between McDonald and himself, out of which the trust relation which he claims arose.

But respondent contends that the ruling of the court in excluding the testimony of Dorn, although erroneous, did no material injury to appellant. This position cannot be maintained. If Dorn had testified, and his testimony had corroborated that of appellant, the verdict of the jury might have been different. At least, this court would not be justified in saying that it might not have been different. For this reason, therefore, the judgment must be reversed.

The appellant contends also that the court erred in asking, of its own motion, a certain question of the appellant, while he was on the witness stand. It is contended that said question prejudiced the appellant before the jury, and was an unwarrantable interference by the court with a matter that belonged to the jury. We think that said question—which it is not necessary here for us to state in full—was improper, but it is not necessary for us to determine whether the matter was serious enough to warrant a reversal of the judgment. It probably will not be repeated upon another trial.

We do not think that the court erred in admitting in evidence a part of a statement made by the appellant to the bank commissioners.

We see no error in the instructions given by the court to the jury, or in the ruling upon instructions offered, except that part thereof which relates to the amount or quantity of evidence necessary to sustain the burden of proof. The court, after having told the jury that the burden of proof was upon appellant to show that there was no value or consideration for the note, said, "It is for him to satisfy you, by such evidence as convinces your mind, that no value was paid for that note." In a civil case it is error to tell the jury that there must be evidence sufficient to convince their minds of any fact necessary to be shown by either party. The weight of evidence, or preponderance of probability, is sufficient to establish a fact in a civil case. The judgment appealed from is reversed.

RUIZ v. DOW et al. (L. A. 97.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1896.)

DEED—DELIVERY—GIFT INTER VIVOS—DECLARATIONS OF DONOR—PAROL EVIDENCE—CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS BY CLIENT.

1. The execution of a deed conveying the grantor's land to his wife, and the delivery of such instrument to a third person, with directions to hold the same till the grantor's decease and then record it, is sufficient to vest in the grantee a present title to the fee. Bury v. Young, 33 Pac. 338, 98 Cal. 446, followed.

2. The delivery to a third person of an instrument conveying all the donor's personal estate to his wife, with directions to hold the paper till the donor's decease and then record it, divests the latter of all control over the property, and operates as a valid gift inter vivos, the intention to make the gift being shown.

3. The intention to execute a gift inter vivos may be shown by the declarations of the donor, made either before or after the transaction.

4. Where a husband executed a deed conveying all his real and personal estate to his wife, with directions therein that it be deposited with a third person to hold till the grantor's decease, and then be recorded, the fact that the grantor subsequently, and before delivery, changed or modified the intentions so expressed, as to the disposition of the instrument, may be shown by parol.

5. Testimony of an attorney to prove the delivery of a deed to him by a deceased grantor, with instructions to deliver the same to a third person to hold for the grantee until the grantor's decease, is not within the prohibition of the statute forbidding an attorney to disclose confidential communications by a client.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; W. B. Cops, Judge.

Action by A. M. Ruiz, administrator of the estate of James Dow, deceased, against Rebecca Dow and another, for the recovery of money. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Richards & Carrier and E. J. Squier, for appellant. B. F. Thomas, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action by the administrator of the estate of James Dow, deceased, to recover the sum of $4,000 from Rebecca Dow, wife of said deceased. Plaintiff claims the money to be the property of the estate of the deceased, and the wife claims the money to be her own by gift from the husband. The material facts may be briefly stated as follows: James Dow, a man of considerable property, consisting of lands and money, feeling that he was not long for this world, and desiring that his wife, Rebecca, should possess his estate without the expense attendant upon an administration in the usual course by the courts, consulted his attorney for advice; and as a result a deed was executed and acknowledged by Dow, parts of which are as follows: "Know all men by these presents that I, the undersigned, James Dow, * * * the party of the first part, in consideration of my love and affection for my wife, Rebecca Dow, * * * the party of the second part, do by these presents grant, give, and convey unto the said party of the second part, her executors, administrators, and assigns, the following properties: First [certain lands, describing them]; * * * third, all personal property belonging to me, of every description whatsoever, including chattels, stocks, moneys, notes, bonds, mortgages, and any other evidence of indebtedness to me, wherever situated, held, or deposited. And this conveyance shall be held and shall be a good and sufficient assignment from me to said grantee of each, all, and every said evidence of debt and ownership by me of every interest belonging to me in all said personalty whatsoever, and an absolute transfer thereof to the grantee therein. This deed is to be inclosed in an envelope, and deposited for safe-keeping in the First National Bank of Santa Barbara, with an indorsement on said envelope directing that at my decease the then cashier or president of said bank shall, at the request of my said wife, immediately file this deed for record with the recorder of said county of Santa Barbara. And I do hereby further declare, as a part of this conveyance, and as my act and deed, that the filing of this deed for record, as above recited, at my decease, shall constitute and be a good, valid, and sufficient delivery of this deed to the grantee therein, as of the date of the execution thereof, as to all properties, both real and personal, belonging to me at the date of my decease." The aforesaid deed was then inclosed in an envelope, and the indorsement made thereon called for in the body of the instrument. Thereupon Dow handed the deed to his wife, Rebecca, who retained it for the period of two years. The deed was then examined by another attorney, at the request of Mr. Dow, which attorney advised him that a delivery of the instrument was necessary to its validity. It was then given to this attorney, with instructions to hand it to the cashier of the bank, Mr. Sheffield, with directions to him that it be recorded upon his (Dow's) demise. The deed was so delivered, and thereafter, at Dow's death, it was recorded as directed. At the time of the making of the deed, Dow was the owner of a certain promissory note in the sum of $12,000, and after the deed came to the hands of the bank cashier, and prior to Dow's death, payment of $4,000 was made upon this note, which sum was deposited by Dow in his own name in the bank. This is the money the title to which is involved in the present litigation. This money was the property of the wife, if the title to the $12,000 note passed to her under the deed made by the husband; and in the consideration of this question, the verdict of the jury upon the facts being favorable to defendant, we shall more particularly address ourselves to the law of the case, for the evidence appears to be entirely sufficient to justify the verdict and judgment based thereon. While the intention which moved and controlled the husband, Dow, in making this writing, is all-important in arriving at a proper conclusion upon the validity of the instrument as one carrying title either to real or personal property, still that intention was a pure question of fact for the jury under the law, and upon the record before us we are foreclosed from setting aside the jury's finding of fact upon that issue.

It is immaterial to the merits of the present litigation whether or not the first delivery of the instrument to the wife, Rebecca, was a sufficient delivery; for a subsequent delivery of the paper to the cashier of the bank by Dow's attorney, and under specific instructions, constituted a valid delivery of the instrument. A delivery sufficient in law to pass title to realty, and sufficient in this case to pass title to the land described in the deed now being considered, is sufficiently proven by the evidence in this case. This principle of law has been fully discussed in the recent case of Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 Pac. 338, and upon that decision, with the authorities there cited, we leave the question; for if the title to the land described in this deed passed to the grantee, Rebecca Dow, it would seem somewhat strange that the instrument should prove too weak to pass title to personal property, viz. a promissory note, and no such results can follow. If there was a valid transfer of this note to the wife, it constituted a gift; yet it is contended by appellant that there was neither a gift causa mortis, nor inter vivos. It must be conceded that the transaction possesses no elements of a gift causa mortis. Was the gift one inter vivos? Appellant declares to the contrary, claiming there was no immediate transfer of title, and no immediate right of possession passing to the donee. It is said in Zeller v. Jordan, 105 Cal. 148, 38 Pac. 640, that, in order to constitute such a gift, "there must be an immediate transfer of the title, and the donor must relinquish all present right to or control over the thing given." Those conditions are presented by the facts of this case. The donor relinquished all present right and control over the note when he made the deed and delivered it to the cashier of the bank, and by the same act he also placed the right of possession of the note beyond himself. The delivery of the deed to the third party operated to accomplish both of these results. It may be conceded, for present purposes, that the right of possession to the note did not vest immediately in the donee. At the same time, it was lost to the donor, and that is the essential and vital element looking towards the validity of the gift. It may be further suggested that section 1147 of the Civil Code contemplates that it is only necessary to the validity of verbal gifts that there should be an actual or symbolical delivery to the donee.

It is insisted that parol evidence was not admissible for the purpose of proving the declarations of Dow as to his intentions in making the deed to his wife. By the introduction of this class of evidence it was not intended to vary or contradict the terms of a written instrument, and the evidence had no such effect. The question under investigation was, did Dow, by the deed, intend to make a gift of this note to his wife? His intention was the all-important and controlling question. That such intention may be proved by his own declarations, made either before or after the transaction, is elementary. See Thornt. Gifts, §§ 222, 224.

It is further contended by appellant that the written directions of Dow, inserted in the body of the deed, and also indorsed upon the envelope inclosing it, were conclusive evidence as to his intentions in the disposition of the deed, and that parol evidence was inadmissible to show that his intentions were otherwise. Without conceding that his intention bearing upon the delivery of the deed, as expressed in the writing, was at all different from his intention as subsequently expressed in parol, still he had the right at all times, up to the date of the actual delivery of the instrument, to modify, enlarge, or even annul his intentions in this regard; and as to these things he was in no way bound by any writing made by himself, for the document was in his possession, and subject in all respects to his control. He not only had the right to change the character of the delivery originally contemplated, but he had the right to destroy and nullify the instrument itself.

The objection to the evidence of the witness Thomas upon the ground of privilege was properly overruled. While it may be said that Thomas was the attorney of the donor, still the conversation between them was not confidential, in the sense contemplated by the statute. The donee, Mrs. Dow, was present during the greater portion of the time, and, aside from this, the conversation was largely directed towards the delivery of the deed by the cashier of the bank; and, as to any instructions to the attorney by Dow pertaining to this delivery, evidence to that point has always been recognized as admissible. Rosseau v. Bleau, 131 N. Y. 183, 30 N. E. 52. As supporting the principle generally that this conversation did not come within the class of privileged communications, we cite In re Bauer's Estate, 79 Cal. 312, 21 Pac. 759; Michael v. Foil, 100 N. C. 189, 6 S. E. 264; Hurlburt v. Hurlburt, 128 N. Y. 424, 28 N. E. 651; Hanlon v. Doherty, 109 Ind. 43, 9 N. E. 782; Murphy v. Waterhouse (S. F. 199, decided July 23, 1896) 45 Pac. 866. There is nothing in the exception upon this point demanding a reversal of the judgment. For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

DOWNING v. MURRAY et al. (S. F. 5.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. July 23, 1896.)

ACCOUNT STATED—SETTLEMENT—WHEN CANNOT BE IMPEACHED—NONSUIT.

1. Where one interested with others in a joint property which had been sold made a settlement with one of the parties, who acted as trustee of the fund for all, and received and receipted for his share of the proceeds, with full knowledge of the basis on which the settlement was made, and of the matters which entered into it, he cannot reopen and impeach such settlement after the trustee has made settlement with the other parties on the same basis, and distributed the money.

2. A trial judge should grant a nonsuit when, if the case is being tried to a jury, a verdict for plaintiff should be set aside for want of evidence to support it, or when, if without a jury, the evidence is insufficient to support a judgment in favor of plaintiff.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Rehearing denied.

Action by F. O. Downing against M. W. Murray and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lewis & Keenan, Mastick, Belcher & Mastick, C. L. Tilden, and W. H. Payson, for appellant. Lloyd & Wood, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. After the plaintiff had introduced all his evidence in the court below, the defendants moved for a nonsuit. The motion was granted, and judgment ordered for defendants. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The record is quite voluminous, and the arguments of counsel are elaborate; but, under our views of the case, it is not necessary for the length of our opinion to be proportionate to that of the transcript or the briefs.

It is averred in the complaint that the relation existing between the parties to the action with respect to the moneys and property involved was that of a co-partnership. This averment is denied in the answer, and a great deal of the arguments of counsel is directed to that question. In our opinion, the relation between the parties, as shown by the evidence, was not that of a co-partnership; but we do not attach as much importance to that fact as is claimed for it by defendants, who contend that, if there was no co-partnership, then, no matter what the other facts were, the action must fail. The main purpose of the action was to set aside and annul a certain settlement made on December 2, 1891, upon an account stated, and to open up said account; and the facts stated in the complaint are not sufficient, leaving out of view the averment of co-partnership, to warrant the relief asked as to said settlement. The plaintiff, Downing, and the defendants, Murray, Treadwell, Fuller, and Carroll, were the co-owners of certain mining claims and lands situated in the territory of Alaska, the titles thereto standing in the name of Murray. The first of these claims was acquired about the year 1882, and is known as the "Bear's Nest." Not long afterwards another claim was acquired, called the "Douglas Island." From time to time certain other claims in the vicinity of the two above named were acquired by at least some of said persons. Each of these latter claims had a name, but it is sufficient here to call them the "Outside Claims." The record title to all the claims stood in Murray. He made a conveyance of one-fifth of the Bear's Nest and the Douglas Island to the plaintiff, Downing, and to each of the others; but plaintiff has no paper title to any of the outside claims. About the year 1886, efforts were commenced to effect a sale of these claims, or parts of them. It is not necessary here to trace the various negotiations which resulted in such sale. It is sufficient to say that in the year 1888 a sale was effected, through the agency of a corporation called the Alaska Gold Company, of the Bear's Nest, and of certain described parts of said outside claims. The Douglas Island was not included in the sale. Conveyances were made to the Alaska Gold Company of the property sold by the said defendant Murray. The purchase price was $750,000 in cash, and about $500,000 in stock and bonds of said corporation. However, $100,000 of the $750,000 was to remain in escrow pending the hoped-for repeal of an act of congress known as the "Alien Act"; the real purchasers being mostly Englishmen. This $100,000 is still in escrow, and need not be further considered. Neither is it necessary to consider the matter of the stock and bonds. Of the $750,000, $650,000 was paid in cash, or its equivalent, to the defendant Treadwell; and it was the understanding of all the parties that Treadwell was to take charge of the money, pay off all expenses incurred in handling and selling the property, and, after settling all such expenses, to divide the balance between the parties according to their respective shares and rights. This money was paid to Treadwell some time in the spring of 1889; and plaintiff's share of the $650,000, and a settlement which he made with Treadwell about said share, are the matters here involved.

Plaintiff contends that he and the four defendants were each the owner of one-fifth of all the Alaska mining claims, including all of the outside claims, as well as the Bear's Nest and the Douglas Island; and that, therefore, he was entitled to one-fifth of the balance of said $650,000. Defendants contend that he had no ownership in the outside claims, and therefore is only entitled to such part of the $650,000 as is justly his proportion thereof as an owner of one-fifth of the Bear's Nest, and that his claim of ownership to the outside claims is of comparatively recent date. On August 17, 1889, while the money was in the hands of Treadwell, and before any settlement, the plaintiff and the four defendants executed a written instrument in which it was stipulated and agreed that the Bear's Nest should receive two-thirds of the said purchase money, and the other locations should receive one-third of said money, and the expenses should be borne in like proportion. This instrument was left with Treadwell, and afterwards, but before any final settlement, he paid to plaintiff and also the several defendants large sums of money out of said fund of $650,000, upon the basis that plaintiff was only entitled to one-fifth of two-thirds of said fund; and defendants contend that plaintiff was thus estopped from denying the validity of said instrument, and from claiming more than the said one-fifth of said two-thirds. We do not deem it necessary to pass upon this question of estoppel; but the instrument and the testimony given by plaintiff as a witness clearly show that, at the date of the instrument, he had knowledge of the claim made by defendants that the owners of the Bear's Nest and of the other locations were not the same, and that he had no interest in the latter, and that with such knowledge he afterwards made his final settlement with Treadwell. There was great difficulty among the parties in arriving at a settlement and final distribution of the balance of the fund in the hands of Treadwell. The latter had from time to time allowed each of them to draw out a large proportion of his share, plaintiff having thus been paid over $42,000; but there was still a considerable amount awaiting final settlement. The business transactions of the parties in connection with said mines had been carried on in an exceedingly loose and irregular manner, and without any system or explicit understanding between them. Large expenses had been incurred in assessment work, surveying, buying additional land, and for other purposes connected with the mines, and in negotiating and completing the sale. For the latter purpose, several trips were made by some of the parties to New York and England and other points. Each of the parties had personally paid certain of these expenses, and each presented accounts against the fund for allowance, and many items of these accounts were disputed. Some of the parties were so hostile to each other that they would not confer together. This was especially the case with plaintiff and Murray, and their views could, at last, only be communicated to each other through Treadwell, who was friendly with both. But on December 2, 1891, a final settlement was at last made between plaintiff and Treadwell. An account was stated, showing the final balance due the plaintiff to be $35,374. On that day, Treadwell paid said last-mentioned sum of money to plaintiff, who received it as full payment of his share of said fund of $650,000, and signed said account as "settled." Treadwell afterwards, and before the commencement of this action, settled with all the other persons interested, upon the same basis as that upon which he had settled with plaintiff. He thus settled with Murray, December 28, 1891; with Carroll, February 5, 1892; with Fuller, February 24, 1892; and on said February 24th he balanced his books. During this time, plaintiff acquiesced in his own final settlement, and made no attempt to rescind it; but nearly four months afterwards, and a month after Treadwell had thus closed up the entire business and paid out the entire fund, the plaintiff commenced this present action.

We are satisfied that the court below was fully warranted in holding that the appellant made no showing to justify the cancellation of his deliberate and solemn act of settlement. It is clear that at the time of the settlement the appellant knew all of the substantial and important points of difference between his associates and himself; that he made the settlement with his eyes open; and that whatever concessions he made for the purpose of effecting a final settlement were made deliberately and intentionally. Of course, he knew that the others claimed that his interest in the fund was only that of a one-fifth owner of the Bear's Nest, and that the owners of the Bear's Nest were entitled to only two-thirds of the fund; and he knew that he was yielding that point and settling on that basis. There is no plausible reason why that question should be reopened. The other matters to which appellant now objects are items in the "expense account"; that is, the part of the account which shows the amounts claimed by and allowed to each of the parties for moneys paid out for expenses incurred in connection with the mines, and for services, etc. But it appears that, at the time of the settlement, appellant and Treadwell had before them an account of these expenses, and went over them together item by item; and appellant admitted in his testimony that there were only two items to which he then made any serious objections. These were an item of $10,000 claimed by Murray as money paid by him to a man named Benn; and $7,000 claimed by Murray, and called the "Portland expense account." He, for a while, objected somewhat strenuously to these two items; but he concluded to yield these objections, and settled with full knowledge that these items formed part of the account. In his complaint, and at the trial, he also objected to other items of the expense account; but it appears that, long before the settlement, he had reason to know or expect that the aggregate of said account would be in amount about the same as that stated in the account by which he settled. On September 12, 1889, he executed to Treadwell a power of attorney authorizing the latter to act for him in making a settlement in accordance with the written agreement of August 17, 1889, hereinbefore referred to, and providing that "the expenses mentioned in said agreement are not to exceed the sum of $100,000"; and in the stated account which he signed, and by which he settled the amount of said expenses, was put at a figure only slightly greater than the one named in the power of attorney. It was $102,920.58. It abundantly appears that he did not make the settlement ignorantly. On the other hand, it appears that he knew, and for a long time before the settlement had known, what the other parties claimed, and substantially the extent and amounts of their claims; that he was a man of good business capacity; and that, looking over the whole field and considering the advantages and disadvantages of any particular line of action, he concluded to accept the account as stated, settle in accordance with it, and take the money which he could not then have otherwise received. Such an act cannot be set aside at the will of either party. It could be legally set aside only upon a showing of fraud, undue influence, etc., which showing was not made. There were averments of such things and of a conspiracy against him, but there was no evidence making a prima facie case of their existence. To grant the prayer of the complaint in the case at bar would be to do a gross wrong to Treadwell, who, upon the faith of appellant's deliberate act, has settled with all the other parties, and exhausted this fund, in accordance with the conditions and upon the basis solemnly assented to and adopted by appellant. As, under our views, no showing was made for setting aside the settlement, it is not necessary for us to inquire into the correctness of some of the items of the account which appellant now attacks.

There are some discussions in the briefs of the general subject of granting nonsuits. With respect to this matter it is sufficient to say that, with a jury present, the judge should grant a nonsuit where a verdict in favor of plaintiff should be set aside for want of evidence to support it, and, in the absence of a jury, where the evidence is insufficient to support a judgment for plaintiff. The judge of the court below is presumed to have acted on this principle, and to have concluded that the evidence was thus insufficient, and there is no reason for holding that he abused his discretion in coming to that conclusion.

There are several exceptions to rulings upon the admissibility of evidence which we do not deem it necessary to discuss; for, even if well taken, they would not be of importance enough to work a reversal of the judgment. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

HAILE v. SMITH. (S. F. 174.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 7, 1896.)

SALE OF LAND—FAILURE TO PAY PURCHASE MONEY—RECOVERY OF LAND—PLEADING.

1. A complaint to recover land on the ground of defendant's failure to pay therefor at stipulated times, which, by the terms of the contract of sale, worked a forfeiture of defendant's rights, need not set out the deed tendered by plaintiff to defendant. It is enough to allege that he tendered "a good and sufficient deed of grant, bargain, and sale to the property," which was what the contract called for.

2. Under a contract of sale of land, declaring time the essence thereof, and providing that failure to make payment at a stipulated time shall release the seller from obligation to convey, and shall forfeit all right of the buyer to the property, the seller, by failure to tender deed on the day when the last payment falls due, does not lose his right to recover the land because of the nonpayment.

3. Under a contract of sale of land providing that the purchaser shall forfeit all right thereto by failure to make payment at a stipulated time, refusal by the seller of a seasonable tender releases the land from any further claim by him, and remits him to his personal claim for the money; and this is not changed by a subsequent tender of deed and demand of payment, and a refusal by the purchaser.

4. The averment in an answer that a tender was made "on or about" a certain day is sufficiently certain as against a general demurrer.

5. Under a contract of sale of land, declaring time the essence thereof, and providing that failure of the purchaser to make payment for more than 60 days after the purchase money is due shall release the seller from all obligation to convey the land, and forfeit all right of the buyer thereto, the buyer may, after such time, make payment without losing his rights, so long as the seller treats the contract as in force; and his tendering a deed shows that up to that time he has so treated the contract.

6. A complaint to recover land for nonpayment of purchase money, under a forfeiture clause in the contract of sale, sufficiently alleges plaintiff's title by an averment that, at the date of the contract, plaintiff was the owner in fee simple, and, after maturity of the contract, tendered to defendant a good and sufficient deed.

7. In an action to recover land of the purchaser for nonpayment of the purchase money, under a clause of the contract forfeiting his rights if payment is not made at a specified time, he cannot defend on the ground that the contract is still in force, entitling him to possession, and at the same time seek to recover the partial payment made by him.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

W. J. Manson, for appellant. Snook & Church, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Ejectment. The plaintiff alleges that on the 24th of September, 1891, he was the owner in fee of a certain lot of land in Alameda, and that on that day he entered into an agreement with the defendant for the conveyance of the land to him upon certain terms therein expressed. By the terms of the agreement, which is set forth at length in the complaint, the defendant agreed to pay for the land $350,—$100 at its execution; $100 before January 1, 1892; and the balance, $150, on or before January 1, 1893. The time for this last payment was subsequently extended for another year. The agreement also contains the following clause: "Time is the essence of this agreement, and a failure to comply with the terms hereof, or to make the payments for said premises as herein provided, for a period exceeding sixty days from the date when any payment shall become due and payable by the said party of the second part, the said party of the first part shall be released from all obligations in law or equity to convey said property, and said party of the second part shall forfeit all right thereto, together with the improvements at the time thereon, and all payments theretofore made." Immediately after the execution of the agreement, the defendant entered into possession of the property, and has continued to remain in such possession. It is also alleged in the complaint that the defendant has not made the last payment required by the agreement; and that on or about the 15th day of March, 1894, the plaintiff tendered to the defendant a good and sufficient deed of grant, bargain, and sale to the property above described, and demanded said payment, which the defendant refused and still refuses to pay; and that the same has not been paid; and that thereafter, April 11, 1894, he demanded possession of the premises, but the defendant unlawfully withholds the same, to his damage in the sum of $75. Plaintiff thereupon asks judgment for the restitution of the land. To this complaint the defendant filed a general demurrer, which was overruled, and thereafter he filed an answer admitting the execution of the agreement, and alleging that he has faithfully performed all the agreements therein to be performed by him. He also alleges that on or about the 1st day of March, and before the alleged tender of a deed by the plaintiff, he tendered to the plaintiff the balance of said purchase money, and demanded a conveyance of said land, which was refused by the plaintiff. The defendant also filed a cross complaint, setting forth the agreement with the plaintiff, and substantially the same matters as are alleged in his answer, and that by reason of the premises he has an equitable title to the land, which he asks to have protected. The plaintiff demurred to the answer, and also to the cross complaint, and his demurrers were sustained by the court. The defendant declining to amend, judgment was entered against him as upon his default, and in favor of the plaintiff according to the prayer of his complaint. From this judgment, the defendant has appealed.

1. The demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled. It was not necessary for the plaintiff to set out the deed which he tendered to the defendant. The averment that he tendered "a good and sufficient deed of grant, bargain, and sale to the property" showed a compliance with his part of the agreement. This averment is in the precise language of his agreement, and was the fact to be averred. A copy of the deed would have been only evidence of this fact. The plaintiff did not lose his right of action for the recovery of the land by not tendering the deed upon the day when the last payment fell due. The provision by which time is made the essence of the agreement did not authorize the defendant, by failing to make the payments agreed upon, to treat the contract as rescinded. Newton v. Hull, 90 Cal. 487, 27 Pac. 429; Scott v. Glenn, 98 Cal. 168, 32 Pac. 983.

2. The demurrer to the answer and to the cross complaint should have been overruled. The plaintiff could not maintain an action to recover the possession of the land held by the defendant by virtue of the agreement, so long as the defendant continued to recognize the validity of the agreement and to perform its terms. The particular in which the plaintiff alleges that the defendant failed to observe his agreement is in not making the last payment for the land; and, for the purpose of showing that the defendant had repudiated the agreement, the plaintiff alleged that, subsequent to the time for making said payment, he tendered a conveyance to the defendant, and demanded the payment from him, which the defendant refused. In his answer, the defendant alleges that he has performed all the covenants of the agreement to be performed by him; and that, before the date of the alleged tender of a deed by the plaintiff, he had tendered to the plaintiff the full amount of the last payment, and demanded a conveyance of the land according to the agreement, but that the plaintiff had refused to comply therewith; and that he had ever since been able, ready, and willing to make said payment upon the receipt from the plaintiff of the deed according to his covenant in the agreement. He also denied that the plaintiff had ever tendered to him his good and sufficient deed of grant, bargain, and sale for the land. These allegations presented a defense to the plaintiff's complaint, and raised issues of fact which should have been tried before a judgment could be rendered in the action. If the defendant tendered to the plaintiff the full amount of the purchase money before the plaintiff tendered to him the deed, and the plaintiff refused to accept such tender, and to make the conveyance which he had agreed to make, a subsequent tender of conveyance and demand of payment by the plaintiff, and a refusal of the defendant, did not give to the plaintiff the right to recover the possession of the land. While the unaccepted tender did not release the defendant from his obligation to pay the money, it had the effect to release the land from any further claim thereto by the plaintiff, and to remit the plaintiff to his personal claim for the money. "An offer of payment or other performance, duly made, though the title to the thing offered be not transferred to the creditor, stops the running of interest on the obligation, and has the same effect upon all its incidents as a performance thereof." Civ. Code, § 1504. The plaintiff's right to recover the land is one of the incidents to the defendant's obligation, which would have been extinguished by the payment of the purchase money; and, by the terms of this section, the tender of such payment had the same effect. A tender of the amount of a debt, though refused, extinguishes the lien of a pledgee, and will defeat an action to recover the property pledged. Loughborough v. McNevin, 74 Cal. 250, 14 Pac. 369, and 15 Pac. 773. "The principle governing the subject is that tender is equivalent to payment as to all things which are incidental and accessorial to the debt. The creditor, by refusing to accept, does not forfeit his right to the thing tendered, but he does lose all collateral benefits or securities. The instantaneous effect is to discharge any collateral lien, as a pledge of goods or right of distress." Tiffany v. St. John, 65 N. Y. 318. The averment in the answer that the tender of the money was made "on or about the first day of March" was sufficient as against a general demurrer. If the plaintiff would have objected to the averment on the ground of its uncertainty, he should have demurred upon that ground. By the terms of the agreement, there could be no forfeiture unless the defendant failed to make the payment "for a period exceeding sixty days" from January 1, 1894. This authorized a payment at any time prior to March 3d; and the defendant could also make the payment after that date, so long as the plaintiff treated the agreement as in force. The tender of the deed by the plaintiff "on or about March 15th" shows that, up to that date, he recognized the agreement as in force, and the allegation in the answer is that the payment was tendered "before the alleged tender of a deed by plaintiff."

Counsel have discussed the validity of the title held by the plaintiff, and also the character of the conveyance tendered or to be tendered by him; but these questions do not arise upon this appeal, and it would not be proper to anticipate them before the parties have offered the evidence thereof at the trial. The rule that "a good and sufficient conveyance" means a conveyance which will transfer the title, as well as the rule that the parties to a contract of sale may agree upon the character of the conveyance to be made by the vendor, are equally to be considered in the construction of such contract. The allegation in the complaint that, at the date of the agreement, the plaintiff was the owner in fee simple of the land, and that, after the maturity of the agreement, he tendered to the defendant a good and sufficient deed of the lots, was a sufficient averment of the plaintiff's title.

Neither is the right of the defendant to a lien upon the land, as security for the payments made by him, involved in this appeal. Such lien exists only when the vendee is entitled to recover back the payment in case of failure of consideration, and is "independent of possession." Civ. Code, § 3050. In the present case the defendant relies upon the agreement as being in force, and as entitling him to remain in possession of the land, and pleads a full performance on his part; and, so long as he treats the contract of the plaintiff as in force, he is not entitled to recover the amount paid by him. He cannot retain the possession, and at the same time recover the amount paid under the contract. Hannan v. McNickle, 82 Cal. 122, 23 Pac. 271. The judgment is reversed, and the superior court is directed to overrule the demurrer to the answer and the demurrer to the cross complaint, and to allow the plaintiff a reasonable time within which to answer the cross complaint.

HOPPER et al. v. BARNES. (S. F. 12.)

EASEMENTS—RIGHT OF WAY—CONSTRUCTION OF GRANT—PARTIES—PLEADING—WAIVER OF MISJOINDER.

1. A right of way granted to one and "his heirs and assigns forever" will be held to be appurtenant to land of the grantee, though not so expressed in the deed, and not a grant in gross to the person of the grantee, when it leads to such land, and, except for use in connection with it, would be a useless cul de sac, and where it has, both before and since the grant, been used solely for access to such land.

2. A conveyance of land to the daughter of the grantor, to be held by her in trust during her life for the use of herself and her three children and any other children thereafter born to her, with remainder in fee to her children in case any survived her, otherwise with remainder to the grantor or his heirs, leaves the grantor only the bare possibility of a reversion, insufficient to sustain an action by him for an injury to the property, and he cannot join as plaintiff in such an action.

3. Where a misjoinder of plaintiffs does not appear from the complaint, it cannot be reached by demurrer, and must be pleaded by answer, or it will be waived.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; R. F. Crawford, Judge.

Action by Thomas Hopper and others against Jehu Barnes. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Modified.

Rutledge & Pressley, for appellant. D. R. Gale and Albert C. Burnett, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. Thomas Hopper is the father, and F. Roberts is the husband, of Mary E. Roberts; and William Roberts, Edward Roberts, and Hubert Roberts are the minor children of F. Roberts and Mary E. Roberts. This action was brought to recover damages alleged to have been suffered by plaintiffs in consequence of an obstruction by defendant of their alleged private right of way over the land of the defendant, and to enjoin the defendant perpetually from obstructing such way. The court found that plaintiffs had the alleged right of way, and that defendant had obstructed it, and awarded the perpetual injunction prayed for, but no damages. The defendant has appealed from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

It is alleged by plaintiffs in their complaint that they own the right of way, and that they have had and enjoyed the continuous, peaceable, uninterrupted, open, notorious, undisputed, adverse use and occupation thereof during the term of 20 years immediately prior to February 15, 1893, when defendant obstructed their use thereof by building a stone wall across their entrance thereto; and further allege that said way is appurtenant to the land which adjoins the land of the defendant over which said way lies. But whether the right of way was acquired by grant or prescription is not expressly alleged, though facts are alleged which perhaps warrant the conclusion that the right was acquired by prescription. In his answer the defendant admits that on December 6, 1875, he granted to the plaintiff Thomas Hopper a private right of way, in common with himself, over the strip of land though which plaintiffs claim the right of way as described in their complaint; but alleges, and contends here as matter of law, that such grant was merely of an easement in gross to Thomas Hopper, individually, and not an easement appurtenant to his adjoining land, into which the way led. Whether or not defendant's construction of the grant, in this respect, is correct, is the principal question for decision. The grant describes the way as claimed by plaintiffs in their complaint, the following being a copy of it: "This indenture, made the 6th day of December, 1875, between Jehu Barnes and Thomas Hopper, both of the county of Sonoma, and state of California, witnesseth: That the said Barnes, in consideration of the sum of fifty dollars, sells to the said Thomas Hopper, his heirs and assigns, forever, the right of way over and along the following described tract of land, situated in the county and state aforesaid, and bounded and described as follows, to wit: Beginning at a point in the line running east and west between the lands of the parties hereto, and east of the gate in the fence on said line, where a stone fence intersects said line; thence south along said stone fence sixty feet; thence west ninety-seven feet; thence north thirty feet; thence west and parallel with said line between the lands of the parties hereto, and thirty feet south of the same, to a point in the road leading from the city of Petaluma to the city of Santa Rosa, and thirty feet south of said first-named line; thence north to said first-named line; thence easterly along the said line between the lands of the parties hereto, to the place of beginning. The said Barnes agrees to build and keep in repair a lawful fence on the south line of the land above described, and the said Hopper agrees to keep in repair the fence on the north line of said land. The understanding between the parties hereto is that the land above described is to be used as a roadway by the parties hereto and their heirs and assigns forever, for all lawful purposes whatever. Given under our hands and seals the day and year first above written." "Though an easement, like a right of way, may be created by grant in gross, as it is called, or attached to the person of the grantee, this is never presumed when it can fairly be construed to be appurtenant to some other estate." Washb. Easem. (4th Ed.) p. 45, citing Kramer v. Knauff, 12 Ill. App. 115; Boatman v. Lasley, 23 Ohio St. 614; Spensley v. Valentine, 34 Wis. 154. That the way granted may be deemed appurtenant to the adjoining land of the grantee, it is not necessary that it should have been so expressed in the grant. The grant in question is to be construed in the light of the circumstances under which it was made and the acts of the parties under and in relation thereto during a period of 15 years immediately after it was made. Dennis v. Wilson, 107 Mass. 591; Smith v. Worn, 93 Cal. 206, 28 Pac. 944. At the date of the grant the defendant owned the southwest quarter of section 32, and Thomas Hopper owned the northwest quarter of that section and about 300 acres of other land adjoining it. Section 32 is bounded on the west by the county road from Petaluma to Santa Rosa. The way in question is 30 feet wide and about 800 feet in length, connecting with said road on the west, and extending east therefrom along the quarter-section line to a gate opening into said northwest quarter section, on which plaintiffs, other than Hopper, have resided more than 10 years, and upon which is a stone quarry convenient to said gate, the product of which quarry has been hauled to market through said gate and way by plaintiffs and their lessees ever since said grant, to the knowledge of defendant, and without objection, until he erected the obstruction complained of. The way, including the gateway, was used by plaintiffs and their visitors for all purposes of traffic and travel, without objection, from the date of the grant until February 15, 1893, when defendant built the stone wall across the gateway. The gate existed and had been used in connection with the way by Hopper and his tenants before the grant. In the case of Dennis v. Wilson, supra, there was no declaration of the intention of the parties in regard to the nature of the way, and the court said: "When there is in the deed no declaration of the intention of the parties in regard to the nature of the way, it will be determined by its relation to other estates of the grantor, or its want of such relation. * * * In partition of land a right of way set to one over the land of the other would certainly be presumed to be appurtenant, unless the contrary should clearly appear. A partition by deed, with provision for a way over one of the lots for the use of the owner of the other, would be taken as making the way appurtenant as matter of course." In that case, as in this, the right of way extended from the highway along the line of division for a specified distance, less than the whole length of the dividing line. In construing the grant the court said: "As the grantor [who reserved it] could have no occasion, apparently, to use such a way for any other purpose than for access to and egress from his remaining land, the inference would seem to be inevitable that it was for that use that both parties must have understood and intended the way to be held. * * * Unless appurtenant to the land, his way was a useless cul de sac." So in the case at bar. If Hopper could not gain access to and egress from his adjoining land through the way, it was a useless cul de sac, so far as he was concerned. That the grant was intended to be of a right of way appurtenant to Hopper's adjoining land, and not of a mere personal right in gross limited to Hopper, is sufficiently expressed, it being a grant to him, "his heirs and assigns forever," without any qualification; and when the intent thus expressed is in accord with all the circumstances, and corroborated by the practical construction given by the acts of the parties, as above shown, there remains no plausible ground of controversy; and therefore I think the court below did not err in construing the grant to be of a right of way appurtenant to Hopper's adjoining land. On June 4, 1891, Thomas Hopper granted and conveyed said northwest quarter of section 32, together with said right of way, and his other land adjoining said quarter section, to his daughter, Mary E. Roberts, who is one of the plaintiffs, in consideration of love and affection, in trust for the uses and purposes expressed in the deed as follows: "That is to say, to occupy and possess by herself or her tenants, to care for and preserve the same, to collect all the rents and profits arising from the rents and products of said lands, to apply and pay out all said rents and profits—First, in payment of taxes on said property; second, to the support of said Mary E. Roberts, and to the support and education of her said minor children, William Roberts, Edward Roberts, and Hubert Roberts, as well as any and all other children that may be born unto her in the future; and any surplus of said profits shall be retained by said Mary E. Roberts in her own right. And at the death of the said Mary E. Roberts the said hereinbefore granted and described property and premises shall immediately be conveyed in fee unto the said William Roberts, Edward Roberts, and Hubert Roberts, as well as to any other children that may have been born unto the said Mary E. Roberts, provided that any of them are then living; but, in case none of them survive their said mother, the said property and premises, upon the death of all the said children and their mother, the said Mary E. Roberts, be immediately conveyed and transferred in fee to Thomas Hopper, the party of the first part, or, in case he is not then living, it shall be then conveyed in fee to the heirs at law then surviving of the said Thomas Hopper in the proportions they would be entitled to inherit under the laws of the state of California at that time in force."

The complaint was demurred to on the ground that Hopper was improperly joined as a party plaintiff, and appellant contends that the court erred in overruling the demurrer. But it does not appear on the face of the complaint that Hopper was improperly joined. Nothing of Hopper's conveyance to his daughter appears in the complaint. Therefore the demurrer was properly overruled, and, since such misjoinder was not pleaded in the answer, it was waived.

A more serious objection, however, founded upon the conveyance of Hopper to his daughter, is that the finding of the court that all the plaintiffs are owners of the right of way is not justified by the evidence, for the alleged reason that the express grant of the right of way and the dominant estate by Hopper to his daughter in trust for the use of herself and children during her life, and remainder in fee to her children should they or any of them survive her, exhausted the entire estate, leaving no interest to the grantor (Hopper) in the land or right of way, which would entitle him to maintain an action for obstruction of the way. The question presented is whether the reversion to Hopper, if such it may be called, gives him such an interest in the way in question as entitles him to maintain this action. If not, the finding of the court below that he had such an interest is not justified by the evidence. If the alleged reversion depended only upon a contingency that in its nature must happen, there would be no question that he would be entitled to an action for any wrongful act injurious thereto. 2 Washb. Real Prop. (5th Ed.) p. 804; Add. Torts (6th Ed.) *409, *424; Gould v. Stafford, 91 Cal. 146, 27 Pac. 543. But it is manifest that the contingency in this case may never happen, and probably never will happen, namely, that Mary E. Roberts will survive all her children. Therefore Hopper has no substantial estate in the easement in question which may be properly called a reversion. To him pertains only a bare possibility of reverter. He has no present estate in the property conveyed by him to his daughter for life with remainder in fee to her children which entitles him to maintain an action for any injury to that property. In Keene's Appeal, 60 Pa. St. 504, it was held that "a bare possibility," under a will dependent upon the death of the first taker without issue, is not such an interest as will authorize a citation to the executor to account; and that the interest for such purpose must be such as will certainly fall into possession sometime. See, also, 1 Washb. Real Prop. (5th Ed.) pp. 65, 95; 2 Washb. Real Prop. (5th Ed.) p. 802. It follows, I think, that the finding that all the "plaintiffs are, and were at the time that the said way was obstructed, * * * the owners of said private way," is not justified by the evidence, though all except Hopper were such owners in common with defendant. But, since no damage was found or awarded, and the plaintiffs, other than Hopper, appear to be entitled to all the relief granted by the decree, a new trial will not be necessary; and, since the name of Hopper is not mentioned in the findings or judgment, and only in the title of the complaint, the error in the finding may be corrected by striking Hopper's name from the title of the complaint, the misjoinder having been waived by failure of defendant to plead it. De Celis v. Porter, 65 Cal. 3, 2 Pac. 257, and 3 Pac. 120. With this amendment of the complaint the findings on file and the judgment as entered will be correct.

Defendant's objection to evidence that the way, including the gateway, was used by Hopper and his tenants before and up to the date of the grant of the way, was properly overruled. Such evidence was competent and relevant in aid of the construction of the grant, as tending to prove that the way was intended to be appurtenant to Hopper's adjoining land.

In view of the construction above given to the grant of the right of way, all other points made by appellant become immaterial, since they are grounded on the assumption that the grant was in gross, and the right granted not transferable. I think the court below should be instructed to amend the complaint by striking therefrom the name of Thomas Hopper, and that, with this amendment, the order and judgment should stand affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the cause is remanded, and the court below is instructed to strike from the complaint the name of Thomas Hopper. In all other respects the order and judgment appealed from are affirmed, the costs of the appeal to be borne by the appellant.

MILLER et al. v. CURRY. (S. F. 394.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 7, 1896.)

COUNTY OFFICERS — FEES — CONSOLIDATED CITY AND COUNTY.

Local or special laws prescribing the duties of officers in counties or cities, or affecting the compensation of any officers, being prohibited by Const. art. 4, § 25, and officers of a consolidated city and county being either county or city officers, Act March 28, 1895, establishing the fees of county and other officers, applies to the city and county of San Francisco, and repeals Act Feb. 9, 1866, which contained the fee bill for such city and county.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Henry Miller and others against Charles F. Curry. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

E. B. & Geo. H. Mastick, for appellants. Delmas & Shortridge, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The action is mandate to compel defendant to file an answer in a civil case without the payment of the fees required by the act of March 28, 1895, establishing the fees of county, township, and other officers, and of jurors and witnesses, in this state. St. 1895, p. 267. The sole question presented on this appeal, and therefore the only question to be decided, is the applicability of the said act of 1895 to the city and county of San Francisco. At the time of the adoption of the present constitution, the fee bill for the city and county of San Francisco was found in an act passed February 9, 1866. St. 1865-66, p. 66. If that act was repealed by the act of 1895, then the judgment of the trial court is correct. If, upon the other hand, the act of 1866 is still in force, appellants' contention must prevail. Appellants argue that the act of March 28, 1895, though a general act, does not in terms repeal the act of 1866; that there is no necessary repeal by implication; that it does not in terms apply to the officers of a city and county; and that, therefore, the general statute is to be read as silently excluding from its operation the special statute of 1866. By article 11, § 5, of the constitution, the legislature is enjoined to provide a uniform system of county government for the various cities, to regulate the compensation of county officers in proportion to their duties, and to provide for the strict accountability of all such officers for the fees and moneys collected by them in their official capacity. By section 7 of the same article, the provisions of the constitution affecting cities and affecting counties are, so far as may be, made applicable to consolidated city and county governments; while by article 4, § 25, of the constitution, the legislature is prohibited from passing special or local laws affecting the fees or salary of any officer (subdivision 29), or prescribing the powers and duties of officers in counties, cities, cities and counties (subdivision 28), or regulating county and township business (subdivision 9). The law under consideration is general in its terms, and, while it makes no distinct mention of officers in consolidated governments, it undertakes to establish the fees, not alone of county and township officers, but of other officers in this state. In the somewhat anomalous municipal corporations recognized by the constitution, and known to the law as consolidated cities and counties, the officers do not lose their distinctive characters as county officers or city officers merely because they hold within the corporate limits of such government. The county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco, the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, the recorder of the city and county of San Francisco, are each and all county officers. They have no place properly as officers of a city. Upon the other hand, the mayor of the city and county is distinctly and separately a city officer, as distinguished from a county. A law, therefore, which, under the constitutional mandate, undertook to regulate the duties or the compensation of county officers, would fail of the basic requisite of the constitution that all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation (Const. art. 1, § 11), if it should be held that its terms did not apply, and were not meant to apply, to county officers in consolidated governments; and it must therefore be concluded, without room for question, that the act under consideration is in its terms applicable to the city and county of San Francisco.

But, when this point has been reached, appellants contend that they may invoke the rule and principle expressed in Home for Inebriates v. Reis, 95 Cal. 142, 30 Pac. 205; and that, under the authority of this case, the city and county of San Francisco must be excepted from the operation of the law. All that this court did in the Reis Case was to recognize and give effect to certain well-settled principles governing the interpretation of statutes. It founded the decision in that particular case upon the maxims that repeals by implication are not favored, and that, where permissible, an earlier special statute will be construed to harmonize with a general later one. It was, in short, but the application of the maxim, "Generalia specialibus non derogant." But this rule has its limits, and means no more than that in arriving at the intent of the legislature, which is always to govern, and in endeavoring to deduce that intent from the acts themselves, unless there be plain and explicit terms of repeal in the later act, or unless the provisions of the two acts be so inconsistent as that both may not stand, it will be assumed that the legislature, in making general provision for all cases, did not mean to destroy the effect of a rule laid down with explicit care and directness, and applicable to a particular class of cases. But this, after all, is but a method of arriving at the legislative intent when other and better means are not available. So it was held in the Reis Case that there was no such repugnancy in the later act as made plain the intent of the legislature that the moneys provided for in the earlier act were no longer to be paid over to the Home of the Inebriates.

There are other rules of construction, however, of equal dignity and potency. The rules that we have been considering apply only in a case where a repugnancy between the two acts is not manifest. If such a repugnancy exist, then it is well settled that the earlier act must fall. End. Interp. St. § 206. Only so far as the two acts are not in their terms incompatible with each other is the earlier act allowed to stand. It is a fundamental rule for the interpretation of statutes that where the instrument is susceptible of two permissible constructions, by one of which it is valid, by the other of which it is void, the one in favor of its validity and of natural right will prevail, for courts will only upon the clearest showing of invalidity overthrow the enactments of a co-ordinate department of government. The legislature is presumed to know the constitution and the limitations upon its powers therein set forth. In the case at bar, as has been said, the legislature had only the power to pass a general law upon the subject in question, applicable to all county officers. If it was the legislative intent (and the legislative intent is always the ultimate fact to be determined) to except the county officers of the city and county of San Francisco from the operation of the law, this might as well have been done by an exception expressed in the terms of the act itself. No one would for a moment question but that such an exception would impair the general operation of the law, and thus violate the provisions of article 1, § 11, of the constitution. In that event, either the exception would be void, or, if inseparable from the other parts of the law, the whole act would fall. But that constitutional provision would be no less violated if the legislature did not mean and intend that the statute of 1866 should be repealed by the act of 1895. The latter would still be a law purporting to be general in its terms, yet not having a uniform operation, by reason of the exception indicated. There is thus a plain repugnancy between the act of 1866 and that of 1895, which cannot be disposed of except upon the conclusion that the legislature intended in the act of 1895 to pass a valid law, and that, to do so, the repeal of the act of 1866 necessarily resulted. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

ROWE v. SIMMONS et al. (S. F. 196.)[1]

PARTNERSHIP—EVIDENCE OF DISSOLUTION — DISMISSAL AS TO ONE DEFENDANT.

1. A chattel mortgage given on the personalty of a firm, to one who had been a member thereof, by the other members, is admissible in support of the contention of the mortgagee that the firm was dissolved by his selling out to the other members; such mortgage being given to secure payment of the purchase money.

2. In an action to dissolve a partnership, the court, finding that one of the defendants was not a member of the firm, may dismiss him from the action, giving him judgment for costs against plaintiff, though the action is to proceed between plaintiff and the other defendants.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by William B. Rowe against Joseph S. Simmons and others. Judgment for defendant Philip Simmons. Plaintiff and one of the defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. F. Hanlon, for appellant Rowe. E. C. Harrison, for appellant Simmons. A. C. Searle, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. Judgment was rendered by the court below in favor of defendant Philip Simmons against the plaintiff. The action is to dissolve an alleged partnership.

---

[1] Rehearing denied. Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In the original complaint, which was filed May 30, 1877, it was alleged that a partnership existed between the plaintiff and the defendants Joseph S. Simmons and Alonzo R. Simmons; that Philip Simmons was taken into the partnership in January, 1863, and remained a partner until about the 18th of May, 1872, "when the same was dissolved by the retirement therefrom of said Philip Simmons." Sixteen years afterwards, to wit, August 25, 1893, the plaintiff filed a supplemental complaint, in which he made the said Philip Simmons a defendant, and charged that he (Philip) was a member of the partnership. Philip filed an answer in which he denied that he was a partner, or had been since the —— day of May, 1872: and he also pleaded the statute of limitations, and that the alleged cause of action of the plaintiff had become stale, and therefore not enforceable in a court of equity. The court found that the partnership was dissolved by the consent and agreement of all the co-partners in May, 1872. It also found that the cause of action set forth in the amended complaint against Philip Simmons was barred by the provisions of section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and by laches; that the action as to said Philip should be dismissed, and judgment entered in his favor against plaintiff. And judgment was accordingly entered in favor of said Philip against the plaintiff, to the effect that plaintiff take nothing by the action against said Philip, and that the latter have judgment for his costs and disbursements. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, and his motion was denied. He appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying a new trial. The defendant Alonzo Simmons also joins in said appeal.

It is unnecessary to consider the findings of the court as to the statute of limitations and laches, because the finding of the court that the partnership was dissolved in May, 1872, and that since then the said Philip has not been a member of said partnership, is amply supported by the evidence. In May, 1872, the other partners bought out the said Philip, and all his interest in said partnership and the property owned by the partnership, for $15,000, and gave said Philip two mortgages,—one upon certain real property held by the partnership, for $9,000, and a chattel mortgage for $6,000 upon the personal property held by said partnership. The said Philip then went to the Eastern states, and remained several years; and it was clearly proven by witnesses that all the remaining members of the firm declared that they had bought out the said Philip, and that the partnership was dissolved. Afterwards the said Philip, respondent herein, brought two actions to foreclose said mortgages. To these actions the other partners set up that they had been deceived as to the value of respondent's interest in said partnership; that they had not had an opportunity to examine the books, and erroneously believed that the firm, at the time of "Philip's retirement," was owing him $15,000, but that, instead of that being the fact, he, the said respondent, was really in debt, to the firm and to the other partners. They described themselves as his "remaining partners," and made no pretense that the partnership had not been dissolved. It is quite apparent from their answers that their defense simply was that respondent had fraudulently induced them to pay more for his interest than it was worth, and the whole theory of their defense to these actions was that the partnership had really been dissolved. Neither the plaintiff herein, nor either of the other partners, ever sought to set aside the dissolution of the partnership. The plaintiff himself introduced the judgment rolls in these two actions to foreclose said two mortgages. Afterwards defendant introduced in evidence the said chattel mortgage, to which the appellant objected, and, his objection being overruled, the plaintiff excepted; and this exception is one of the grounds upon which plaintiff asks for a new trial. The objection, however, we think, was properly overruled. Appellant seems to argue that these two suits and the mortgages are relied upon by respondent as estoppels. But, assuming that they were not estoppels, they were still evidence tending to show the fact of a dissolution of the partnership. They were transactions which would not likely have occurred if there had not been a dissolution of the partnership by the sale of the interest of respondent to the other partners. The object of the introduction of the chattel mortgage by the respondent was said by his attorney at the time to be for the purpose of showing a dissolution,—"transactions that would not be likely to take place in case there was not a dissolution." When the respondent returned from the Eastern states, several years after the time of the alleged dissolution of the partnership, it seems that he collected some rents on certain real property which had been owned by the partners, and this fact is urged by the appellants as showing that the partnership had not been dissolved. But the title to the real property was in the individual partners, and one of them had sold his interest in the real property to the respondent Philip, and he claimed that he had the right, as such owner, to collect the rents. He took no part whatever in the general business of the partnership. At the time of the dissolution, when he took the mortgages, he made a deed of his interest in the real estate to the other partners; but he had not delivered said deed, because he claimed that he had a right to retain it until they had paid him the $15,000. It may be said that these facts, and some others not necessary to mention, had some tendency to support the contention of appellants that the partnership had not been dissolved, but the most that can be said is that these facts made some conflict of evidence. All the evidence, however, taken together, not only justified the finding of the court upon the ground of a conflict, but strongly preponderates in favor of the conclusion reached by the court.

We see no good foundation for the technical point made by appellants, in their final brief, that the judgment is invalid because it is not a final determination of the rights of all the parties. The court, having found that the plaintiff had made no case against the defendant Philip, had clearly the power to dismiss the action as to him, and to give him judgment against plaintiff for his costs, notwithstanding the action was to proceed as between the plaintiff and the other defendants. The respondent, not being a partner, and therefore not being in any way liable to plaintiff upon the matters alleged in the complaint, was entitled to be dismissed from the action. Code Civ. Proc. § 581. Judgment and order affirmed.

EQUITABLE NAT. BANK v. GRIFFIN & SKELLEY CO. (S. F. 47.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 11, 1896.)

BILL OF EXCHANGE—PAYMENT BY CHECK.

A bill of exchange drawn on defendant by C., payable to plaintiff, was presented by plaintiff's agent to defendant. Defendant's manager thereupon called on the agent, and gave its check for the amount, with direction that the draft, which was in the possession of the agent's clerk, then out of the office, should be marked "Paid," and be sent to it. It was so marked and sent that evening. Held, that the giving of the check constituted payment, and not a mere acceptance; so that defendant, on learning of the insolvency of C. before payment of the check, could not demand the return of the check in exchange for the draft.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by the Equitable National Bank against the Griffin & Skelley Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lloyd & Wood, for appellant. E. S. Pillsbury, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This appeal is by the defendant, a corporation, from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial. It is conceded that the facts are fairly stated in the findings. From the findings it appears that the appellants had dealings with A. R. Clark & Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio. They bought and sold goods to and from each other. It was the understanding and agreement between them that each firm should draw upon the other as shipments were made. Bills drawn by defendant upon A. R. Clark & Co. were drawn payable 60 days after acceptance, but those drawn by A. R. Clark & Co. upon defendant were payable at sight, less 1½ per cent. for cash. December 8, 1892, A. R. Clark & Co. sold and shipped to defendant goods to the amount of $617.50, and thereupon mailed the bill to the defendant, and also, in pursuance of the previous agreement, drew a bill of exchange on the defendant, payable at sight to plaintiff, for the amount of the goods shipped. The bill of exchange was delivered to plaintiff, which thereupon paid the amount to A. R. Clark & Co. The bill was then sent to plaintiff's agent in San Francisco for collection, being received there December 13, 1892, and on the same day was presented to defendant for payment. Defendant's manager on the same day called at the office of Wells, Fargo & Co., which was plaintiff's agent, and gave its check on the Crocker-Woolworth Bank for the amount. The clerk having the bill of exchange not then being at the office, the bill was sent by Wells, Fargo & Co. to defendant that evening by mail, as requested by defendant. Pursuant to that request, the bill of exchange was marked "Paid." It was received by the defendant on the following morning. Some time after its reception, but on the same day, defendant learned that A. R. Clark & Co. had become insolvent. Then defendant sent to plaintiff's agent, offered to restore the bill of exchange, and demanded the return to it of the check on the Crocker-Woolworth Bank, which had not then been paid. This Wells, Fargo & Co. refused to do, and then defendant requested the bank to refuse payment of the check, which it did. Plaintiff then demanded payment from defendant, and, payment having been refused, this action was commenced upon the check.

Appellant contends that at the time the return of the check was demanded the check given by it may be regarded as an acceptance, and that as the plaintiff still held it, and its position had been in no way changed by reason of the act of defendant, it was entitled to recall the acceptance, under the rule laid down in section 3198, Civ. Code. But the position of plaintiff had been changed by the transaction. The check given by defendant would not have constituted payment unless it had been so understood. Defendant delivered the check with express direction that the draft of A. R. Clark & Co. should be marked "Paid," and sent to it; and these terms were acceded to, and the draft was so marked and surrendered to defendant. This shows a distinct understanding by both parties that the bill of exchange had been paid. Suppose afterwards, but before the check was paid, defendant had become insolvent; could not A. R. Clark & Co. have contended that the bill of exchange had been paid? The authorities seem to be uniform that under such circumstances the money paid cannot be recovered by the drawee. Bank v. Burkham, 32 Mich. 328; Hoffman v. Bank, 12 Wall. 181; Ft. Dearborn Nat. Bank v. Carter, Rice & Co., 152 Mass. 34, 25 N. E. 27. It follows, I think, that the judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. MILLER. (Cr. 87.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 12, 1896.)

HOMICIDE — PLEADING GUILTY — WITHDRAWING PLEA—EVIDENCE IN MITIGATION OF PENALTY.

1. Evidence of intoxication of defendant at the time of the murder is inadmissible in mitigation of the penalty; he having pleaded guilty, and it appearing from his confession and other testimony that the crime was deliberate and premeditated, and in accomplishment of a pre-existing plot, and that he at the time knew, and afterwards confessed in detail, the part he took in it.

2. Nor is evidence of good character admissible for such purpose, under such circumstances.

3. Where one makes a confession of a murder, and more than six weeks thereafter, when he had had aid of counsel for a month, withdraws his plea of not guilty, on their advice, after repeated consultations, and after being fully informed of his rights and the consequences of his act, there is no abuse of discretion in refusing to allow the withdrawal of his plea of guilty, on the ground that it was made in fear of and to avoid mob violence; the request to withdraw not having been made till after it was apparent that the court would impose the death penalty, and there being nothing in the evidence which would call for a lesser punishment.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Yuba county; E. A. Dairs, Judge.

Marshall J. Miller, indicted for murder, appeals from the denial of a motion that he be allowed to withdraw his plea of guilty. Affirmed.

C. A. Webb and Richard Belcher, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

HENSHAW, J. Upon the 8th day of May, 1895, this defendant was charged by information with the crime of murder. Upon the 11th day of the same month, he was brought before the superior court for arraignment. At his request the court appointed two attorneys to represent him, and granted him until May 13th to consider his plea. Upon the last-named date the defendant came before the court with his counsel and pleaded not guilty to the charge. The plea was accepted and entered, and the cause set for trial upon the 17th day of June following. Upon that day, the court being actually engaged in the trial of another cause, the case of defendant was continued until June 19th. Upon June 19th defendant appeared in court with his two counsel, and the case was called for trial. Thereupon Mr. Belcher, counsel of and speaking for defendant, stated to the court, in open court, that defendant desired to withdraw his plea of not guilty, theretofore entered, and to plead guilty to the charge in the information set out. The court then asked the defendant if that was his desire, and he answered "Yes." The court then asked him if he understood that upon a plea of "Guilty" the court would be obliged to hear testimony and receive evidence for the purpose of determining the degree of the crime of which he stood charged, and to which he asked leave to plead guilty; and he said he did, and that he had been fully advised by his said attorneys as to all of said matters. Thereupon the court made its order that the defendant be permitted to withdraw his said plea of "Not guilty," and the same was by him (said defendant) then withdrawn. The court asked the defendant whether he was guilty of the charge of murder contained in said information. Whereupon the defendant personally pleaded that he was guilty thereof. The court thereupon stated that it would then proceed to hear testimony and receive evidence in the case for the purpose of determining the degree of said crime; and, no objection being made, the court then proceeded to hear and receive the same. At the conclusion of the taking of the evidence offered by the people, the court asked defendant if he had any testimony or evidence to offer; and he answered, by his counsel, that he had none. The hearing of evidence took until 11:30 a. m., at which hour the court continued further proceedings until 4 o'clock p. m. of the same day. At this last hour,—all the parties, with their attorneys and counsel, being present,—the court announced that, from the evidence, it was satisfied that the murder of Julius Pier was committed by defendant in the perpetration of robbery and burglary, and "that there are no facts or circumstances in the case which ought to mitigate the extreme penalty of the law." The defendant was thereupon adjudged guilty of murder in the first degree, and ordered to appear for sentence upon the 29th day of June. Upon the 29th day of June, defendant, with his counsel, came into court, and moved for a postponement of the time of pronouncing judgment upon defendant, to the end that defendant might be enabled to introduce evidence in mitigation of punishment. Thereupon further proceedings were postponed until July 3d. Upon this last-named day the defense asked a further postponement to procure evidence of the previous good character of the defendant, and of the fact that at the time of the murder he was intoxicated so that "he was unable at the time to thoroughly appreciate his position, or to thoroughly distinguish right from wrong, or to form an intent to commit the crime." The court denied this motion, properly holding that under the circumstances the evidence was valueless,—as to intoxication, because the defendant's confession admitted in evidence, with the other testimony which was taken, showed that the crime was deliberate and premeditated, and was perpetrated in accomplishment of a pre-existing plot; that the defendant knew at the time, and afterwards confessed in detail, the part he took in it; and finally because, if incapable of forming a criminal design, defendant was innocent of any crime, which consideration was removed by his plea of guilty. As to the evidence of previous good character, the ruling was based upon the sound principle that evidence of this character may be introduced where the question of a defendant's guilt is in doubt, but not where it is admitted. After this ruling, and the consequent failure to secure further postponement, and when the court was upon the point of pronouncing judgment of sentence upon defendant, his counsel moved that defendant be allowed to withdraw his plea of guilty and plead not guilty, and, with the motion offered, read and filed defendant's affidavit, made upon July 3d (the day of the hearing), which set forth that defendant, while in jail, feared mob violence, and summary death at the hands of lynchers, and that when he pleaded guilty he did so "without due deliberation, and without fully realizing his position, and in the hope that by so doing the punishment to which he would be exposed, were he tried before a jury, would thereby be mitigated." No other showing than that of the affidavit was made. The court denied the motion, from which order defendant appeals.

In immediate connection with the quotation from defendant's affidavit, it is proper to set forth exactly what the record shows: "The Court: Are you ready in the case of People v. Miller? Mr. McDaniel: The prosecution is ready. Mr. Belcher: In this case the defendant, Miller, wishes, with the permission of the court, to withdraw his former plea of not guilty, and to plead again to the information by changing that plea. The Court: That means but one thing. He wishes to withdraw the plea of not guilty, and— Mr. Belcher: To plead guilty. That is the only interpretation to be put on it. The Court: Have you fully informed the defendant with regard to this matter? Mr. Belcher: I have. I have talked with him several times upon the proposition. I have submitted to him all that could be, in my judgment, urged for and against, and have asked him what to do, and he has told me that he wishes to plead guilty. I think he understands it fully. The Court (to defendant, Miller): Have you discussed this matter fully with your attorney? A. Yes. Q. And do you understand the situation thoroughly? A. Yes. Q. Do you understand that if you withdraw your plea of not guilty, and plead guilty, the court will have to take testimony and determine the degree? Do you understand that? A. Yes. Q. And, under those circumstances, do you wish to withdraw your plea of not guilty? A. Yes." The clerk was thereupon directed by the court to enter the withdrawal of the plea of not guilty formerly made by the defendant, Marshall J. Miller. "The Court (to defendant Miller): Now stand up. Do you understand what the information against you is? That it charges you with the crime of murder? A. Yes. Q. What is your plea,—guilty or not guilty? A. Guilty."

Upon May 2d, more than two weeks before he pleaded guilty, defendant had made a voluntary confession, which was introduced in evidence. In that confession he minutely related the circumstances of the murder, which was brutal and atrocious to the last degree. Defendant and his confederate had been plotting for several weeks to rob Julius Pier, a neighboring storekeeper. In the nighttime they went to his store, in the rear of which he slept. They carried with them pistols and a bludgeon, and ropes and straps with which to bind their victim. They were unmasked. Masks were unnecessary, for they appear to have fully contemplated his murder if he should discover them. He was absent. They forced an entrance, and were rifling the place when he returned. They struck him blow after blow with the bludgeon. They held him down, tied him hand and foot, and gagged him. The gag was so placed that it would and did produce suffocation. The murderers were smeared with his blood. With the staring, tortured, dying man upon the floor before them, they carried off their plunder, and left him to his death.

Appellant's contention is that the court abused its discretion in not allowing him to withdraw his plea, interpose a plea of not guilty for the second time, and go before a jury for trial. Before judgment the court may at any time permit this to be done (Pen. Code, § 1018), and the discretion thus vested is one to be liberally exercised. The law seeks no unfair advantage over a defendant, but is watchful to see that the proceedings under which his life or liberty is at stake shall be fairly and impartially conducted. It holds in contemplation his natural distress, and is considerate in viewing the motives which may influence him to take one or another course. Therefore it will permit a plea of guilty to be withdrawn, if it fairly appears that defendant was in ignorance of his rights and of the consequences of his act, or was unduly and improperly influenced, either by hope or fear, in the making of it. But the mere fact that a defendant, knowing his rights and the consequences of his act, hoped or believed, or was led by his counsel to hope or believe, that he would receive a shorter sentence or a milder punishment by pleading guilty than that which would fall to his lot after trial and conviction by jury, presents no ground for the exercise of this liberal discretion. People v. Lennox, 67 Cal. 113, 7 Pac. 260. To hold that it did would be equivalent to saying that a defendant might speculate upon the supposed clemency of a judge, with the right to retract if at any time before sentence he began to think that his expectation would not be realized.

And this we are constrained to believe is exactly what this defendant attempted to do. He had made free and voluntary confession of his atrocious crime, in all its details. Upon June 19th, more than six weeks after making his confession, when he has had the aid of counsel for nearly a month, under their advice, and under their statement and his own that after repeated consultations he is fully advised of his rights, and of the consequences of his act, he withdraws his plea of not guilty. After his confession had been made known for more than six weeks, all of which time he had passed in the security of his jail, his fear of mob violence could not have been very keen, and as the court, of its own knowledge, says, was not justified by the facts. Upon June 19th the court makes plain intimation to the defendant that it will be compelled to impose the death penalty upon him, and continues the case 10 days longer for that purpose. At the next hearing, on June 29th, no suggestion is made by defendant that he desires to withdraw his plea, or that he has been improperly induced by fear or hope to the making of it. He simply asks time to procure evidence in mitigation of punishment. This time is granted him, though at the former hearing he declared that he had no evidence to offer. Again he comes before the court, upon July 3d, and again a motion is made for postponement, still with no suggestion that defendant desires to withdraw his plea. Only after it is made manifest that defendant is to suffer the extreme penalty, and that no further delay will be permitted, do counsel produce the affidavit, itself made upon the day of the hearing, but not offered until that moment, and ask to be allowed to retrace all the steps thus advisedly taken. What conclusion can be reached, except the one that, because the court was about to pronounce sentence of death, defendant and his counsel, knowing that he could not fare worse at the hands of a jury, and might fare better, sought an opportunity to essay the other chance. If we could perceive anything in the evidence which would have called for a lesser punishment than that which the trial court was about to impose, some reason might appear why defendant should have been permitted to withdraw his plea and put his fate before a jury. No showing of this kind is made. The record not only fails to show an abuse of discretion, but, on the contrary, from first to last, makes manifest that the trial judge, placed in an unusual and most trying position, conducted all of the proceedings with a just and even solicitous regard for the defendant's rights, and ruled as alone it was permissible for him to rule under the facts before him. The order appealed from is affirmed.

ELLIS v. MASSACHUSETTS MUT. LIFE INS. CO. (S. F. 144.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 4, 1896.)

LIFE INSURANCE—PROOF OF DEATH.

A life policy provided that, if any premium was not paid when due, the policy should cease, except as provided in Act Mass. April 10, 1861, "subject to which this contract is made." It also provided that no claim should exist under it unless notice and proof of death were given within two years from death of insured. Act Mass. April 10, 1861, provides that in case of failure to pay premiums the policy shall not be forfeited because thereof, but the net value of the policy at the time of the default shall be treated as a premium to uphold the policy so long as its amount will serve the purpose, "provided, however, that notice of the claim and proof of death shall be submitted to the company within ninety days after the decease." Held, that the policy waived the 90-days provision of the statute, and allowed notice and proof of death within 2 years, even where there had been default in payment of premiums.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Francisco county.

Action by Leila Ellis against the Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Freeman & Bates, for appellant. Morrison, Stratton & Foerster, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to recover upon an insurance policy issued by the defendant, a corporation, organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Massachusetts, on the 17th day of December, 1878, to William H. Ellis, of New Orleans, in the state of Louisiana, insuring the life of him, the said William H. Ellis, for $2,000; loss payable to Leila Ellis, wife of the insured, and plaintiff herein. A demurrer was interposed to plaintiff's amended complaint, based upon the ground that said complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, which demurrer was sustained by the court, and judgment rendered in favor of defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

The amended complaint shows that the annual premium was payable in quarterly installments, and was paid to and including the quarterly installment which fell due September 17, 1885. Thereafter no premiums were paid. The insured died at New Orleans in October, 1892. In July, 1894, plaintiff presented due notice and satisfactory proof of death to defendant, and defendant refused payment. Two of the provisions of the policy are as follows: "Second. That this policy shall not take effect until the advance premium hereon shall have been paid during the lifetime of the person whose life is hereby insured, and that, if any subsequent premium or installment of premium on this policy shall not be paid on or before the day when due, then this policy shall cease and determine, except as provided in chapter 186, Laws of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, approved April 10, 1861, under the provisions of which law this contract is made. (A copy of this law is printed on the third page of this policy.)" "Thirteenth. That no claim shall exist under this policy unless due notice and satisfactory proof of death shall be presented in writing to the officers of the said company, at the home office, in Springfield, Massachusetts, within two years after the death of the person whose life is hereby insured, and that, in accordance with the provisions of the General Statutes of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts (chapter 58, section 16), the time within which any suit shall be brought against the said company on any claim under this policy is hereby limited to two years from the time when the right of action accrues."

The statute of Massachusetts, approved April 10, 1861, is set forth in the complaint. Without quoting the statute at length, it is sufficient to say that the policy issued and was payable in the state of Massachusetts, and that by the statute referred to in the policy, and set out in the complaint (chapter 186), it is provided that no policy of insurance on life hereafter issued (after 1861) shall be forfeited or become void by the nonpayment of premium thereon, but in such cases the net value of the policy when the premium becomes due and is not paid shall be determined according to the "combined experience" or "actuaries" rate of mortality, with interest at 4 per cent. per annum. Four-fifths of such net value, after deducting all indebtedness to the company, if any, shall be considered a net single premium of temporary insurance, and the term for which it will insure shall be determined according to the age of the party at the time of the lapse of the premium. If the death of the insured occurs during the term of the insurance covered by the value of the policy as aforesaid, and if no other condition of the policy has been broken, except the nonpayment of premiums, the company shall be bound to pay the amount of the policy, the same as if there had been no lapse of premium, "provided, however, that notice of the claim and proof of death shall be submitted to the company within ninety days after the decease." It is further provided that the company may deduct from the amount due on the policy the premiums forborne, and 6 per cent. interest thereon. The complaint shows that the net value of the policy at the date when the payment of premiums ceased constituted a sum which kept the policy alive up to December, 1895, and that the insured died in 1892. Plaintiff further shows, in apt words, that she was not aware of the death of the insured until June, 1894, and that she gave notice, etc., and in July, 1894, presented proofs, etc., to defendant. The court below held, in sustaining the demurrer, that under section 2 of chapter 186 of the Laws of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, approved April 10, 1861, it was incumbent upon the beneficiary under the policy to give notice of the claim and proof of the death to the company within 90 days after the decease of the insured. The propriety of this ruling is the only question involved on the appeal. Appellant's contention is that "the defendant, in its policy, waived presentation of proof of death within the ninety days required by the statute of 1861." We proceed to the consideration of the question of waiver by the defendant.

The statute of 1861 simply provides that, in case of failure to pay the annual premiums, no forfeiture shall occur by reason thereof, but treats the sums already paid, after making the deductions therein provided for, as a premium to uphold the policy so long as its amount will serve such purpose. Broadly stated, it treats the net value of the policy at the date of default as a cash payment of that date on account of premiums, and the policy will not be forfeited until such payment is exhausted. This is, by the statute, termed "temporary insurance." If the death of the insured occur within this period of temporary insurance, and no other condition of the policy than the nonpayment of premium has been violated by the insured, "the company shall be bound to pay the amount of the policy the same as if there had been no lapse of premium, anything in the policy to the contrary notwithstanding, provided, however, that notice of the claim and proof of death shall be submitted to the company within ninety days," together with another proviso not important here. This requirement in reference to the time of notice and proof of death is imperative, and binding upon the insured and his beneficiaries. But this is a provision incorporated in the law for the benefit of the insurer. A provision in a law or in a contract intended for the benefit of a party may be waived by the party to be benefited thereby. Did the insurers waive this clause in the Massachusetts statute? We think this question should be answered in the affirmative. It inserted in its policy the following condition: "That no claim shall exist under this policy unless due notice and satisfactory proof of death shall be presented in writing to the officers of the said company, at the home office, in Springfield, Massachusetts, within two years after the death of the person whose life is hereby insured." By every rule of construction in such cases, the effect of this clause was to give two years after the death within which to give notice and furnish the proof of death. If it was not intended to abrogate the proviso of the Massachusetts statute requiring such notice and proofs to be made within 90 days, then it is a snare and a delusion, well calculated to entrap the unwary, and lull them into fancied security until, all too late, they find themselves deceived, and beyond the pale of redress. It cannot properly be said that the term of two years is given to impart notice and make proofs of death in case premiums are all paid upon the policy, and that this is a case of special insurance, to which the two-year clause is not applicable, for the reasons: (1) The two-year clause is general, and not limited to any particular exigency; (2) the insurance, in case of nonpayment of premiums, is only special in the sense that the policy is kept alive only so long as the net value of the policy will continue to extinguish the premiums. The right to recover in such a case, if any, is upon the policy, and is "the same as if there had been no lapse of premium." To say that in such a case no recovery can be had without showing that notice and proofs of death were given within 90 days is to beg the very question in issue,—to assume there is no waiver, which is the question to be determined. The waiver of notice and proofs within 90 days, by fixing the period at 2 years, stands in lieu of the 90-day requirement, and, when consummated within 2 years, is as complete as it would have been, without the waiver, if performed within the 90 days. The defendant loses nothing by such waiver. Under the statute, when it pays the policy it is authorized to deduct the premiums which fell due during the time the net value of such policy stood as security therefor, and extending the time to make the proofs of death will frequently have the effect of deferring the day of payment to the advantage of the insurer. We recommend that the judgment be reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BRITT, C.

BADDELEY v. SHEA. (S. F. 85.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 12, 1896.)

NEGLIGENCE—DEFECT IN STEPS TO PRIVATE HOUSE —INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Where a board in the platform to the steps leading from a private house broke as one hired to take a trunk from the house was passing over it with the trunk, the owner of the house is not liable for negligence, if he exercised such care in and about keeping the platform in good condition as housekeepers of common prudence are accustomed to exercise; and the platform having been properly constructed, and one which would ordinarily wear many years without repair, and the defect being latent (dry rot on the underside) and unknown to the owner, and no indication being given by the platform that it was unsafe, and the owner not having any knowledge or notice of any deficiency of ventilation under it, he cannot be held negligent for not having examined the platform for any such defect.

2. An instruction, in an action against the owner of a private house for injury from the breaking of a board in a platform to the steps leading from the house, that "those latent defects which are either concealed in defective workmanship, or are incident to the ordinary wear and tear of houses, are among the casualties which no man can avoid without that extraordinary care and vigilance which the law does not impose. If you believe from the evidence that the platform was constructed in a good and substantial manner, and gave no indication of being unsafe, up to the accident, * * * then I instruct you the defendant was under no legal obligations to have the said platform inspected from time to time; and if you find from the evidence that the defect in said platform was secret, and unknown to defendant, and was incident to the ordinary wear and tear of said platform, then you will find a verdict for defendant,"—is not a charge as to fact.

Action by William Baddeley against James Shea. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Sawyer & Burnett, for appellant. Estee, Miller & Shurtleff, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action for recovery of damages for personal injuries. Plaintiff, being a servant of the City Transfer Company, of the city of San Francisco, called at the private dwelling house of defendant, at the latter's request, for the purpose of carrying two trunks from there to the railroad depot. After having taken the smaller trunk to his wagon, he returned for the larger trunk, which was very heavy. Defendant then told him he would not be able to carry that heavy trunk downstairs, and offered to assist him; but plaintiff declined the proffered assistance, and placed the trunk upon his back, saying to defendant, "You put that young lady on top of this trunk, and I can take her down." He then went down the inside stairs, passed out at the front door and down the front steps to a platform about three steps above the sidewalk. When he stepped down upon the platform the plank upon which he stepped broke, letting his leg through the opening made by the break, and fracturing one of the bones (fibula) at the juncture of the ankle. The issues of fact were tried by a jury, whose verdict was in favor of the plaintiff, and the judgment of the court was in accordance with the verdict. The defendant has appealed from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The evidence, without conflict, shows that the front steps, including the platform which broke, was built for defendant, about 7 or 8 years before the accident, by a carpenter and builder whose competency and skill were in no degree impeached; that it was well constructed, of first-rate material, which would ordinarily wear 16 to 20 years without repair; that it had been repainted every year; that it appeared to defendant and those who had passed over it to be perfectly sound and safe, up to the time of the accident; and that the defendant had no knowledge that it was unsound, unsafe, or at all defective, until after the accident. But an examination after the accident disclosed a partial decay (dry rot) of the underside of the plank that broke, and of a stringer on which it rested, which was not apparent from the outside, and which could not have been discovered without making an opening through or under the vertical side of the steps sufficient to admit a person under the platform, which was only about one foot above the ground. It is not pretended by respondent that there was any defect in the construction of the steps or platform, except that he contends there was not sufficient ventilation under them, and upon this question the evidence was conflicting. On the part of defendant it was shown that the open space under the platform extended back to, and connected with, the open space under the house, and that the open space under the house was ventilated in the ordinary way; but on the part of plaintiff it was contended that there should have been ventilating holes immediately connected with the open space under the platform and steps. But there was no evidence that defendant had any knowledge or notice of the alleged deficiency of ventilation, nor that any other ventilation than that under the house was necessary.

At the request of defendant's counsel the court properly, I think, gave to the jury the following instruction: "The defendant is only bound to exercise the care which housekeepers, or owners of houses, of common prudence are accustomed to exercise; and, if you find from the evidence that the defendant did exercise such care in and about keeping the platform in good condition, then your verdict will be in favor of the defendant." Counsel for plaintiff contended that under the rule expressed in this instruction the defendant must be found guilty of negligence, in that he had not examined the underside of the platform for the purpose of ascertaining whether it was sound and safe, "this being the only negligence claimed to have been proved." In answer to this, defendant's counsel contended that to have made any examination of the underside of his steps or platform within eight years after they were built, under the circumstances proved, and without any notice or indication that they were unsound or unsafe, would have been extraordinary care and vigilance on the part of the defendant, which the law does not require, and to this effect asked the following instruction, which was refused on the express ground that it was a "charge as to fact": "Those latent defects which are either concealed in defective workmanship, or are incident to the ordinary wear and tear of houses, are among the casualties which no man can avoid without that extraordinary care and vigilance which the law does not impose. If you believe from the evidence that the platform through which the plaintiff broke was constructed in a good and substantial manner, and gave no indication of being unsafe, up to the accident testified to, then I instruct you the defendant was under no legal obligations to have the said platform inspected from time to time; and if you find from the evidence that the defect in said platform was secret, and unknown to defendant, and was incident to the ordinary wear and tear of said platform, then you will find a verdict for the defendant." I think this instruction is substantially correct, and should have been given. In speaking of the liability of owners of private houses for the consequences of defects therein dangerous to invited visitors on lawful business, Mr. Wharton, in his book on Negligence (section 825), says: "For the question, when such liability is mooted in reference to such a visitor, is whether the proprietor exercised in his house the care which good housekeepers are accustomed to exercise. What is such care? Certainly, when we recollect the great varieties of habit and taste in this respect, all we can ask is that the house, to those visiting it, should be free from those obvious defects of which an occupant, not an expert in mechanics, would be cognizant. Those latent defects which are either concealed in defective workmanship, or are incidental to the ordinary wear and tear of houses, are among those casualties which no man can avoid without the exercise of that extraordinary care and vigilance which the law does not impose;" citing English cases. There can be no question that in such cases the law imposes the duty of only ordinary care, which is properly defined to be such as good housekeepers ordinarily exercise to avoid danger of personal injuries in their own private dwelling houses. Nor do I think it questionable that an examination by the defendant of his stairs and platform, at any time before the accident, for the purpose of detecting latent defects, from which, under the circumstances and facts assumed and hypothetically stated in the requested instruction, would have been extraordinary care.

The only ground upon which the instruction was refused is that it instructs as to questions of fact which should have been submitted to the jury. But I do not so understand it. It merely applies the law to hypothetical facts, and submits to the jury the question whether the facts hypothetically stated are true. The questions of fact thus submitted were: (1) Whether the platform which broke had been constructed in a good and substantial manner; (2) whether the defects therein, if any, were latent, and were unknown to defendant before the accident; (3) whether the platform gave any indication of being unsafe before the accident. And, in case the jury should find the affirmative of the first two of these questions, and the negative of the third, instructed, as legal conclusions, that it had not been the duty of the defendant, before the accident, to examine the platform for the purpose of discovering latent defects, either in the workmanship, or caused by ordinary wear, and that the verdict of the jury should be for the defendant. That these were simple conclusions of law is unquestionable. Shear. & R. Neg. §§ 52, 53. And that such conclusions were correct appears, not only from the above extract from Wharton on Negligence, supported by English cases, but from the following American cases: Lunney v. Concord, 58 Fed. 913; Hobbs v. Stauer, 62 Wis. 108, 22 N. W. 153; De Graff v. Railroad Co., 76 N. Y. 125; Provision Co. v. Hightower, 92 Ill. 139; Hoffman v. Dickinson, 31 W. Va. 152, 6 S. E. 53; Warner v. Railway Co., 39 N. Y. 468; Sjogren v. Hall, 53 Mich. 275, 18 N. W. 812 (per Cooley, J.); Mars v. Canal Co., 54 Hun, 625, 8 N. Y. Supp. 107; Railway Co. v. Elliott, 5 C. C. A. 347, 55 Fed. 949; Loftus v. Ferry Co., 22 Hun, 33; Id., 84 N. Y. 455. It should be borne in mind, however, that the ultimate question of law to be decided is whether it was the duty of the defendant, under the circumstances proved, to examine his platform for the purpose of ascertaining whether there were latent defects in it; for, if such was not his duty, his omission to make such examination was not negligence, in any degree, and the defendant was entitled to a verdict. Smith v. Whittier, 95 Cal. 279, 30 Pac. 529. And whether or not such was his duty depends entirely upon whether or not he had notice of facts which would induce a man of ordinary prudence to suspect the existence of a latent defect, in consequence of which danger of injury to person or property might be reasonably apprehended; and when, in such a case, the facts of which one charged with negligence had notice, are known and undisputed, the question of duty to examine for latent defects is a pure question of law, though it may involve a question as to the degree of care required, which is also a question of law when the facts are given. Stratton v. Railway Co., 95 Ill. 25; Sack. Instruct. Juries, p. 15. In accordance with these principles, courts grant nonsuits and direct verdicts in actions for negligence, whether the negligence in question be that of the defendant, or contributory negligence of the plaintiff. Glascock v. Railroad Co., 73 Cal. 137, 14 Pac. 518; Orcutt v. Railway Co., 85 Cal. 291, 24 Pac. 661; Smith v. Steamship Co., 99 Cal. 462, 34 Pac. 84.

Counsel for respondent have cited many cases, none of which seems to be relevant. Only those of them, however, from which counsel have copied extracts, without stating the facts bearing on the point decided, need special notice. In Carleton v. Steel Co., 99 Mass. 216, cited for respondent, the unsafe condition by which plaintiff was injured, and of which he was not warned, was known to the defendant. In Currier v. Association, 135 Mass. 414, in which it was held that if defendant neglected his duty to keep the hall in a safe condition, so that in fact it was unsafe when plaintiff entered it, "defendant's knowledge or ignorance of the defect was immaterial," the only defects complained of were a depression in the floor, and that the hall was not sufficiently lighted. These defects, if they existed, must have been patent to all who entered the hall, and it was not questioned that they were so. Had the hall been properly lighted, the depression in the floor would have been apparent, so that the negligence which was the immediate cause of the injury was the omission of the duty to light the hall, which duty was not questioned. In Looney v. McLean, 129 Mass. 33, "it was admitted that the defendant knew that the stairs [by the breaking of which plaintiff was injured] were greatly decayed and unsafe, and there was no evidence that he cautioned or notified the plaintiff that they were so." In Holmes v. Drew, 151 Mass. 578, 25 N. E. 22, the only question was whether the public had been invited to use a sidewalk on defendant's private land. In Gill v. Middleton, 105 Mass. 477, it was assumed to have been the duty of defendant, arising from contract, to use ordinary skill in repairing a privy so as to make it safe. He failed to use such skill, in consequence of which the plaintiff was injured. The defendant asked the trial court to instruct the jury "that the defendant is not liable unless he knew or believed that the repairs which he made were insufficient, and that the premises were still unsafe and dangerous." The appellate court overruled an exception to the refusal of this instruction, saying, "His undertaking required at least the skill of an ordinary mechanic, and his failure to furnish it, either because he did not possess or neglected to use it, would be gross negligence." While this implies that the knowledge or belief of the defendant in that case was immaterial, it is obvious that it does not touch the question involved in the case at bar. In Lindsey v. Leighton, 150 Mass. 285, 22 N. E. 901, the plaintiff was injured by a defect in a platform at the head of stairs which the defendant was in duty bound to repair and keep in safe condition. The defect was that a board in the platform had become loose. The defendant asked the court to instruct the jury "if the jury find that there was such defect, but that it was not known to the defendant at or previous to the accident, then they must find for the defendant." The instruction was refused, and the appellate court overruled an exception to the refusal of it. There was no evidence that the defect was latent, nor that defendant had no knowledge of it. The plaintiff had made a prima facie case by proving the defect and consequent injury; and unless there was rebutting evidence tending to show that the defect was latent, and that the defendant was ignorant of it, the instruction was properly denied, because not applicable to the evidence.

For like reasons, the case of Camp v. Wood, 76 N. Y. 92, is not in point. As considerable importance has been attributed to the fact that plaintiff was invited to remove the trunks from defendant's house, it should be observed that he was not invited to carry the heavy trunk downstairs, but that defendant protested against his doing so, and also that plaintiff did not accept defendant's invitation gratuitously. It was the business of plaintiff's employer to carry trunks for hire. The parties were equally interested in the transaction. I think the order and judgment appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order and judgment appealed from are reversed, and a new trial granted.

In re TREADWELL. (No. 9,761.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 13, 1896.)

REINSTATING DISBARRED ATTORNEY.

Disbarment of an attorney does not preclude his reinstatement on good cause shown.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

Application for reinstatement of W. B. Treadwell, a disbarred attorney. Granted.

Ben Goodrich, D. K. Trask, and Wm. A. Harris, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. On the 2d day of April, 1885, on proceedings had therefor, an order was made and entered by this court striking the name of said W. B. Treadwell, then an attorney of this court, from the roll of attorneys and counselors, and prohibiting him from practicing as such attorney, upon the ground that said Treadwell had, in his capacity as such attorney, been guilty of misappropriating moneys intrusted to his keeping. An application is now made in behalf of said Treadwell by E. B. and George H. Mastick, attorneys of this court in good standing, asking that he be restored to said roll of attorneys. The sworn petition shows that continuously since the 1st day of January, 1887, the said Treadwell has been in the employment, as general assistant and confidential managing clerk, of the law firm composed of these petitioners and the late W. C. Belcher, down to the death of Mr. Belcher in September, 1895, and that since said date said Treadwell has continued in the employment of petitioners in a like capacity; "that, during the nine years which have elapsed since said Treadwell entered their employment as aforesaid, petitioners have reposed in him the most implicit confidence, and have given to him the management of matters of great importance, requiring the utmost care, secrecy, and good faith, and have intrusted to him large sums of money and property belonging to themselves and others; that their confidence in him has never been betrayed, and that they have always found him to be careful and trustworthy in the highest degree; that, during all of said time, petitioners have had frequent social intercourse with said Treadwell and members of his family, and can and do truly certify to his good character as a husband and parent, and as a moral and upright citizen of this community; that the conduct of said Treadwell since the said 1st day of January, 1887, has ever been such as to inspire confidence in his character, honor, and integrity, and to warrant this application to the court in his behalf, and it is their firm belief and opinion that he can be safely admitted to practice again, and intrusted with the affairs of clients." It is further shown that the money, the appropriation of which caused the disbarment of said Treadwell, has been by him fully refunded and repaid to those entitled thereto. This petition is accompanied by personal letters and recommendations addressed to the court from a large number of the prominent attorneys and law firms practicing before this court, all of the highest professional standing, many of the judges and ex-judges of our superior court, and others; all uniting in the request of said petition, and urgently asking the granting of the same, and stating, in substance, that, from their personal knowledge and observation of the life and character of said Treadwell since his disbarment, they sincerely believe him to have fully atoned the wrong committed by him, that his whole course of conduct since said disbarment has been above reproach, and that they regard him, notwithstanding his one misstep, as a man of high moral character, of great industry and ability, and one whose reinstatement at the bar will in no way bring discredit upon the profession of the law. This showing is a very strong one, and presents a case which, we think, should justly move us to grant the application. An order or judgment of disbarment is not necessarily final or conclusive for all time, and does not preclude the court, for good cause, from setting it aside and restoring the delinquent attorney. This has been established from an early date. In Rex v. Greenwood, (A. D. 1760) 1 W. Bl. 221, the report of the case is as follows: "Greenwood was an attorney of this court, and about two years ago was struck off the rolls for malpractice, and was now, upon humble petition and motion, readmitted; the court declaring that the striking off the roll was not to be understood as a perpetual disability, but was sometimes only meant as a punishment, and might be considered in the light of a suspension only, if the court sees cause." In an anonymous case (A. D. 1852) 17 Beav. 475, a solicitor had been disbarred for fraudulent misappropriation of moneys. Ten years afterwards, on the memorial of a number of solicitors, he was reinstated, the master of the rolls (Sir John Romilly) saying: "I have considered this case, and I have determined to restore this gentleman to the roll. Though he was very properly struck off, yet, considering the great length of time that has elapsed, and the great suffering that he has endured by reason of the order, considering the testimonials to his good behavior and conduct, and that the application is supported by so many solicitors of Birmingham who have certified to that effect, and the absence of any opposition on behalf of that most useful and intelligent body in London, the Law Institution, I have come to the conclusion that I shall best act by restoring this gentleman to the roll of solicitors." In Ex parte Pyke (A. D. 1865) 6 Best & S. 703, the court restored a disbarred attorney on the ground of good conduct for a long period after disbarment, saying, "Both on principle and precedent, sentences of exclusion from either branch of the profession need not necessarily be exclusions forever." No cases holding to the contrary view have come to our attention, nor do we find anything in the statute of this state to alter this rule. That statute merely regulates the procedure, and in no wise defines the effect of the order upon the powers of the court. That effect must be determined by the ordinary rules of law, which, as we have shown, authorize the court to mitigate the sentence upon a showing of good cause arising subsequently. We think, therefore, that upon the showing made, and the authorities above cited, the application should be granted. It is therefore ordered that the said W. B. Treadwell be, and he is hereby, restored as an attorney and counselor of this court, and that his name be reinstated upon the roll of attorneys thereof, and that he be entitled henceforth to practice in all the courts of this state.

PEOPLE v. KENNETT. (Cr. 161.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 13, 1896.)

HOMICIDE—SELF-DEFENSE—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction that "no man by his own lawless acts can create a necessity for acting in self-defense, and thereupon, killing the person with whom he seeks the difficulty, interpose the plea of self-defense. The plea of necessity is a shield for those only who are without fault in occasioning it and acting under it,"—is not erroneous, when immediately followed by the statement; "Undoubtedly the defendant can show in justification that, although he brought upon himself an imminent danger, he, in the presence of that necessity, changed his mind and conduct, and honestly endeavored to escape from it, but could not without striking the mortal blow. But, in the absence of such circumstances, when the defendant seeks and brings upon himself a difficulty with the deceased, in which he willingly continues until he involves himself in the necessity to kill, the law will not hold him guiltless. The right of self-defense which justifies a homicide does not include the right of attack." Garoutte, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

F. B. Kennett was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals. Affirmed.

Ben Goodrich, W. A. Harris, T. E. Gibbon, and W. H. Shinn, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

HENSHAW, J. The defendant, charged with murder and convicted of manslaughter, rests his appeal upon a single specification of error. He contends that the court erred in giving the following instruction: "In order to justify the homicide, the danger menacing the defendant must have been present, apparent, and imminent, and the killing must have been done under a well-founded belief that it was absolutely necessary for the defendant to kill the deceased, at that time, to save himself from great bodily harm. The apprehension of danger to life or limb which justifies a man for taking the life of another must be an honest one,—one that is well grounded,—and must arise out of a reasonable cause. But a cause which originates in the fault of the person himself—in a quarrel which he has provoked, or in a danger which he has voluntarily brought upon himself by his own misconduct—cannot be considered reasonable, or sufficient in law to support a well-grounded apprehension of imminent danger to his person. Error of apprehension the law overlooks when a man is called upon to act on appearances, but it does not overlook dishonesty of apprehension. Hence a real or apparent necessity, brought about by the design, contrivance or fault of the defendant, cannot be availed of as a defense for the commission of a crime. And no man by his own lawless acts can create a necessity for acting in self-defense, and thereupon, killing the person with whom he seeks the difficulty, interpose the plea of self-defense. The plea of necessity is a shield for those only who are without fault in occasioning it and acting under it. Undoubtedly the defendant can show in justification that, although he brought upon himself an imminent danger, he, in the presence of that necessity, changed his mind and conduct, and honestly endeavored to escape from it, but could not without striking the mortal blow. But, in the absence of such circumstances, when the defendant seeks and brings upon himself a difficulty with the deceased, in which he willingly continues until he involves himself in the necessity to kill, the law will not hold him guiltless. The right of self-defense which justifies a homicide does not include the right of attack." It is insisted that this instruction is, in legal intent, identical with that condemned in People v. Button, 106 Cal. 628, 39 Pac. 1073. In the Button Case the instruction under review was the following: "And no man by his own lawless acts can create a necessity for acting in self-defense, and then, upon killing the person with whom he seeks the difficulty, interpose the plea of self-defense, subject to the qualification next hereinafter set out. The plea of necessity is a shield for those only who are without fault in occasioning it and acting under it. The court instructs the jury that if you are satisfied that there was a quarrel between the defendant and deceased, in which the defendant was the aggressor, and first assaulted the deceased by means or force likely to produce, and actually producing, great bodily injury to the deceased, and that the defendant thereafter, in the same quarrel, fatally shot the deceased, then you must find the defendant guilty, subject to this qualification." The vice of this, as the opinion clearly demonstrates, lies in its failure to recognize that circumstances might arise whereunder one who was the first aggressor might slay his opponent, and still avail himself of the plea of self-defense, as after an honest withdrawal from the combat, which withdrawal was fairly made known to his adversary, who thereafter forced a new strife upon him. The qualification which the trial court gave to the instruction in the Button Case, as the opinion declares, was not made evident by the record. Counsel for the state nowhere directed the attention of the court to the matter. The statement in the opinion that no explanation or qualification could validate it had reference to any explanation not embracing the principle expounded. This is too plain to need amplification. Any other interpretation would result in the merest stultification of language. It would be equivalent to saying that this court had held that no qualification could cure the incomplete instruction, while in the next sentence it proceeds to set forth the very modification which, if read into the original instruction, would have made it a sound enunciation of the law. It is not to be supposed, in other words, that if the explanation which the court sets forth had been given with, and as a part of, the instruction in the Button Case, it would still have been held to be erroneous. But, as has been said, this court did not there have the qualification before it, and whether or not any particular qualification would have been sufficient to cure the imperfection could not have been, and was not, decided. In the instruction here under consideration, the part italicized is, in language, identical with that of the Button Case, but with this all-important difference: The court, in the next sentence, and in immediate connection with what it has said, proceeds to give the circumstances under which one who is the first aggressor may kill, and still be justified If a judge should say to a jury: "All contracts may rest in and be proved by parol. But there is this important qualification: Those required by the statute of frauds and perjuries to be in writing must be evidenced by a writing," etc.,—it would not be held permissible to consider the language piecemeal, and to say that the first sentence contains an incorrectible error. So, here, the general doctrine announced in the italicized portion is defective merely by reason of its incompleteness; but, when read with what immediately follows, the whole is a fair declaration of the principle. We do not mean by this to commend the instruction as a full exposition of the law, nor to invite its continued use by trial judges, but merely declare that in and of itself it contains no error. It may be open to some criticism for lack of clearness, and for a failure fully to expound the principles governing the right of self-defense, which will be found set forth at length in People v. Hecker, 109 Cal. 451, 42 Pac. 307; but, while it may thus fail in completeness, in so far as it goes it lays down no erroneous doctrine. The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; HARRISON, J.; VAN FLEET, J.; TEMPLE, J.; McFARLAND, J.

GAROUTTE, J. I am compelled to dissent from the views of the majority of the court. No substantial difference is found, when this instruction is compared with the respective instructions given in People v. Button, 106 Cal. 628, 39 Pac. 1073, and People v. Conkling, 44 Pac. 314; and a new trial was ordered in those cases, after a thorough consideration and discussion, for the reason that the law therein contained was bad. As was said in People v. Button, the principle of law there declared was radically wrong,—so wrong that qualification and explanation could not validate it; and the instruction here under consideration is so wrong and so unsound in so many ways as to place it beyond all help by qualification. There can be no qualification of it, and what is here termed by the court a qualification in no way qualifies, but is a contradiction, pure and simple. Contradictory instructions being given to the jury, one containing good law and the other bad law, the cause must be reversed; for it is not for this court to say that the jury, in making up its verdict, acted upon one rather than the other. This principle is well settled and elementary. Let us dwell for a moment upon this instruction. Among other things, the judge said to the jury: "The apprehension of danger to life and limb, which justifies a man for taking the life of another, must arise from a cause which does not originate in the fault of the person himself, as in a quarrel which he has provoked." This statement is not a sound expression of the law. The judge further said: "Hence a real or apparent necessity, brought about by the design, contrivance, or fault of the defendant, cannot be availed of as a defense for the commission of a crime." As to the word "fault," as here used, the law is unsound. Again, the judge says: "And no man by his own lawless acts can create a necessity for acting in self-defense, and thereupon, killing the person with whom he seeks the difficulty, interpose a plea of self-defense." This statement is wrong in law, as the cases I have previously cited fully show. Again the judge says: "The plea of necessity is a shield for those only who are without fault in occasioning it and acting under it." This statement is but a repetition of what goes before, and is legally unsound, from any angle at which it may be viewed. The material part of the qualification which it is held validates the entire instruction is as follows: "Undoubtedly the defendant can show in justification that, although he brought upon himself an imminent danger, he, in the presence of that necessity, changed his mind and conduct, and honestly endeavored to escape from it, but could not without striking the mortal blow." It is apparent that the word "necessity" should be read "danger." This instruction is no qualification of the other one. It is absolutely contradictory of it. No single statement of the first instruction can be true, if the so-called qualification be true. It is impossible for both to stand. One must go down. A qualification is not a contradiction, but a limitation or modification. And here, if the second statement made by the judge be true as a sound principle of law, the first must be untrue. With equal consistency and definiteness the judge could have said to the jury: "All men are white, undoubtedly some men are black." These instructions are diametrically opposed to each other at all points, and it would be a guess upon the part of this court for it to say that the jury were guided in their deliberations by the law as embodied in the "qualification," rather than by the law given looking in the opposite direction. Indeed, it may be said that the instruction, including the "qualification," could only serve the single purpose of confusing the minds of the jurors, and, instead of affording them light as to the law, left them groping in absolute and confusing darkness.

FINKELDEY v. OMNIBUS CABLE CO.

(S. F. 170.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 14, 1896.)

Boarding Moving Street Car—Negligence—Contributory Negligence.

1. For one to attempt to board a street car, the speed of which has merely been slackened in response to his signal that he wished to get on, cannot, in the absence of exceptional circumstances, be declared negligence, as matter of law; and that though the attempt is to get on the front platform, especially where there is a rule of the road that persons smoking should ride thereon, and the person attempting to get on is smoking at the time.

2. Nor can it be declared negligence, as matter of law, for the driver of a street car to merely slacken its speed for one to get on, especially where the person, without indicating any desire that it be stopped, attempts to board it while it is in motion.

3. Whether failure to put guards in front of the wheels of a street car, as required by an ordinance, is negligence, and, if so, whether the absence thereof was the cause of injury to one who, trying to get on the front platform while the car was moving, missed his footing, and got his foot under the wheel, while holding with both hands on the railings, are questions for the jury.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Finkeldey against the Omnibus Cable Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. Morganthal, for appellant. Lloyd & Wood, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff was injured in attempting to board a car of the defendant at the corner of San Bruno road and Army street, in San Francisco, and brought this action to recover damages therefor, alleging that the injury was caused through the negligence of the defendant "in failing to bring said car to a full and sufficient stop at the time plaintiff was boarding said car for the purpose aforesaid, and in failing to provide said car with guards as required by law." The circumstances connected with the injury are detailed in his testimony as follows: "When the car came along, and was about thirty feet away from me, I held up my hand for the driver to stop. He came along at a trot. I was facing east. The car was coming from the north, going south. I was smoking a cigar at the time. It is the rule to ride on the front platform when you are smoking. The driver did not stop. He slackened up somewhat for me to step on. I went up to the car, trying to get on the front platform. I took hold of the rails, one hand on each, and tried to step on the platform. I missed my footing, but kept hold with both hands on the railing. My left foot got under the wheel. I kept holding on to the rails till the car stopped, when I stepped on the platform. I rode as far as to the next switch, where we met the car coming back, and I stepped off this car on to the car coming back, and went home. When I stepped off the first car I wondered how my foot got under the wheel, and I noticed that the car had no guards around the wheels." At the close of the plaintiff's case the defendant moved for a nonsuit, upon the grounds (1) "that no evidence had been introduced showing, or tending to show, that the defendant was negligent in any way; (2) that the evidence introduced conclusively showed that the plaintiff was negligent himself, by attempting to get upon a moving car." The motion was granted, and from the judgment thereon, and an order denying a new trial, the plaintiff has appealed.

It cannot be said, as a proposition of law, that the act of attempting to board a street car while it is in motion is of itself negligence. Whether such act is negligent must depend upon the particular circumstances under which it is done. It is a matter of common observation that persons do every day get on and off from street cars while they are in motion, under circumstances that would not, in the estimation of any reasonable man, be considered negligent. The question depends greatly upon the situation of the street at which the act is attempted, as well as upon the speed with which the car is moving. While it might be negligent to attempt to get upon a car moving rapidly down a street of heavy grade, it would not be so regarded if the car was moving slowly up the grade. Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 146; Booth, St. Ry. Law, § 336; Eppendorf v. Railroad Co., 69 N. Y. 195; Morrison v. Railroad Co., 130 N. Y. 166, 29 N. E. 105; McDonough v. Railroad Co., 137 Mass. 210; Briggs v. Railway Co., 148 Mass. 72, 19 N. E. 19; Schepérs v. Railroad Co., 126 Mo. 665, 29 S. W. 712; Carr v. Railroad Co., 98 Cal. 366, 33 Pac. 213; Sahlgaard v. Railway Co., 48 Minn. 232, 51 N. W. 111; Railway Co. v. Williams, 140 Ill. 275, 29 N. E. 672. There may be cases in which other facts or circumstances render the act of the person negligent,—as, for instance, if he is lame or infirm, or is burdened with packages, or impeded by others so as to be deprived of the use of his limbs,—and the court might be justified in determining his negligence upon his own statement of these circumstances; but if the person is in the possession of physical vigor, and free from any hindrance, the question of negligence is one of fact, to be determined by a jury. In the present case, however, there were no exceptional circumstances which would authorize the court to say, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff was negligent. He had signaled the driver that he wished to board the car, and in response thereto the driver had slackened the speed of his horses. The speed at which the car was moving when he attempted to get on is not shown, but the slackening of the speed in response to his signal was an invitation from the driver for him to board the car. Ganiard v. Railroad Co., 50 Hun, 22, 2 N. Y. Supp. 470. The attempt to get upon the front platform was a circumstance to be considered in determining whether he was negligent, but it was not conclusive of the fact. He was at the time smoking a cigar, and it was shown that it was a rule of the defendant that a person smoking should ride upon the front platform. This might be regarded as a reason why the plaintiff attempted to get upon that platform, and was also a circumstance to be considered in determining the question of negligence.

Neither could the court say, as matter of law, whether the defendant was guilty of negligence by reason of not bringing the car to a full stop before the plaintiff attempted to board it. The same considerations by which the attempt of the plaintiff to get upon the car while it was in motion is held not to be in itself negligent show that the failure of the defendant to stop the car was not in itself an act of negligence. This is clearly indicated by the daily custom of drivers upon street cars to merely slacken the speed of their cars in order to take on passengers, without any injury resulting therefrom. Especially would the driver be freed from the charge of negligence in not stopping the car if the passenger, without indicating any desire that the car should stop, attempts to board it while it is in motion. Moylan v. Railroad Co., 128 N. Y. 583, 27 N. E. 977. There was no evidence that the defendant was negligent in the running of its car after the plaintiff made this attempt, or that the injury to the plaintiff was caused by any change in the speed of the car. On the contrary, it was shown that before the plaintiff got upon the platform the car came to a full stop.

It is alleged in the complaint that there was an ordinance of the city requiring railroad companies operating street cars to have guards upon their cars, by which persons may be protected from getting under the wheels of the car; and it was shown at the trial that the car in question had no protecting guards, as required by the ordinance. Whether the defendant was negligent in not having guards upon the car, as well as whether the absence of guards was the cause of injury to the plaintiff, was to be determined upon a consideration of all the facts connected with the injury, and the inferences that might be drawn therefrom. The court could not determine either of these propositions as a matter of law, and should not have withdrawn their consideration from the jury. If the neglect of the defendant to provide its car with guards was the direct cause of the injury to the plaintiff, without which he would not have been injured, the plaintiff's failure to step upon the platform did not of itself relieve the defendant from liability. While he might not have been injured if he had once firmly stepped upon the platform, yet the court should have left to the jury to determine whether his failure to do so contributed to his injury. The jury might have found that, although the plaintiff had failed to step upon the platform, he would not have received the injury if there had been guards in front of the wheels. The relative positions of the step and the wheel were an element to be considered by the jury in determining this issue. If the step was directly in front of the wheel, so that a failure to reach it would bring the plaintiff's foot directly under the wheel, the necessity for guards would be greater than if the wheel was remote from the step. If the jury should find that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to board the car while it was in motion, and that the injury would not have resulted had the car been provided with suitable guards, and should also find that the defendant was negligent in failing to provide such guards, it would follow that his failure to get upon the step was disconnected with the cause of the injury. While it may be conceded that, if the plaintiff, at the time of attempting to board the car, was fully aware that there were no guards to the wheels, he assumed the risk from any injury resulting therefrom, it was nevertheless for the jury to determine the extent of his knowledge upon this point, and whether, in view thereof, he was guilty of negligence. Smith v. Steamship Co., 99 Cal. 462, 34 Pac. 84. Whether negligence existed in either party, or whether any negligence of the plaintiff contributed to his injury, as well as whether the injury he received was owing to any negligence of the defendant, irrespective of his own negligence, were questions that should have been submitted to the jury. The judgment and order are reversed.

ROBINSON v. TEMPLAR LODGE NO. 17, I. O. O. F., OF CALIFORNIA.

(S. F. 488.)

Appeal — Dismissal — Filing Undertaking and Notice of Appeal.

1. Appeal will be dismissed, the undertaking thereon not having been filed within five days after service of notice of appeal, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 940.

2. The undertaking on appeal, required by Code Civ. Proc. § 940, to be filed within five days after service of notice of appeal, may be filed on the sixth day, the fifth day being Sunday.

3. Code Civ. Proc. § 940, requiring the undertaking on appeal to be filed within five days after service of notice of appeal, does not require the notice of appeal to be filed within that time.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Thomas B. Robinson against the Templar Lodge No. 17, I. O. O. F., of California. Motions by defendant to dismiss appeals by plaintiff. Granted as to one appeal. Denied as to the other.

Geo. D. Collins, for appellant. Davis Louderback, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The motion of respondent to dismiss the appeal, notice of which was served and filed in the superior court on the 5th day of November, 1895, upon the ground that no undertaking on said appeal was ever filed, is granted; and said appeal is dismissed, without prejudice to another appeal.

Respondent has also made a motion to dismiss the appeal, the notice of which appears on page 127 of the printed transcript, upon the grounds that the notice was served on December 31, 1895, and that neither the motion nor the undertaking was filed until January 6, 1896. These grounds are not tenable. The notice of appeal may be served before filing, and the Code does not prescribe any particular time after service within which it must be filed (Noonan v. Nunan, 76 Cal. 44, 18 Pac. 98; Galloway v. Rouse, 63 Cal. 280; Boyd v. Burrel, 60 Cal. 280; Code Civ. Proc. § 940); but the undertaking must be filed within five days after the service of the notice of appeal. In this case the service was on December 31, 1895. The 5th day of January, 1896, was Sunday, and thus appellant had until the 6th of January to file his undertaking. The said motion to dismiss said second appeal, the notice of which appears on page 127 of the transcript, is denied.

PLEASANT v. SAMUELS. (S. F. 284.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 14, 1896.)

Pleading—Common Count—Allegation of Time—Limitations—Demurrer.

1. The common counts may be used to state a cause of action, notwithstanding the Code provision that a complaint must state the facts constituting the cause of action in ordinary and concise language.

2. A count alleging indebtedness of defendant to plaintiff in a certain amount on account of moneys paid, laid out, expended, loaned, and advanced to and for defendant, at his request, by plaintiff, need not specify any time, nor set forth the items of the account, though a bill of particulars may be demanded, under Code Civ. Proc. § 454.

3. A complaint resting on the fact that plaintiff was compelled to and did take up and pay notes which he had made for defendant's accommodation is not demurrable on the ground that the action is barred, the complaint not showing when plaintiff made the payments.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Pleasant against David Samuels. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

N. Hamilton and R. M. F. Soto, for appellant. Naphtaly, Friedenrich & Ackerman, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was commenced June 3, 1895, and the complaint contains two counts or causes of action, separately stated. The first count alleges that defendant is indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $32,364.06 on account of moneys heretofore, at the special instance and request of defendant, paid, laid out, expended, loaned, and advanced to and for the defendant by the plaintiff, and that the defendant had not paid to plaintiff any part or portion of said sum. The second count alleges that plaintiff executed to defendant, at his special instance and request, and for his accommodation, without any consideration therefor, 32 promissory notes, the date, amount, and maturity of each of said notes being stated. The first note became due and payable on May 17, 1885, and the last on September 7, 1888, and the aggregate amount of principal due on all the notes was $32,364.06. It is further alleged that "after the execution by the plaintiff to the defendant of the said notes hereinbefore referred to, and before the maturity thereof, the defendant indorsed each one of them, and, as so indorsed, delivered the same to other parties, who, as plaintiff is informed and verily believes, acquired title thereto in good faith, for value and without notice. Subsequently, the plaintiff took up each of said notes, and paid the amount of principal and interest thereon to the holder thereof"; and that defendant had not paid to plaintiff any part of the money so paid by her on said notes. The defendant demurred to the first cause of action set up upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and upon the further ground that it was ambiguous, unintelligible, and uncertain in certain respects named; and to the second cause of action upon the ground that it is barred by subdivision 1 of section 339, and by section 337, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court below sustained the demurrer, and, the plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was entered that she take nothing by her action. From that judgment, this appeal is prosecuted.

1. The objection that the common counts are inconsistent with the provision of the Code that a complaint must state the facts constituting the cause of action in ordinary and concise language, and are therefore insufficient, is not tenable. It was held in this state at an early day, and has since been repeatedly held, that the common counts may be used to state a cause of action, notwithstanding the provision referred to, which was found in the old statutes, and was adopted into the Code. Freeborn v. Glazer, 10 Cal. 337; Abadie v. Carrillo, 32 Cal. 172; Farwell v. Murray, 104 Cal. 464, 38 Pac. 199. And this rule has been recognized and acted upon in most of the states where the Code practice has been adopted. Allen v. Patterson, 7 N. Y. 476; Cudlipp v. Whipple, 4 Duer, 610; Grannis v. Hooker, 29 Wis. 65; Ball v. Fulton Co., 31 Ark. 379; Pom. Code Rem. §§ 542, 543. The first count was therefore not subject to a general demurrer. Was it then ambiguous, unintelligible, or uncertain in any material respect? It was not necessary to state when the plaintiff paid, laid out, expended, loaned, or advanced to and for the defendant the moneys sued for, or when defendant became indebted to plaintiff therefor, or when defendant requested plaintiff to make such payments, expenditures, loans, or advancements. Nor was it necessary to set forth the items of the account. The statute expressly provides that the items of an account need not be set forth in a pleading, but a bill of particulars must be furnished on demand. Code Civ. Proc. § 454. If, therefore, the defendant desired more particular information as to the account, he should have resorted to the remedy provided for by the statute, and not to a demurrer. Wise v. Hogan, 77 Cal. 184, 19 Pac. 278; Burns v. Cushing, 96 Cal. 669, 31 Pac. 1124; Rogers v. Duff, 97 Cal. 66, 31 Pac. 836; Farwell v. Murray, 104 Cal. 464, 38 Pac. 199.

2. As to the second count: The rule is settled beyond controversy that the defense of the statute of limitations cannot be raised by demurrer, unless it clearly and affirmatively appears on the face of the complaint that the cause of action is barred. If it does not so appear, the defense must be raised by answer. Harmon v. Page, 62 Cal. 448; Wise v. Williams, 72 Cal. 544, 14 Pac. 204; Doe v. Sanger, 78 Cal. 150, 20 Pac. 366; Kraner v. Halsey, 82 Cal. 209, 22 Pac. 1137; Curtiss v. Insurance Co., 90 Cal. 245, 27 Pac. 211. Where an action is brought upon a promissory note by the payee or an indorsee against the maker, and it appears that the note had matured more than four years before the commencement of the suit, the defense of the statute of limitations may be set up by demurrer. In such a case the complaint shows the exact time at which the cause of action arose, and, if it appears upon the face of the complaint that the statutory period of limitation has elapsed before the commencement of the action, the plaintiff, if he desires to escape the bar of the statute, must allege some fact which has prevented the running of said statute. This has been held a number of times by this court, particularly in Smith v. Richmond, 19 Cal. 476, where it was held that, when a new promise is relied upon, it must be alleged, and in Bass v. Berry, 51 Cal. 264, where it was said: "The action being founded upon an instrument in writing, executed out of the state, the statutory bar of two years presumptively applies. If the plaintiff's case could be relieved in this respect by the fact of the absence of the defendant from the state, that fact should have been averred in the complaint." But, where the defense of the statute does not clearly appear upon the face of the complaint, it must be pleaded by answer. In such a case it is not enough to say that the statute might have run. As was said by this court in Kraner v. Halsey, 82 Cal. 211, 22 Pac. 1138: "A court is not allowed to speculate on what might have happened, or what might not have occurred in view of the averments of the complaint." In Wise v. Hogan, 77 Cal. 187, 19 Pac. 279, the court, speaking on the same subject with respect to what the complaint would show, says: "The fact that it did not show whether it was or was not barred would not defeat a recovery." And in Doe v. Sanger, 78 Cal. 151, 20 Pac. 366, the court, discussing the matter of setting up the plea of the statute of limitations by demurrer, say: "The fact that a cause of action, as set out in the complaint, does not show on its face whether or not it is barred by the statute of limitations, would not defeat a recovery. It could only be determined on the trial of the case whether the whole or any part of the damages claimed was barred by the statute. Unless it appears upon the face of the complaint that the cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations, that objection cannot be raised by demurrer." And in Curtiss v. Insurance Co., 90 Cal. 245, 27 Pac. 212, the court say: "The question is as to a rule of pleading, and we do not understand that a complaint showing money to have been loaned at a date sufficiently remote to admit of the running of the statute raises the presumption that it has run." In the case at bar the action is not brought upon a promissory note to recover against the maker upon the promise which he has made in such note. The cause of action rests upon the fact that the plaintiff was compelled to take up and pay, and did take up and pay, notes which she herself had made for the accommodation of the defendant. The cause of action arose at the time when the plaintiff made such payments of money for the benefit of defendant; and it does not appear, nor is it necessary for it to appear, upon the face of the complaint when said payments were made. Therefore they may have been made within the statutory period. It is no valid objection to this view to say that, if the holders of said notes had brought suits against plaintiff at the time this present suit was commenced, such actions would apparently have been barred by the statute. Such actions may have been commenced before such notes were barred; and, for this and other reasons that might easily be suggested, the plaintiff here may have rightfully paid and taken up said notes at a time which would have prevented the statute of limitations from barring this present action. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

WALLACE et al. v. SISSON et al. (S. F. 204.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 14, 1896.)

SECOND APPEAL—LAW OF THE CASE—QUESTIONS OF FACT.

The principle of the law of the case on a second trial does not apply to determinations of fact on conflicting competent evidence, especially where there is additional, though cumulative, evidence.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Emiline Wallace and another against Joseph H. Sisson and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

A. N. Drown (D. M. Delmas, of counsel), for appellants. Mastick, Belcher & Mastick, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. Upon a former trial of this cause, the court made findings of fact, and rendered judgment thereon in favor of the defendants. This judgment and an order denying the plaintiffs' motion for a new trial were subsequently reversed by this court, upon the ground that certain findings of fact were not justified by the evidence. 33 Pac. 496. Upon the second trial of the cause, the court made similar findings of fact, and again rendered judgment in favor of the defendants. From this judgment, and an order denying a new trial, the plaintiffs have appealed. It was contended by the plaintiffs at the trial, and is also contended by them here, that the evidence is substantially the same as upon the former trial, and that the former decision of this court that this evidence was insufficient to justify the findings then under consideration became the law of the case, and that the trial court was thereby precluded from making the present findings, although its own judgment concerning the effect of this evidence might be contrary to the decision of this court. Both of these propositions are controverted by the defendants.

An unbroken line of decisions, commencing with Dewey v. Gray, 2 Cal. 374, has established the rule in this state that a decision of this court upon any question of law in a case appealed to it from an inferior court becomes thereby the law of that case, and is thereafter, in all subsequent stages of the case, binding, not only upon the inferior court, but also upon this court if again brought before it. It has never been held, however, that the decision of this court upon a question of fact is subject to this rule. On the contrary, it has been frequently said that the rule is limited to questions of law, and is not applicable to questions of fact. In Sneed v. Osborn, 25 Cal. 629, it was said: "It is upon questions of law that the decision of the appellate court becomes the law of the case, and not upon questions of fact." Although the law of the case was not then the issue in dispute, the expression was made in response to a petition for rehearing suggesting that the statement by the court of the facts established by the evidence would be so regarded upon another trial, and is entitled to the respect due to the opinion of a court deliberately given upon a point directly presented. In Mitchell v. Davis, 23 Cal. 384, the court had said that cases in which the rule had been applied show that it applies only to principles of law announced in a case, and not to mere questions of fact which may have been passed upon, and also, with reference to the proposition here contended for by the appellants: "If no further evidence had been introduced by the plaintiff on the second trial upon this point, there might have been some grounds for saying that the question had been put at rest by the former adjudication,"—thus pointedly showing that the former decision was not conclusive. In McLeran v. Benton, 73 Cal. 337, 14 Pac. 879, it was held that the rule could not be invoked where the evidence was introduced for a different purpose from that for which it was presented at the previous trial. And in Nieto's Heirs v. Carpenter, 21 Cal. 483, it was held that the rule did not apply in a case in which an incorrect translation of a Spanish document was the basis of the former decision. In Benson v. Shotwell, 103 Cal. 163, 37 Pac. 147, the court said: "The facts disclosed by the record upon this appeal are in substance the same as those which were before the court on the former appeal; and the propositions of law there decided are therefore the law of this case, and we are not at liberty to reconsider them. It is true that nothing that was said in that opinion as to the facts could bind the court, upon the second trial, nor be conclusive now, since the rule of the law of the case has no application to questions of fact." And in People v. Hamilton, 103 Cal. 496, 37 Pac. 630, the court said: "This rule does not apply * * * to questions of fact." In Mattingly v. Pennie, 105 Cal. 514, 39 Pac. 201, the court said: "It is settled beyond controversy that a decision of this court on appeal as to a question of fact does not become the law of the case." It frequently happens that the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision depends upon the competency of the evidence, or the effect of an act or admission, or the construction to be given to a written instrument. If, in such a case, the appellate court holds that the evidence was incompetent, or received an erroneous construction by the trial court, and that for this reason the evidence was insufficient to justify the decision, such ruling of the appellate court becomes the law of the case, since the sufficiency of the evidence depends upon the question of law which is thus decided. See Leese v. Clark, 20 Cal. 387. But, when the fact which is to be decided depends upon the credit to be given to the witnesses whose testimony is received, or the weight to which their testimony is entitled, or the inferences of fact that are to be drawn from the evidence, the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision must be determined by the tribunal before which it is presented, and is not controlled by an opinion of the appellate court that similar evidence at a former trial of the cause was insufficient to justify a similar decision. This results from the relative functions of the trial court and the appellate court, the former alone being authorized to determine questions of fact, and the latter being limited to determining questions of law. The appellate court cannot itself make a finding of fact when the evidence is all before it, or find the ultimate fact from other probative facts, unless such ultimate fact follows as a conclusion of law therefrom; and if, in the opinion which it renders, it assumes that the evidence sustains any fact, it is only the opinion of the court, and not a finding of that fact. Kimball v. Semple, 25 Cal. 455. "We do not pass upon the weight or preponderance of evidence, nor in a case where opposing inferences may be drawn can we review a finding because, in our judgment, the inference deduced by the trial court is improbable, or more unlikely to be true than the opposite one." Reynolds v. Robinson, 82 N. Y. 106.

Whether the evidence in a case tends to prove a fact is a question of law which arises when the admissibility of such evidence is questioned, or when it is relied upon for the purpose of establishing a controverted fact; and the decision of the appellate court that such evidence does or does not tend to establish the fact is a decision upon a question of law which is conclusive upon the trial court; but whether the evidence is sufficient to establish the fact is a question of fact, which must be determined by the tribunal to which it is submitted. A declaration by the appellate court that it does establish the fact would be outside of its functions, and would not be binding upon the trial court. So, too, whether a particular inference can under any circumstances be drawn from certain evidence is a question of law; but whether the inference shall in any particular case be drawn from the evidence is a question of fact. "An inference is a deduction which the reason of the jury makes from the facts proved, without an express direction of law to that effect." Code Civ. Proc. § 1958. Whether there is any evidence in support of a finding, or whether there is a conflict of evidence upon a controverted fact, must be determined by the appellate court when presented to it upon an examination of the record. This includes the right to determine whether any of the evidence tends to support the decision, since that is a question of law; and, if it determines that it has no such tendency, that evidence is excluded from consideration. If, upon an examination of the record, the appellate court determines that there is no evidence in support of the decision, it reverses the judgment, for the reason that the court committed an error of law in finding a fact without any evidence in support thereof. Domico v. Casassa, 101 Cal. 411, 35 Pac. 1024; Mason v. Lord, 40 N. Y. 484. "When there is a total want of evidence upon some essential fact, but the jury nevertheless finds such fact, the finding is erroneous as matter of law; but, when there is slight evidence in support thereof, a finding thereon would be one of fact, upon which men might differ in opinion. But for a court to attempt the correction thereof upon writ of error would be but a correction of errors in fact, and not in law,—a power which this court does not possess." Conely v. McDonald, 40 Mich. 159.

A comparison of the opinion rendered upon the former appeal herein with the record upon the present appeal shows that, in making its decision upon the evidence before it, the superior court did not disregard the decision of this court upon any question of law determined by it upon the former appeal. Indeed, upon that appeal the decision of this court was in the main in reference to questions of fact, rather than questions of law. The question chiefly discussed in the opinion, and which is termed by the appellants the pivotal question of the case, was whether there was any contract relating to Chinamen between Sisson, Wallace & Co. and the railroad and construction companies, or whether Sisson, Wallace & Co. had any contract right by virtue of the arrangement made with Koopmanschap for bringing the Chinamen to San Francisco. The statement in the opinion "that a written contract was made between one of the construction companies, Koopmanschap, and Sisson, Wallace & Company concerning such importation is clear, though such written contract was not produced on the trial, nor shown to be then in existence"; and the expression in the opinion, after giving the evidence in support of the above statement, and that Douty's testimony was corroborated by the Haswell letter, that "it is inconceivable that he [Douty] would direct the agent of the steamship company to draw drafts upon Sisson, Wallace & Company for each of the two contemplated shipments, amounting to $40,000 each, without a contract right so to do," can neither of them be considered as a decision upon a question of law, but, at most, only an inference of fact drawn from the other evidence in the case. So, also, the statement in the opinion, while commenting upon the testimony of Horn: "While he is clearly in error in some particulars, and inconsistent in others, it is apparent that he had a knowledge of facts that he could not have known unless he had seen such a contract, or learned them in some manner in Sisson, Wallace & Company's office, and, if the firm and its other employés had no knowledge of such contract or agreement, he could not well have learned it from them;" and the subsequent statement in reference to the testimony of other witnesses, that "a careful reading of the testimony, however, will show that these witnesses also testified to conclusions, rather than to the facts which constituted the terms of the contract," and that "these denials are not sufficient, in view of the whole evidence, to create a doubt that there was a contract or agreement for the importation of these Chinamen, to which Sisson, Wallace & Company was a party,"—are in reality only propositions of fact proper to be considered by a trial court, but can in no wise be regarded as decisions upon questions of law. It was for the reason that in the opinion of this court the trial court had erroneously decided these questions of fact that its decision was reversed, but this court did not assume to direct that court how it should again decide the questions. And, as we have seen above, that court, when the questions should again be presented to it for decision, was authorized and required to exercise its own judgment in determining the facts which were justified by the evidence. If the evidence had been identical with that given at the former trial, and the trial court had still been of the opinion that it justified the former findings, it would not be precluded from so finding merely because this court had reversed its former decision. This court might again reverse the decision, but, before doing so, would consider whether it might not be that that portion of the evidence which could not be reproduced in printed form—the demeanor of the witnesses, as well as their credibility, the weight to be given to contradictory testimony, the inferences to be drawn from different portions of the evidence—was such as to support the conclusion of the trial court. If it should appear to this court that it was possible for the trial court, under these considerations of the evidence, to so decide the issues, it might deem it its duty to yield to that court, even though the decision were contrary to its own opinion, since the trial court is the ultimate arbiter upon all questions of fact.

The "evidence" from which a fact is to be determined does not consist merely of the language used by the witnesses. It includes their appearance and demeanor on the witness stand, the manner in which their testimony is given, the credit to which they are entitled, the opportunity for knowing the matters of which they give testimony, the strength and clearness of their recollection of the transaction, the inferences of fact which may be drawn from the testimony which they give, or from other evidence in the case, the harmony of one portion of the testimony with another. The consideration of these elements is peculiarly within the province of the trial court, and, whenever the decision of a fact depends thereon in whole or in part, the appellate court cannot prescribe the mode in which the decision shall be made, or, by any opinion of its own upon the effect of the evidence, take from the trial court the power of determining the sufficiency of the evidence to establish a fact. There was, morever, at the last trial, additional evidence before the trial court which was not before this court upon the former appeal; and even if it be conceded, as is claimed by the appellants, that this evidence was cumulative, still it was not for that reason to be disregarded. For the purpose of establishing that there had been no contract of the character claimed by the plaintiffs, several witnesses had given their testimony, to the effect that they had no knowledge of such contract. While mere negative testimony of this character is not conclusive, the strength of the proof varies according to the number of witnesses who may have had knowledge of the existence of the contract. While, of 10 persons connected with a transaction, the testimony of one that he had no knowledge of a certain act claimed to have been a part of the transaction would not be conclusive, the testimony of each of the 10 to the same effect would be convincing; and, upon the same principle, the testimony of each additional witness strengthens the proof of the fact. In the present case the testimony of C. F. Crocker, and of Burke and other witnesses, to the effect that they knew nothing of the contract, although their position was such that, if there had been a contract, they would have been likely to know of it, strengthens the defense upon that issue, and presented evidence to the trial court from which to make its finding that was not before this court upon the former appeal.

The issues before the trial court were questions of fact, which were to be determined by that court upon a consideration of evidence that was in many particulars in direct conflict, and in others depending upon the memory of the witnesses as to transactions and conversations that had occurred many years prior thereto. This involved, among other considerations, the balancing of these conflicting statements, the weight to be given to the testimony of the different witnesses, as well as the credibility of the witnesses themselves, the probability of the accuracy of their statements, depending upon the clearness of their recollection, the interest they might have in the result, the attention given by them to the transactions or the conversations at the time they took place. All of these considerations are peculiarly within the function of the trial court, and its decision thereon ought not to be lightly disregarded. A careful examination of the record herein fails to show that the evidence before the superior court was insufficient to justify its decision. The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; TEMPLE, J.

GAROUTTE, J. (concurring). I think the principle of the law of the case cannot be invoked here, for the reason that the evidence contained in the present record is not the same as that presented to this court upon the former appeal. I concur in affirming the order and judgment for this reason.

PEOPLE v. ROEMER. (Cr. 149.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 14, 1896.)

HOMICIDE—SELF-DEFENSE—INSTRUCTION—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

1. Where defendant in a homicide case is asked on direct examination if he had ever been charged with killing anybody, and answers "No," he may, on cross-examination, after proper foundation laid, be asked whether he had not stated that he had been accused of the murder of a man, but that they could not prove it against him.

2. A requested instruction on self-defense, commencing, "If you believe the defendant, at the time of the killing, had a reasonable apprehension and belief that deceased was about to execute his threat to kill him," is erroneous, as declaring as a fact that deceased had threatened to kill defendant.

Garoutte, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

Frank Roemer appeals from a conviction of murder in the second degree. Affirmed.

J. C. Rives, Johnston Jones, and N. Newby, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

HENSHAW, J. The defendant, charged with murder, and convicted of murder in the second degree, presents these appeals from the judgment and from the order denying him a new trial. The killing was admitted, and the plea was self-defense.

1. It is first claimed that the verdict is against the evidence. But without detailing the accounts of the different witnesses, which could serve no useful purpose, a critical examination of the record shows that the evidence is ample to sustain the verdict. The testimony for the defense raises, as is not unusual, a sharp conflict; but in such cases, under the well-settled rule, the jury is the final arbiter of the facts, and its determination cannot here be disturbed.

2. Defendant, upon direct examination, was asked by his counsel if he had ever been charged with killing anybody, and answered that he had not. Upon cross-examination he was asked, after the proper foundation had been laid, whether he had not stated that he had been accused of the murder of a man, but that they could not prove it against him. The question was not permissible, generally, upon cross-examination. But in this case the defendant had opened the door and invited the inquiry by his own testimony, and it became permissible to refute that testimony by direct evidence to the contrary, or to impeach it by showing contrary declarations made by him. Code Civ. Proc. § 2052.

3. Defendant proposed the following instruction, which was refused by the judge as having been given before: "If you believe that the defendant at the time of the killing had a reasonable apprehension and belief that deceased was about to execute his threat to kill him, and that it was necessary for the protection of his own life that he should kill deceased, though defendant had resolved to kill deceased before the fatal shot was fired, the killing was not murder, and your verdict should be, 'Not guilty.'" The law of self-defense had been adequately set forth. Aside from other objections to the proposed instruction, it is erroneous in declaring as a fact that deceased had threatened to kill defendant.

4. The court gave an instruction identical in language with that considered in People v. Kennett (Cr. 161; filed Aug. 13, 1896) 45 Pac. 994. This was not error. The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HIGGINS. (Cr. 174.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 18, 1896.)

CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL BY PEOPLE.

The people cannot appeal from an order setting aside an information; this not being one of the cases enumerated in Pen. Code, § 1238, authorizing appeals by the people.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Edward A. Belcher, Judge.

Information against J. F. Higgins was set aside on his motion, and the people appeal. Dismissed.

Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People. Joseph Hutchinson, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal taken by the people from an order of the superior court setting aside the information upon motion of the defendant. The appeal cannot be entertained. While the objection is not made by respondent, the appeal is one of which we have not jurisdiction, since the instance is not one in which the people are authorized to appeal. Pen. Code, § 1238; People v. Richter, 45 Pac. 811 (filed July 24, 1896). Appeal dismissed.

FINGER v. McCAUGHEY. (L. A. 178.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 18, 1896.)

INTEREST—CONTRACT—COMPOUND INTEREST.

1. A contract for interest at 10 per cent. per annum, provided the note is paid at maturity, but, if not then paid, interest to be at 12 per cent. from date of note, is a proper contract for interest, the increase not being a penalty.

2. A provision in a note that, if interest is not paid at the end of a year from date, it shall become a part of the principal and bear interest, authorizes the compounding only of the interest accruing at the end of the first year.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; W. B. Cope, Judge.

Action by H. J. Finger against Susan McCaughey, administratrix of George McCaughey, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Modified.

W. S. Day and Thomas McNulty, for appellant. A. E. Putnam, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Foreclosure of a mortgage made by George McCaughey on June 6, 1889, to secure his note of same date in plaintiff's favor for the principal sum of $500, payable February 6, 1890, which note contained a clause respecting interest as follows: "With interest from date at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, provided this note is paid at maturity, but, if not paid at maturity, then it shall bear interest at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum from its date until paid, and, if the interest is not paid at the end of one year from date, it shall become a part of the principal, and bear twelve per cent. interest per annum." George McCaughey died on March 1, 1890, and the defendant became his administratrix. The demand of plaintiff, founded on said note and mortgage, was duly allowed as a claim against the estate of said deceased "for the sum of $500, and the interest due or to become due thereon, at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum." Judgment of foreclosure and sale was rendered March 11, 1895; the court declaring that there was then due to plaintiff, as principal and interest of his debt, the sum of $783.10. In ascertaining this amount the interest was compounded at 12 per cent. per year from date of the note, with annual rests, giving credit for a payment of $150 made October 18, 1893. Defendant made no contest in the court below. Appellant argues that only simple interest at 10 per cent. per annum was collectible on the note; that "the attempt to increase the rate of interest on breach, and to have such increase relate back to the date of the note, is a penalty, and void under section 1670, Civ. Code." We differ with appellant. In this state the rate of interest agreed upon in writing must be allowed according to the terms of the agreement until the entry of judgment. Civ. Code, § 1918. And it is competent for the parties to agree upon an increased rate, contingent upon nonpayment of either principal or interest when due. Thompson v. Gorner, 104 Cal. 168, 37 Pac. 900. We see no substantial ground for distinguishing this case from that. But in such a contract the right to compound interest must find support in the terms employed by the parties, and the stipulation in this note that, if the interest is not paid at the end of one year from date, it should become part of the principal and bear interest, looks to the compounding of the interest accruing to June 6, 1890, but not afterwards. See Civ. Code, § 1919; Doe v. Vallejo, 29 Cal. 385; Estate of Den, 35 Cal. 692; Dean v. Applegarth, 65 Cal. 393, 4 Pac. 375. It follows that the judgment for $783.10, principal and interest, was too great by $40.20, and should be modified accordingly. Several other points are made by appellant; but we do not find them sufficiently meritorious to require discussion. The sum of $40.20 should be deducted from the amount found to be due the plaintiff, and thus modified the judgment should be affirmed, without costs to appellant.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the sum of $40.20 is deducted from the amount found to be due the plaintiff, and thus modified the judgment is affirmed, without costs to appellant.

PEOPLE v. McDONALD. (Cr. 167.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 18, 1896.)

ROBBERY—CONVICTION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

On a trial for robbery, the testimony showed that defendant and a confederate, late at night, found the prosecuting witness intoxicated in a saloon; that, under the pretext of escorting him to his hotel, they took him along the street till they came to a blind alley; that, while one of them choked the witness, the other rifled his pockets; that they had been seen by an officer to enter the alley, and, when he came upon them, defendant was stooping over the witness, and his confederate was standing near by; that a small amount of coin was found on the confederate, and a spectacle case belonging to the witness was found near where the confederate was standing. The accomplices claimed that the witness was their friend and shipmate, and that they were taking him home, but in fact they were strangers to the witness. Held, that a verdict of guilty was sustained by the evidence.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Michael McDonald was convicted of robbery, and from the judgment of conviction, and an order denying him a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. Hayford, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

VAN FLEET, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, convicting him of robbery, and from an order denying him a new trial. The single contention upon which a reversal is asked, is that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence. The contention is untenable. The evidence of the prosecution tended to show that defendant and a confederate found the prosecuting witness, Wilson, late at night, in a basement saloon, commonly designated as a "dive," near the water front in said city, under the influence of liquor, and offered to escort him to his hotel. He went with them, and they took him along the street until they reached a blind alley, into which they turned, and while one choked him, the other rifled his pockets, and took what money he had on his person, amounting to between one and two dollars. They were discovered in the act by an officer who had seen them enter the alley, and was induced to investigate by hearing a scuffle. When the officer approached the defendant was stooping over the prostrate form of the prosecuting witness, and his confederate was standing some six or seven feet distant. Upon being arrested and searched, a small amount of coin—$1.25—was found on the confederate; and on searching the alley after the arrest a pair of spectacles, with their case, belonging to the prosecuting witness, and which had been in his trousers pocket, was found lying near where the confederate was seen standing. When approached they stated to the officer that the prosecuting witness was their friend and shipmate, and was intoxicated, and that they were taking him home. This statement was shown to be wholly untrue, and that they had had no previous acquaintance with him. Under these circumstances, the jury were fully justified in finding the defendant guilty. It is true, the defendant denied the robbery, and gave evidence tending to put an entirely innocent face upon the transaction; but the jury were not bound to believe him, and evidently did not. The fact that none of the fruits of the robbery were found on his person was but a circumstance making in his favor, but in no way conclusive of innocence. We think the evidence amply sufficient to sustain the verdict. Judgment and order affirmed.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

LEONARD v. SHAW et al. (S. F. 197.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 19, 1896.)

NEW TRIAL—NOTICE OF MOTION—APPEAL—RECORD —STIPULATION.

1. Denial of new trial cannot be reviewed where the statement contains no specification of errors, or the particular reasons relied on for new trial.

2. An instrument printed in the record, and purporting to be a copy of notice of motion for new trial, stating that the motion will be made on the minutes, forms no part of the record, when not verified and embodied in a statement or bill of particulars as required by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 659, 661.

3. By express provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 659, when motion for new trial is made on the minutes the notice of motion must state the particular errors and objections relied on.

4. A stipulation that the transcript is correct merely obviates the necessity of a certificate by the clerk, and does not preclude a denial of the sufficiency of the statement.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Benito county; J. H. Logan, Judge.

Action by L. R. Leonard against A. D. Shaw and another. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. W. Jefferson and John A. Percy, for appellant. Scott & Dooling and Briggs & Hudner, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to recover $5,000 from the defendants for an alleged libel published of and concerning plaintiff on January 12, 1894, in the San Benito Advance, a newspaper printed and published by defendants at Hollister, in the county of San Benito, state of California. The following is a copy of the article: "Gone to Fresh Pastures. L. R. Leonard, the erstwhile manager of an Industrial Publishing Company that never had a legal existence, has gone where the woodbine twineth; and the Nash brothers, who indulged in the luxury of running a newspaper to vary the monotony of farm life, mourn as the whangdoodle o'er its first born. As manager of the semiweekly Wet Hen, Leonard made the ghost walk longer than any of the journalistic pirates who ever located in Hollister, and he left a deeper hole in the pockets of his backers. Leonard has been getting ready to skip for some time past, but he stayed just long enough to induce a hidebound board of supervisors to fix county printing rates according to his own starvation schedule, and then skipped off to pastures new, in search of another batch of suckers." Defendants answered, raising issues of fact, which were tried before a jury, and a verdict in favor of defendants returned, upon which judgment was entered in their favor for costs. This appeal is from the judgment, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

[1] Rehearing denied.

We cannot consider the motion for a new trial for several reasons, the most important of which is that the statement contains no specification whatever of errors, or the particular reasons on which the moving party relies. Nye v. Railroad Co., 97 Cal. 461, 32 Pac. 530; Hersney v. Kness, 75 Cal. 115, 16 Pac. 548; Silva v. Holland, 74 Cal. 530, 16 Pac. 385; Dawson v. Schloss, 93 Cal. 194, 29 Pac. 31; Bohnert v. Bohnert, 95 Cal. 444, 30 Pac. 590; Pico v. Cohn, 67 Cal. 258, 7 Pac. 680; Ferrer v. Insurance Co., 47 Cal. 416; Spencer v. Long, 39 Cal. 700; Budd v. Drais, 50 Cal. 120; People v. Railroad Co., 43 Cal. 398.

There is printed in the record what purports to be a copy of the notice of motion for a new trial, which states that the motion will be made upon the minutes of the court; but it is not embodied in any statement or bill of exceptions, and is not verified in any way, and hence forms no part of the record, and cannot be recognized. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 659-661. If it be conceded that the motion was made on the minutes of the court, it follows that the notice was required to state the particular errors and objections relied upon. Code Civ. Proc. § 659. This did not, however, obviate a specification of the errors and objections in the statement to be made in such cases after a hearing of the motion. In practice, this is frequently done by including in the statement a copy of the notice of motion containing such specification. A better practice is to make a formal statement of the causes relied upon and argued at the hearing, as it is only the formal objections stated in the notice, and argued at the hearing of the motion, that are entitled to be included in the statement. Code Civ. Proc. § 661. This court cannot be expected to grope through the record in quest of errors, which with little labor can be grouped together and succinctly stated, so as to be comprehended at a glance. Sharon v. Sharon, 79 Cal. 636, 22 Pac. 26, 131, cited by appellant's counsel, is not in point. There certain exhibits were referred to in the statement, made a part thereof, and referred to by their numbers, and the place where they were to be found at the end of the statement. The court held that those exhibits were so referred to and made parts of the statement as to bring them under the certificate of the judge authenticating the statement. In the case at bar there is no reference whatever to the notice of motion, and nothing in the statement to indicate that it was ever given, or, if given, as to its contents.

It is urged by appellant that, as counsel for respondents stipulated as to the correctness of the transcript, they are now estopped from objecting thereto. This simply obviated the necessity of a certificate by the clerk (Todd v. Winants, 36 Cal. 129) and did not preclude respondents from denying the sufficiency of the statement (Wetherbee v. Carroll, 33 Cal. 549). Nothing appears upon the face of the judgment roll to warrant a reversal.

The instructions given and refused by the court are not incorporated in the judgment roll, and are only to be found in full in the purported notice of motion for a new trial, which, for reasons hereinbefore pointed out, cannot be considered. Those referred to in the statement are not, as before stated, fortified by an assignment of error in their giving or refusal. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

(114 Cal. 56)

PEOPLE v. BENNETT. (Cr. 82.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 15, 1896.)

FORMER JEOPARDY—WAIVER OF PLEA.

Under Const. art. 1, § 13, declaring that "no one shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense," and Pen. Code, § 687, providing that "no person can be subjected to a second prosecution for a public offense for which he has once been prosecuted and convicted or acquitted," one tried without a plea of former jeopardy cannot for the first time raise the question of former acquittal on motion for new trial, though both trials were in the same court and before the same judge.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

C. R. Bennett was tried for assault with intent to commit murder, and convicted. From an order granting a new trial, the people appeal. Reversed.

---

Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People. D. M. Connor and R. E. Hewitt, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant was charged, by information, with the crime of assault with intent to commit murder, and, on being arraigned, pleaded not guilty to the charge. He was tried, and found guilty of assault with a deadly weapon. Thereupon he gave notice of a motion for a new trial, which motion was subsequently heard and granted upon the ground that the verdict was not supported by the evidence. Thereafter, without being called upon or offering to enter any new plea to the information, he was again tried in the same court, and before the same judge, and found "guilty as charged." In due time he moved for a new trial upon several grounds, and, among others, that he was acquitted by the former verdict of the charge of assault to commit murder, and had been twice placed in jeopardy for that offense. The court granted the motion upon the last-named ground, and from that order the people appeal.

Our constitution provides that "no person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense" (article 1, § 13); and the Penal Code contains the following provision (section 687): "No person can be subjected to a second prosecution for a public offense for which he has once been prosecuted and convicted or acquitted." May the defendant for the first time raise the question of once in jeopardy upon his motion for a new trial? The practice here followed is certainly a novel one, and, if justified by the law, such declaration, in effect, will be a nullification of all those sections of the Penal Code providing for special pleas; for if a defendant charged with crime may be allowed to take the chances of an adverse verdict after trial upon a plea of not guilty, and, having lost, may then for the first time upon his motion for a new trial set up a previous acquittal or conviction, or once in jeopardy, every defendant will follow that course, and a procedure which has been practiced since time immemorial, both in this country and in England, will become a thing wholly of the past. Indeed, if defendant's contention be sound, and the court's decision be allowed to stand, this defendant can never have a final judgment rendered against him, even for the minor offense included in the principal charge; for by the order of the court a new trial is granted, and upon such trial the defendant cannot be compelled to interpose his special plea of once in jeopardy. Neither has the court any power to enter such plea for him. Therefore upon another conviction for the same offense he would again secure a new trial upon the same grounds which were previously successful, and the practice could be continued indefinitely. To allow a defendant, as was done in this case, to sit idly by during the progress of his trial, and then, upon conviction, set up, upon motion in arrest of judgment, or for a new trial, a special defense that he could have raised at the very inception of the trial, would be to sanction a practice which might well be termed trifling with the court. If a defendant could raise this question after trial and conviction, he could with equal success raise it after a plea of guilty, no trial having been had. The defendant's plea of not guilty puts in issue all the allegations of the indictment or information, and nothing more. In this case the defendant would not have been allowed to prove at the trial that he had been once in jeopardy, for there was no such issue in the case, and could be none unless he saw fit to make it by plea. To say that evidence could be introduced before the court upon his motion for a new trial that would not have been admitted if offered at the trial would be an anomaly, and is entirely without the law.

The authorities upon the foregoing question appear to be in entire accord. In Com. v. Olds, 5 Litt. (Ky.) 140, the court, speaking as to special pleas, said, "It is well settled that these two pleas must be pleaded in bar, and that they cannot be given in evidence under the general issue." And in People v. Olwell, 28 Cal. 462, this court said, "At common law, upon a second indictment for the same offense the prisoner could not avail himself of a former conviction under the plea of not guilty, but he was required to plead it specially." And again, in People v. Lee Yune Chong, 94 Cal. 386, 29 Pac. 778, this language is found: "Counsel for appellant argue the question of 'once in jeopardy,' but that question can arise only after an issue has been made by a plea of 'once in jeopardy.'" An eminent author upon criminal law declares: "The law's methods must be pursued by him who seeks the protection of the law. Hence, as to pleas, to be entitled to show a particular matter in defense he must tender the plea which the law has provided, in the law's form and at the law's time." Again the same author says: "The only method for taking advantage of the former conviction or acquittal we have seen is this plea. Thus there cannot be an arrest of judgment." Bish. New Cr. Proc. §§ 744, 813. See, also, Zachary v. State, 7 Baxt. 1; State v. Washington, 28 La. Ann. 129; Pitner v. State, 44 Tex. 578; State v. Barnes, 32 Me. 534; Rickles v. State, 68 Ala. 538. Section 1020 of the Penal Code in substance declares the same principle. We see nothing violative of any constitutional provision in adhering to the foregoing views. While it is true the constitution declares that no man is to be placed twice in jeopardy for the same offense, still, as Mr. Bishop says, "the law's methods must be pursued by him who seeks the protection of the law," and this the defendant has not done. Again, the fact that the first trial was had in the same court, and before the same judge, as the second trial, in no way excused the necessity of the plea of once in jeopardy. The whole question of once in jeopardy was entirely foreign to the case, unless raised by a special plea; and, when so raised, an issue of fact was presented, which the jury alone possessed the power to pass upon. For the foregoing reasons the order granting a new trial is reversed, and the cause remanded.

CHATEAU v. SINGLA. (S. F. 73.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 20, 1896.)

PARTNERSHIP—SUBLETTING OF APARTMENTS—DISORDERLY HOUSE—ILLEGALITY OF CONTRACT.

Where a contract of partnership has for its business purpose the subletting of furnished apartments for purposes of prostitution, in direct violation of Pen. Code, § 316, its illegality is not cured by the facts that the co-partnership, and the individual members thereof, are not participants, in any manner, in the business of prostitution, and that the tenements are located in a section of the city mainly inhabited by prostitutes, who are permitted to remain there by the police authorities.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Charles A. Chateau against Justin Singla to dissolve a co-partnership and wind up the business. From a judgment as prayed by plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

A. Ruef, for appellant. A. B. Treadwell, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The action is a proceeding in equity by one partner to dissolve a copartnership between himself and defendant, for the appointment of a receiver, for a statement of accounts, and generally for the closing up of the business of the partnership. In the complaint it is averred that the partnership was formed for the business "of subletting and renting certain tenements, and in supplying and furnishing the necessary household furniture therein to fit the same for habitations and dwellings for human beings." Further averments of the complaint were that the defendant had excluded plaintiff from all share in the proceeds and profits of the partnership, and from all dealings with the partnership property, and had collected rents and profits of the partnership, which he claimed to own and hold as his individual property, and for which he refused to account. Defendant admitted the partnership, made denial of any and all the wrongful acts charged against him, and, for a further and separate defense, averred that the co-partnership was and is illegal, against good morals, and against public policy, "in this: that the same consisted in the letting, subletting, leasing, and hiring of said tenements and premises in the complaint set forth, and the furniture therein contained, for immoral and unlawful purposes, to wit, for the purpose of maintaining, keeping, conducting, and carrying on brothels and houses of ill fame, and houses, places, apartments, and resorts for the purposes of assignation and prostitution, and that the business carried on by said co-partnership has been the letting of said premises, tenements, and furniture for such purposes, and that the plaintiff at the time of entering into and forming said co-partnership, and at all times since, well knew that such was to be and was the business of said co-partnership, and that said copartnership was carrying on said business and letting said premises and furniture for the purposes aforesaid, and that all the rents received or collected, by or on account of said co-partnership, from the tenants in the complaint referred to and mentioned, were received and collected as rents for the houses and apartments used for the purposes aforesaid." The court found "that the said copartnership business has not at any time, never has been, and is not now, illegal, against good morals, or against public policy; that said co-partnership firm simply rented the real property from one David M. Richards, between said December 30, 1890, and October 31, 1893, and then and thereafter sublet said property, consisting of four tenements, to four common prostitutes, and that said common prostitutes during all of said time have been common prostitutes, supporting themselves by prostitution at said premises; that said prostitutes, as tenants of said co-partnership firm, composed of plaintiff and defendant, paid to said co-partnership the rents of said premises so occupied and hired by said tenants of and from said co-partnership, and that said copartnership firm, and the individual members thereof, are not participants in any manner with said prostitutes in carrying on said business of prostitution; that said premises are situate in a section of this city and county of San Francisco occupied mainly and largely by common prostitutes, and said common prostitutes, including the tenants of said co-partnership firm, are permitted and allowed by the police authorities of the city and county of San Francisco to carry on their said business in said district, and on said premises." The court then proceeded to decree a dissolution of the partnership and the winding up of its affairs, instructing the receiver to hold the partnership property, effects, moneys, debts, etc., subject to the further order of the court.

It is extremely difficult to see how the court, in view of the evidence and of the law, could have found that the co-partnership business was not illegal, against good morals, and against public policy. Section 316 of the Penal Code declares that every person who lets any apartment or tenement, knowing that it is to be used for the purpose of assignation or prostitution, is guilty of a misdemeanor. If this contract of co-partnership had for its purpose the letting of apartments for purposes of prostitution, and if the business of the co-partnership, as pleaded by the answer, was the doing of this precise thing, then the co-partnership contract was illegal, against good morals, against public policy, and against the express mandate of the statute, and equity would no more entertain an action founded upon such contract, for the relief of either of the parties to it, than it would entertain an action between two thieves for an equitable division of their plunder. A void contract, a contract against public policy or against the mandate of the statute, may not be made the foundation of any action, either in law or in equity. In re Groome's Estate, 94 Cal. 69, 29 Pac. 487; Buck v. City of Eureka, 109 Cal. 504, 42 Pac. 243; Pars. Partn. (4th Ed.) § 8; Lindl. Partn. 105. That this partnership was based upon such an illegal contract, and had for its business purpose the unlawful act of letting furnished apartments for purposes of prostitution, the evidence does not for a moment permit us to doubt. Going no further into the consideration of the evidence than is necessary, the testimony of the plaintiff himself concludes the question. He says: "The houses are used for purposes of prostitution, and no other purpose, and the women who occupy them are common prostitutes. When I sold Mr. Singla a half interest in this business, and took him in as a partner, I knew what these houses were being used for. We were to rent the houses for women to carry on the business of prostitution there, and, on getting the leases from Mr. Richards on the several occasions, it was for the purpose of being able to sublet the premises for those purposes." The evidence of the defendant, Singla, is identical in effect, and throughout the whole record there is no conflict upon the subject. The latter portion of the finding, to the effect that the section of the city where these tenements are located is mainly inhabited by prostitutes, who are permitted to remain there by the police authorities, is meaningless in the case. Public policy is not made or unmade by the acts or omissions of a police department; nor will it be contended that the police department may abrogate a penal statute, or annul an express mandate of the law. The finding, therefore, that the co-partnership business was not illeal, is unsupported, and cannot stand. It must fall, and with it must fall the judgment and decree which depend upon it. The cause must be reversed, with directions to the trial court to take evidence, and determine, in accordance with these views, whether or not the business of the co-partnership was the letting of apartments or tenements for the purpose of assignation or prostitution, knowing that the same were to be so used. If it shall determine that such was in truth the purpose for which the co-partnership was formed, and that such was the business which the co-partnership conducted, it will deny to either party in this proceeding any relief. It is ordered accordingly.

PEOPLE v. ROBERTS. (Cr. 166.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 19, 1896.)

CRIMINAL LAW—DIRECTING VERDICT—FORMER JEOPARDY—APPEAL.

1. Under Pen. Code, § 1118, declaring that, "if at any time after the evidence on either side is closed the court deems it insufficient to warrant a conviction, it may advise the jury to acquit the defendant. But the jury are not bound by the advice,"—the court has no power to command a verdict for defendant.

2. Where, after introduction of evidence by the people, a verdict of not guilty is rendered at the "command" of the court, defendant cannot be tried for the same offense, though the court was authorized only to "advise" such a verdict.

3. Rejection of evidence offered by the people cannot be reviewed on appeal, under Pen. Code, § 1238, subd. 5, authorizing an appeal from an order directing the jury to find for defendant.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Kern county; B. T. Williams, Judge.

On a prosecution of E. M. Roberts, a verdict of not guilty was directed and returned, and the people appeal. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People. Laird & Packard and J. W. Mahon, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant was charged with felony. At the trial certain evidence was introduced by the people. Certain other evidence was then offered, but upon objection by the defendant it was not admitted, whereupon the following proceedings took place: "Mr. Fay: If you honor please, under the rulings of the court we have nothing further to offer. Mr. Laird: We have no testimony to submit to the jury. The Court: Under the conditions of the case, gentlemen, there is nothing left for the court but to instruct this jury to return a verdict. You will prepare a verdict, Mr. Clerk, of not guilty. Gentlemen, sitting as you are, you may select from your number a foreman. Gentlemen of the jury, nothing remains for you to do but for your foreman to sign this verdict of not guilty. Step to the clerk's desk and sign it." Thereupon a verdict of not guilty was rendered, and defendant discharged. Under subdivision 5 of section 1238, the people appeal from the order made by the trial court, directing the jury to find a verdict in favor of defendant.

Section 1118 of the Penal Code provides: "If at any time after the evidence on either side is closed the court deems it insufficient to warrant a conviction, it may advise the jury to acquit the defendant. But the jury are not bound by the advice." It will thus be observed that the trial court was not authorized to summarily direct the jury to find a verdict of not guilty. The power and the duty of a trial court, under the circumstances here presented, was to advise the jury what action to take; but the court had no power to command, and hence no power to enforce its commands. After the case was submitted upon the evidence, however weak that evidence, it was still the duty of the jury to pass upon its sufficiency, and find a verdict according to its own best judgment, paying all due respect to the advice and opinion of the judge as to its insufficiency. The trial court has the power, and it is its duty, to set aside the verdict of a jury under certain circumstances, but it has no power to demand a certain kind of verdict. While the action of the court of which complaint is here made was erroneous, we deem the error of that peculiar character not demanding a reversal of the judgment. And we arrive at this conclusion for the reason that, if the order should be reversed and the cause remanded, the defendant could not be again tried upon the charge here involved, and hence a reversal could avail nothing in the interests of justice. The defendant has been once in jeopardy for the offense set out in this information, and for that reason is forever freed from a second trial upon those matters. As to defendant's jeopardy, see People v. Webb, 38 Cal. 467; also, People v. Horn, 70 Cal. 17, 11 Pac. 470.

It has been attempted upon this appeal to review the soundness of the court's ruling upon the rejection of evidence. We are clear that no such question can be raised. Indeed, we are not prepared to say what particular question may be successfully raised upon an appeal by the people under subdivision 5 of section 1238 of the Penal Code. For the foregoing reasons the order is affirmed.

CALLAN v. BULL. (S. F. 68.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 3, 1896.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—PERSONAL INJURY—NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT—PLACE OF EMPLOYMENT—SAFETY—EXPERT EVIDENCE.

1. In an action for personal injuries it appeared that defendant entered into a contract with agents of the United States to construct a harbor jetty; that plaintiff was injured by the breaking of a cap on a bent, which had been negligently constructed. The contract provided that: "The work is to be executed under the supervision of the engineer officer in charge, or his agent. * * * No material of any description will be placed in the works without his knowledge and instructions at the time. * * * The contractor must keep upon the works at all times responsible agents, who shall have full authority to carry out the instructions of the agent of the United States; * * * and all material, supervision, and labor furnished by the contractor will be subject to the approval of the engineer officer in charge." Held, that defendant was not the agent of the United States in the performance of the contract, but, under its provisions, was an independent contractor and employer.

2. Under the provision in the contract that "the contractor must keep upon the works at all times a responsible agent," defendant appointed B. as superintendent. The men employed by defendant were divided into several crews, with each of which there was a foreman. B. was in charge of them all, and himself at times helping in the work. If one portion of the work was in advance of the others, the men were taken from that, and placed at work on other portions. The men were all engaged in the same general business. Held that, with reference to those acts which were not within the personal duties of defendant, B. was but a fellow servant with all of the other employés, within Civ. Code, § 1970, and hence defendant was not liable for the negligence of any of such fellow servants in the construction of the bent at which the accident occurred.

3. The work upon which plaintiff was employed was to construct a jetty into the waters of the bay, and the making of the bent was a part of the work to be done by the laborers themselves out of materials furnished by defendant. Held, that the bent was not a place furnished by defendant, within the rule that an employer must see that the place in which his employé is to work is reasonably safe.

4. Expert testimony is admissible to show the strength of materials, and to show that a structure was not properly constructed to sustain the weight to which it was subjected.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by one Callan against one Bull to recover damages for personal injuries. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Buck & Cutler and Frank McGowan, for appellant. Chamberlain & Wheeler and Ernest Sevier, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for an injury sustained by him while in the employ of the defendant. The defendant, in December, 1892, had entered into a contract with Maj. W. H. Heuer, of the corps of engineers, acting on behalf of the United States, for constructing a breakwater or jetty on each side of the entrance to Humboldt Bay, and in April, 1893, had hired the plaintiff as a laborer to work on the jetty. In constructing the jetty, trestlework was built out from the shore, on which was laid a double railroad track on which to carry rock and other material with which the jetty was to be formed. This trestlework was constructed of bents of piling 16 feet apart, each bent consisting of four piles, upon which a cap was fastened, and across these caps were laid stringers, upon which were placed the rails on which the cars were to run. Brush mattress work was constructed about the trestlework, and sunk to the bottom of the sea, and on this brush work was deposited rock, thus forming a riprap embankment for the jetty. The mode of laying the brush mattress was as follows: After some of the bents had been placed in position, and the track laid thereon, a grillage of poles the width of the jetty, and varying in length from one to four bents, was laid beneath the bents, and bundles of brush placed thereon in alternate layers to the thickness of nearly four feet, on the top of which was laid another grillage of poles, and, after these grillages had been secured, the whole was dropped to the bottom, and the rock afterwards dumped thereon. During the construction of a mat it was suspended at each end by sling poles hung from the bents, and on these sling poles were laid the poles forming the bottom grillage of the mattress. After the north jetty had been built for the distance of about a quarter of a mile from the shore, the defendant commenced to construct a spur on the outer side for its protection, and for this purpose placed a bent, consisting of two piles and a cap, parallel to the main jetty, and about 16 feet therefrom. These piles were driven 16 feet apart, and on them was placed a cap 32 feet long. The defendant was directed to construct a mattress at this point, 24 feet wide, measured in a direction parallel to the trestle, and as long from the trestle as it was practicable to make it from a single bent, the inner edge of the mattress being 12 feet inside of the spur bent. For the purpose of sustaining this mat during its construction, two sling poles about 40 feet long were slung about 8 feet under the cap, and outside of the piles, the inner ends running in and resting upon the rock of the jetty already built, and tied to the caps of the main trestle, and the outer ends suspended from the projecting ends of the cap on the spur bent. Two stringers, 32 feet in length, were also laid across the cap of the spur bent, one end of which was fastened to the end of the caps of the main trestle, and the other projected out over the spur cap, and 16 feet beyond it. The northernmost of these stringers was placed with its center 18 inches outside of the center of the pile, and to these stringers the sling poles were also suspended by steel cables at a point near their outer end. On August 12th—the next day after these stringers had been placed in position—the plaintiff, with other laborers, was engaged in laying the mat with the bundles of brush, and after a few loads of brush had been placed thereon the cap broke near its northern end, and a portion of that end of the cap fell upon the mat, and struck the plaintiff, seriously injuring him. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and from the judgment entered thereon, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

[1] Rehearing denied.

There was conflicting evidence upon the character of the timber, and also upon the amount of weight which it bore, as well as the support which a sound stick of its size would bear; but, in view of the verdict of the jury, we must assume that the evidence showed that the weight of the mattress at the time it fell was too great for the sustaining force of the cap, either from its inherent defect or from the manner in which it was supported, and that there was negligence, either in the construction of the bent or in the mode in which the stringers were placed. The contract of the appellant contained the following provision: "The work is to be executed under the supervision of the engineer officer in charge, or his agent, who will prescribe the order in which the materials are to be placed, and who will give the lines and levels to be used. No material of any description will be placed in the works without his knowledge and instructions at the time, and any materials so placed will not be paid for. The contractor must keep upon the work at all times responsible agents, who shall have full authority to carry out the instructions of the agent of the United States. The contractor shall remove from the work at the request of the engineer officer in charge, any person who is not acceptable to the agents of the United States;" and also a provision that "all material, supervision, and labor furnished by the contractor will be subject to the approval of the engineer officer in charge." From these provisions it is contended by the appellant that he was acting under the directions of the officers of the United States, and was but the agent or servant of the United States in the performance of the contract; that by the terms of the contract the United States reserved such control over the construction of the jetty as to deprive him of the power to select the mode of construction, or the laborers whom he would employ; and that, consequently, he is not liable for any injury resulting from following the directions of these officers, or for any fault or negligence in the manner of doing the work; and further, that if there was any negligence in the performance of the work, which resulted in the injury sustained by the plaintiff, it was the negligence of the fellow servants of the plaintiff, for which he cannot be held responsible. On the other hand, the plaintiff contends that the defendant was bound to furnish to him a safe place in which to work, and safe appliances with which to do his work, and that he could not divest himself of this responsibility by intrusting to others, whether they be fellow servants or not, the care of providing such appliances and place of work.

The master's liability for the negligence of his servant rests upon his right to select the servant and to control his work, but, when this selection and control rests in another, he is freed from such liability. The same principles govern the liability of a contractor for an injury resulting from the use of defective materials in his work. He can be held liable only when he has the right of selecting the materials. If he is to perform the contract with only such materials as may have been previously selected and furnished by his employer, he cannot be held liable for any defect in such materials. These principles are, however, subject to the rule that this right of selection and control is to be determined by the terms of the contract of employment, and that, unless by the contract this right is reserved to the employer, the contractor will be presumed to have the right of selection and control of all whom he employs. It is not enough that, while performing the contract, he may ask for and act upon the advice of his employer, or listen to his suggestions as to the mode of doing the work. Unless he is required to act according to his directions, he will not be released from liability to his employés for the consequences of his action, merely because he was so directed by the employer. He is not freed from this liability by a provision in the contract that the work is to be done "under the direction and to the satisfaction" of a superintendent (Kelly v. Mayor, etc., 11 N. Y. 432), or "under the general supervision of the chief engineer of the company" (Eaton v. Railway Co., 59 Me. 520), or "as the engineer may direct" (Callahan v. Railroad Co., 23 Iowa, 562), unless such provision extends to directing the manner in which the work is to be performed, rather than as to the results of the work. City of Cincinnati v. Stone, 5 Ohio St. 38. The reservation by the employer of the right to remove any of the employés of the contractor does not relieve the latter from liability for the negligence of his employés. Reedie v. Railway Co., 4 Exch. 244; Cuff v. Railroad Co., 35 N. J. Law, 17. The contract in the present case does not contain any provision by which the appellant was deprived of the power to employ such persons for the performance of the work as he might select. By the contract he was to supply all the materials, and perform all the labor necessary to construct the jetty according to the specifications which were annexed thereto, and he himself testified that he employed all the laborers engaged in the work, and furnished all the materials. These specifications prescribe the character of the materials to be used, and the only control or interference in reference thereto on the part of the United States provided in the contract was that such as did not conform to the specifications should be rejected; and there is no evidence that any of the material furnished by the appellant was ever rejected by any officer or agent of the United States, or that he was ever requested to remove from the work any person employed by him. The clause requiring the work to be executed under the supervision of the engineer officer, and authorizing him to prescribe the "order" in which the materials should be placed, and to "give the lines and levels" to be used, did not authorize any interference with the mode or manner of doing the work, but left that, as well as the men by whom it should be done, and the means to be employed, under the control of the appellant. The further provision that he should do the work or furnish the materials as he might be directed by the agent of the United States, refers merely to the quantity of material or place for the work that was to be furnished or performed, according to the specifications named in the contract, and did not authorize any interference with the manner in which the work should be done. Pack v. Mayor, etc., 8 N. Y. 222; Hughes v. Railroad Co., 39 Ohio St. 475.

Under the provision in the contract that "the contractor must keep upon the work at all times responsible agents, who shall have full authority to carry out the instructions of the agent of the United States," the appellant testified that he appointed one Butler "as superintendent," and "as my representative, to obey the instructions of the engineer in charge." Under this appointment Butler acted as the general superintendent of the work, and received orders from the appellant, and also from the representatives of the government. He had the right to hire and discharge men, but in fact the appellant himself hired all the laborers engaged on the work, and paid Butler as he paid the other men. The appellant does not appear to have been present at the work much of the time during its construction, or to have given any directions in reference thereto. The men employed upon the work were divided into several "crews" for different portions of the work,—the mat crew, the pile-driver crew, the rock crew, and the apron crew,—with each of which there was a foreman; and Butler was in charge of them all, giving directions to each as to the mode of the work and the place at which they were to work, directing the members of one crew to aid in the work of another, and himself at times helping in the work. Butler thus held varied relations in reference to the work to be performed, and also to the appellant and the other laborers. As the "responsible agent" of the appellant, required by the contract to carry out the instructions on behalf of the United States, he fully represented the appellant. As superintendent in charge of the work, he sustained a dual relation towards the other laborers. In respect to those duties from which the appellant could not be relieved by delegating their performance to another, he sustained towards them the character of what is termed a "vice principal," and for his acts or omissions in the performance of these duties the appellant is as fully liable as if they had been performed by himself in person; but with reference to those acts in the performance of the contract which were not within the personal duties of the appellant, he was but the fellow servant of the other employés. His relation to them, as superintendent of the entire work, was the same with reference to these acts as that of the foreman of either of the crews with reference to its work. They were all employed by the same employer in the same general business,—the construction of the jetty,—and for any negligence on the part of either of such fellow servants the appellant is not liable. Civ. Code, § 1970. These men were none the less fellow servants of the plaintiff by reason of being divided into different crews. They were all in the service of the same common employer, and engaged in the same business, each contributing to the completion of the work of constructing the jetty. It was shown that it was quite common for the men to be transferred from one kind of work to another. At the commencement, and when the plaintiff was first employed, the men all worked together, but as the work advanced they were divided into crews for the better expedition of the work. If one portion of the work was in advance of others, the men were taken from that as occasion might suggest, and placed at work upon other portions. Lindvall v. Woods, 41 Minn. 212, 42 N. W. 1020, presents many points in common with the present case. In that case the defendants, while engaged in grading a line of railroad, conveyed the material taken from a cut to an adjacent fill by means of dump cars laid upon a temporary trestle. As the dump was filled, the trestle was extended by raising additional bents and laying stringers thereon. The different portions of the work were performed by different crews, and a foreman in charge of all of the men gave them directions what to do and where to work. The ordinary employment of the plaintiff was on the dump, but, it being desired to raise some bents and extend the trestle, the foreman directed him to aid them, and while on the trestle it fell by reason of not being properly braced. The court held that the plaintiff was a fellow servant, saying: "The work which the defendants were engaged in was grading a railroad, and they employed various servants in different departments of labor on that work, but all liable to be called upon the orders of the foreman from one department to another. All those engaged in these different departments bore to each other the relation of fellow servants. They were all serving the same master, under the same control, and all engaged in the same general work. The thing to be done was the building of the road, and the co-operation of all the employés in each department was necessary to bring about that result." In Fraser v. Lumber Co., 45 Minn. 235, 47 N. W. 785, the defendant was engaged in manufacturing lumber, and had a number of employés, some of whom were engaged in piling green lumber and others in measuring and scaling it after it had dried. In piling the lumber, boards were projected for steps on which to go up and down the piles. The plaintiff had nothing to do with the piling, but while going up one of the piles of lumber, in the performance of his duty as measurer, he stepped upon one of the projecting boards, which was defective and broke by reason of its defective nature, whereby he sustained injury. The court said: "All the men employed in this lumber yard, whether pilers, scalers, sorters, or measurers, although engaged in different departments of the work, were all in the employment of the same master, under the same general control, and engaged in promoting the same common object. The making of the piles, including the projecting steps, was itself but a part of the work which these men were employed to perform, and all who were engaged in that yard, whatever the particular line of their service, were, as to each other and as to every part of the common enterprise which they were promoting, "fellow servants."

The liability of the appellant is to be determined by the character of the act through which the injury was sustained, or of his functions in reference to the act, and not by the rank or station of the employé under whose direction the act was performed. Where the negligence is in an act which the master must personally perform, the person to whom he delegates its performance is his agent, and the master is responsible for the negligence. If, on the other hand, it is in an act which may be delegated to another, or may be performed by an employé, the person by whom it is performed is a fellow servant with the other employés, irrespective of his rank, and the master is not responsible for his negligence in its performance. Daves v. Southern Pac. Co., 98 Cal. 19, 32 Pac. 708; Burns v. Sennett, 99 Cal. 363, 33 Pac. 916; Noyes v. Wood, 102 Cal. 389, 36 Pac. 766; Lindvall v. Woods, 41 Minn. 212, 42 N. W. 1020; McGinty v. Reservoir Co., 155 Mass. 183, 29 N. E. 510. Whether one acts as a fellow servant or as a representative of the master, is a question of law. Johnson v. Towboat Co., 135 Mass. 209.

Among the personal duties of the employer which are recognized as binding upon him, even though the performance of the work is turned over to another, is that his employés shall have a safe place in which to work, and that the appliances with which the work is to be done shall be reasonably safe; and it is contended by the plaintiff that, in neglecting to provide a cap of sufficient strength to support the mat upon which the plaintiff was working at the time of his injury, the defendant failed to comply with this obligation. The rule which requires the master to provide a safe place and safe appliances for the servant is applied when the place in which the work is to be done is furnished or prepared by the master, as in the case of a ship or a mill or a factory, or when the machinery or other appliances with which the servant is employed to work are furnished by the master; but it has no application when the place at which the work is to be done, or the appliances for doing the same, are to be prepared by the servant himself. If the appliance is furnished by the master for the purpose of enabling the servants to perform the work in which they are to be engaged, he is required to see that it shall be reasonably safe for that purpose; but, if the preparation of that appliance is a part of the work which the servant is required to perform, the master is not liable for any defect in its preparation. "The rule does not apply to a case where several persons are employed to do certain work, and by the contract of employment, either express or implied, the employés are to adjust the appliances by which the work is to be done." Burns v. Sennett, supra. The work upon which the plaintiff was employed in the present case was to construct a jetty extending from the shore several thousand feet out into the waters of the bay. Manifestly, the place at which the work was to be done was not provided by the defendant, nor can it be said that different portions of the work in which the laborers might be engaged as it progressed was the "place" furnished by their employer, within the meaning of the above rule, or that the bent or trestle from which was suspended the mat on which the plaintiff was at work at the time of his injury was one of the appliances to be furnished by the defendant. On the contrary, the making of this bent was a part of the work to be done by the laborers themselves in the construction of the jetty, and the bent was in fact made by them out of materials furnished by the defendant. In Consolidated Coal & Mining Co. v. Clay's Adm'r, 51 Ohio St. 542, 38 N. E. 610, certain laborers in a mine were injured by the falling in of the roof, by reason of its not having been sufficiently propped; and, to the contention of the plaintiff that the employer became liable for the injury, on the ground that he had failed to furnish a safe place in which to work, the court said: "Here the place was not furnished as in any sense a permanent place of work, but was a place in which surrounding conditions were constantly changing, and, instead of being a place furnished by the master for the employés, within the spirit of the decisions referred to, was a place the furnishing and preparation of which was in itself part of the work which they were employed to perform." In Lindvall v. Woods, supra, the court said: "The trestle was not a structure furnished by the defendants for their employés to work on, but was itself a part of the work which they were employed to perform. It was a thing which they themselves made, and was as much a part of the construction of the road as was digging in the pit, loading cars, driving teams, or tamping dirt on the dump." See, also, Marsh v. Herman, 47 Minn. 537, 50 N. W. 611; Ling v. Railway Co., 50 Minn. 160, 52 N. W. 378; Peschel v. Railway Co., 62 Wis. 338, 21 N. W. 269; Kelley v. Norcross, 121 Mass. 508; Beesley v. F. W. Wheeler & Co., 103 Mich. 196, 61 N. W. 658; Butler v. Townsend, 126 N. Y. 105, 26 N. E. 1017. In McNamara v. MacDonough, 102 Cal. 575, 36 Pac. 941, it was shown that the owner of the building had assumed the preparation of the scaffold upon which the plaintiff was at work.

The principle which controls in the present case is the same as that applicable in the construction of a house or other building where the contractor agrees to furnish all the labor and materials requisite for its completion, and the carpenters, the plasterers, and the brick masons contribute their labor thereto. All of his employés are fellow servants, and the preparation of the scaffolds, ladders, staging, or other appliance for doing the different portions of the work is within the scope of their employment. The structure by which the mat on which the plaintiff was at work was suspended was in substance no more than an appliance for doing the work, in the nature of a suspended staging or scaffold such as is frequently used by painters upon a building, and the preparation of this appliance was made by the workmen themselves. There was testimony tending to show that the cap broke by reason of its own defects, and there was also testimony tending to show that it broke by reason of the defective mode in which the mat was suspended therefrom; that, if the stringers had been placed directly over the heads of the piles, instead of being placed outside of them, the strain of the mat's weight upon the cap would not have been sufficient to break it; but whether the cap broke by reason of its own defect, or by reason of the manner in which the stringers were placed upon it, is immaterial. It was selected and placed in position by the fellow servants of the plaintiff, and the stringers were also placed upon it by his fellow servants. If they were negligent or careless, either in selecting the piece of timber to be used as the cap, or in the manner in which the stringers were laid thereon, it was the negligence of a fellow servant, for which the defendant is not liable. When the construction of the spur was determined upon, Butler directed some of the men to take a cap to the place where the spur was to be built, and the cap in question was taken from those lying at the landing and carried there. Ditty, who belonged to the train crew, testified: "Butler told me to bring a cap out there. Jud Crane, who was on the car, went in with me, and we selected the cap, and took it out. There were lots of other caps at the landing where we selected this one from." Larkin, the foreman of the pile-driving crew, placed the cap on the piles. Forbes, who was a member of the same crew with the plaintiff, helped to load the cap upon the car, and testified also that members of the mat crew, rock crew, and apron crew took part in adjusting the stringers and placing them across the cap. Hennegar, who was a member of the mat crew, and was also engaged in dumping rock, testified that he helped put the stringer on the cap, with the assistance of the rock crew and the mat crew.

Witnesses were called as experts on behalf of the plaintiff, for the purpose of showing that the structure to which the mat was suspended was not properly constructed to sustain the weight of the mat, and also to show what weight a cap of the dimensions of the one in question would sustain. These questions were objected to by the defendant, upon the ground that it was for the jury to determine, from the facts that might be shown in the case, whether the structure was properly made. These objections were properly overruled. The matters sought to be shown by these witnesses—the weight of timber, the amount of strain to which a given piece of timber can be subjected before breaking, the difference of resistance to such strain between a cylindrical and a square piece of timber and between different kinds of timber, the amount of weight that would be concentrated at the different points of the stringers at which the cables suspending the mat were attached—were matters not presumably within the common knowledge of men, and were eminently proper to be shown by those who had made these subjects a matter of special study. Prendible v. Manufacturing Co., 160 Mass. 131, 35 N. E. 675. The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

SPRECKELS et ux. v. SPRECKELS.

(S. F. 430.)

APPEAL—BOND—FILING NEW UNDERTAKING—PRACTICE.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 954, providing that no appeal shall be dismissed for insufficiency of the undertaking if a sufficient undertaking be filed before the hearing of the motion to dismiss, authorizes, in case two appeals are taken in the same case, and only one undertaking, reciting the taking of the two appeals, and providing for the payment of all costs and damages on either appeal, is given, the filing of a sufficient undertaking.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 951, requiring appeals from orders to be heard on the papers used on the hearing in the court below, and court rule 29, requiring, in all cases of appeals from orders of the superior court, that the papers and evidence used or taken on the hearing of the motion shall be authenticated by incorporating the same in a bill of exceptions, except when another mode of authentication is provided by law, govern appeals from orders dissolving injunctions, and the failure to bring up such papers cannot be remedied on motion to dismiss by bringing up all papers on file in the court below, as it cannot be shown therefrom on what papers the hearing was had in the court below.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Claus Spreckels and wife against Rudolph Spreckels. From an order dissolving an injunction and from the judgment plaintiffs appeal. Heard on motion to dismiss appeals. Dismissed.

Delmas & Shortridge, for appellants. Rothchild & Ach, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. In this case two appeals were taken by plaintiffs; one from an order dissolving an injunction, the other from the judgment. Only one undertaking on appeal was given, which was intended to serve for both appeals. The undertaking sufficiently recites the order and the judgment, and the sureties stipulate "that the said appellants will pay all damages and costs which may be awarded against them, or either of them, on the appeals, or either of them, or on the dismissal thereof, or of either of them, not exceeding six hundred dollars, to which amount we acknowledge ourselves jointly and severally bound." The statute requires an undertaking for each appeal to the effect that the appellant will pay all damages and costs, not exceeding $300. When there are several appeals in the same case, the different undertakings may be in the same instrument. Sharon v. Sharon, 68 Cal. 326, 9 Pac. 187. The instrument should, however, contain an undertaking for each appeal. A motion to dismiss both appeals was made, based upon the supposed defects of the undertaking. It is claimed that it does not constitute an undertaking in either appeal, and that this court has no jurisdiction. The undertaking is jurisdictional only because it is made so by statute. In section 954, Code Civ. Proc., it is provided that "no appeal can be dismissed for insufficiency of the undertaking thereon if a good and sufficient undertaking, approved by a justice of the supreme court, be filed in the supreme court before the hearing upon motion to dismiss the appeal." We are given jurisdiction by the constitution, and the statute is valid only because it is a reasonable regulation of the exercise of that jurisdiction. It is a mere rule of practice, and is just what the statute makes it. It could have been provided that an undertaking should be filed after the motion was noticed, although none had been previously given. The provision is that a new undertaking may be filed in cases where the undertaking already given is so insufficient that, but for the privilege of giving a new one, the appeal would be dismissed; for it is implied that in some cases the appeal will be dismissed unless a new undertaking be filed. It cannot be held, then, that unless the undertaking is sufficient to sustain an appeal, this court has no jurisdiction to allow a new undertaking. But an undertaking may be so insufficient as not to amount to an undertaking at all. To allow the filing of an undertaking in such a case would not be to allow a new undertaking in lieu of an original, which is all the court is authorized to do. The cases cited are really cases in which it could not be said that any undertaking at all had been filed. In Associates v. Wilkins, 71 Cal. 626, 12 Pac. 799, two appeals were taken and one bond of $300 given. It did not show to which appeal it applied, and could not be considered as applying to either. The same is true of several other cases cited. We cannot in advance say what degree of insufficiency will be tantamount to no bond. It has been held, however, that where the bond fails to recite the appeal,—that is, where it does not purport to be in consideration of the appeal,—it is absolutely ineffectual. That cannot be said of the present undertaking. Indeed, it is doubtful if it is not entirely sufficient. We think, therefore, it is a case in which new undertakings may be filed.

A motion was also made to dismiss the appeal from the order dissolving the injunction, on the ground that the appellants had failed to furnish the requisite papers. Such an appeal must be heard upon the papers used on the hearing in the court below. Code Civ. Proc. § 951. Rule 29 of this court is: "In all cases of appeal to this court from the orders of the superior courts the papers and evidence used or taken on the hearing of the motion must be authenticated by incorporating the same in a bill of exceptions, except where another mode of authentication is provided by law." Manifestly the appeal from the order comes directly within this rule. Appellants propose now to bring up all the papers on file in the court below. But, aside from the fact that the rule prescribes a different method, the deficiency could not be thus supplied. This would not show what papers were used on the hearing of the motion in the court below. It is not of interest to know upon what papers the notice given based the motion, but what were read. And then evidence may have been taken or papers read which are not on file. We are not required to select from the mass of papers those which are pertinent or which were used. That must be done in the court below. The motion to dismiss both appeals because of the insufficiency of the undertaking is denied, and the new undertakings filed are approved and accepted as the undertakings on appeal, but the appeal from the order dissolving the injunction is dismissed upon the ground last discussed.

In re LUX'S ESTATE. (S. F. 137.) [1]

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 19, 1896.)

FAMILY ALLOWANCE DURING ADMINISTRATION—DEATH OF WIDOW BEFORE PAYMENT—LAW OF THE CASE.

1. On appeal from an order making an allowance, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1466, for support of the widow during administration of the deceased husband's estate, it appeared that deceased had devised to her a life estate in certain land, and that she had received a certain amount from sale of said life estate; and the appellate court, speaking with reference to the money thus derived, said that an allowance should be made to her without regard to her having separate property sufficient for her support. Held, that it was the law of the case that such money could not be considered in making the allowance to her. Temple and Henshaw, JJ., dissenting, on the ground that it appeared on the first appeal that she derived her money from a sale of her life estate, subject to administration, and that on the second appeal it appeared that she received it through a partial distribution of the estate.

2. Where a family allowance, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1466, is made for support of deceased's widow, she being the only surviving member of the family, money payable to her, under the order therefor, prior to her death, belongs to her estate, though payment was stayed by appeal from the order, which was not affirmed till after her death.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Mateo county; George H. Buck, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Charles Lux, deceased. From an order making an allowance for support of the widow, the next of kin appeal. Affirmed.

J. H. Campbell (D. M. Delmas, of counsel) for contestants. E. B. & Geo. H. Mastick and Geo. C. Ross, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by the next of kin (called generally the "German heirs") of Charles Lux, deceased, from an order of the court, sitting in probate, made March 22, 1894, allowing Miranda W. Lux, widow of the deceased, for her maintenance, $2,500 per month from the 30th day of August, 1888, during the progress of the settlement of the estate; and we are asked to reverse the order upon the grounds that the allowance was for too large an amount, and that she was not entitled to any allowance at all. We will not discuss at length the question whether the court below abused its discretion by making an allowance for too much. The estate was found by the court, and admitted by counsel, to be of the value of $10,000,000; and it was free from debt or incumbrance. It was nearly all community property, accumulated by the joint efforts of the spouses, one-half of which would go after settlement to the widow; so that, practically, she herself would pay one-half of the allowance. The evidence shows that the amount allowed was in keeping with the scale of expenditures existing before the death of the husband. The proposition that under these circumstances, and as against collateral kin and strangers, the court below so abused its discretion in allowing the sum named that this court, for that reason, should set aside the order, has no foundation whatever in the law or the evidence.

Appellants contend that the court below did not take into consideration certain things which it should have considered. The things which it is contended were not considered are these: The deceased owned one piece of separate property, consisting of land known as the "Buri-Buri Rancho"; and, by his will, he gave to his wife, the respondent, during her lifetime, the rents, profit, and income of said rancho, and provided that "all income and interest derived therefrom shall be her sole and separate property," the remainder, after her death, to go to certain named collateral heirs. Now, it appeared from the evidence that in July, 1890, there was a partial distribution of the said Buri-Buri rancho, by which her said life estate therein was distributed to respondent, and the remainder to certain other persons; and at that time, or immediately afterwards, she sold her life estate for $110,000, the other persons, heirs or devisees, getting for their share $370,000. She had also received some rents from said rancho before the sale. All (substantially) of the community property of the deceased and the respondent consisted in a one-half interest in the firm of Miller & Lux, who owned immensely large properties in lands, cattle, etc.; and, by a written contract between the deceased and Miller, it was covenanted that, upon the death of either partner, the survivor should continue to carry on the business for the joint use of himself and the estate, heirs, and legatees of the deceased for seven years, if necessary, after the death of the deceased partner; and, in his will, the deceased requested his wife to allow her share of the common property to remain under the care and control of the surviving partner, Miller. The respondent complied with this expressed wish of her deceased husband, and allowed all her share of the community property to remain in the business of said firm, under the management of Miller; and the said money which she received from the sale of said rancho she immediately loaned to Miller, to be used in the firm business, although afterwards she invested some of it in other property, and she received (although for what length of time does not appear) income from this money in the amount of $458 per month. The will also gave her $500 per month "out of my estate" during her life, and his trustees were directed to "set apart so much of my estate as may be necessary to yield that sum for that purpose"; but no part of the estate was ever set apart for that purpose, and no part of said $500 per month was ever received by respondent. There was also a provision in the said written contract between Lux and Miller that so much of the "rents, issues, and profits, and proceeds of sales which may be necessary for the support of the family of the deceased" should be paid to such family; but such rents, profits, etc., were put by Miller into the business, and none paid to respondent. And these items above mentioned —particularly money received from the Buri-Buri rancho and the said $500—are the main matters which, it is contended, the court did not consider.

[1] Rehearing denied.

It does not clearly appear that the court did not consider these items. Findings were made by the court; but it can hardly be said that they affirmatively show that, in arriving at the conclusion that $2,500 per month was a proper allowance, the court did not consider the said items. However, there is in the transcript an "opinion" of the judge of the court below, in which, referring to a former appeal, he said: "Upon the former hearing, this court took into consideration, in arriving at its conclusion, certain matters which, upon said appeal, the supreme court held should not have been considered in fixing the family allowance, and, in the reversal of the order, indicated and pointed out the course this court should pursue in fixing the family allowance. At the first hearing, the value of the estate was fixed at $4,000,000; while now it is placed at $10,000,000. In view of the evidence presented, and under the decision of the supreme court, an allowance," etc. And it is contended that from this opinion it appears that the probate court erroneously construed the opinion of this court on the former appeal as holding that the said items should not be considered. But, in the first place, if this "opinion" of the court below can be considered at all, it does not carry on its face the meaning sought to be given it. It expressly refers to, and apparently rests largely on, the fact that, at the first hearing, the estate was supposed to be worth $4,000,000, while now it is shown to be worth $10,000,000. And, in the second place, if the court below construed the decision of this court on the first appeal as contended, then it construed it correctly; for this court, in that decision, held that, in fixing a proper allowance, neither the Buri-Buri rancho nor said $500 mentioned in the will should be considered. The history of that appeal is, briefly, as follows: Charles Lux died in March, 1887. On May 4, 1887, upon the application of the widow (respondent here), the court made an order granting her $2,500 per month from the death of the deceased "until the return of the inventory, or until further order of the court." There was a difference of opinion as to when the "return of the inventory" legally took place; and, under the construction which the executors put upon said order, they continued to pay the respondent $2,500 per month until November 15, 1891. It was held afterwards, however, that the inventory was legally returned on August 30, 1888. On March 17, 1892, the respondent filed a petition for an order to be made nunc pro tunc as of the date of the return of the inventory (which she then took to be May 16, 1890), allowing her $2,500 per month during the progress of the settlement of the estate, to which petition appellants herein filed written objections. Upon the hearing of the issues thus raised, the court, on May 13, 1892, made an order allowing her $1,000 per month from August 30, 1888, until November 15, 1891. From such order, respondent herein took an appeal, and that is the appeal hereinbefore referred to. It is reported in 100 Cal., commencing at page 593, and 35 Pac. 341, under title of In re Lux's Estate. The order was reversed, with certain directions to the court below. It was held that the order of allowance should have embraced the entire period of the settlement of the estate; but the respondents there (appellants here) contended that as the widow had received money from said Buri-Buri rancho amounting to $137,000, including rent and the sum for which her life estate therein had been sold, and had been given the $500 per month by the will, therefore she had sufficient means to support herself, and was not entitled to any further allowance; and it was in response to this contention that this court made rulings which are the law of the case.

The evidence and facts were the same on that hearing as on the second hearing, out of which this present appeal arose, except as to the fact of the partial distribution of the Buri-Buri rancho (which will be noticed hereafter), and the further fact that, at the second hearing, the estate was shown to be vastly more valuable than at the first hearing. The financial situation and ability of the respondent was exactly the same at both hearings. Then, as now, the moneys which she had received from the said rancho, and the said provision of the will, were before the court. And, under these circumstances, this court, on the former appeal, said: "The court below found that the property set apart to the widow is insufficient for her support, and also made additional findings to the effect that the deceased, in his will, bequeathed to her a legacy of five hundred dollars per month during her life, and a life estate in certain property, from the rents and sale of her interest in which she had received one hundred and thirty-seven thousand dollars, and that the deceased also provided in his will, as well as by agreement with his partner, Miller, that said Miller should pay to her monthly such sum as might be needed for her support. It is claimed by respondents that these findings show that the widow has sufficient property of her own to support herself, and that, under such circumstances, she was not entitled to any allowance whatever from the estate, and therefore she cannot be heard to complain because the order appealed from does not continue the allowance during the administration of the estate; and, in support of this proposition, it is argued that the object of the statute is 'to meet the actual wants and necessities of the widow and her family,' and that when, as in this case, the widow is childless, and has abundant private means of her own, there are no wants or necessities to relieve, and the law does not contemplate that any allowance shall be made for her support. But, however the rule may be in other states (and there are decisions which seem to support this contention of respondents), we do not think section 1466 of the Code of Civil Procedure can be so construed. Its language is express and mandatory, and, in the language of the counsel for appellant, 'the duty of maintaining the family, which the law imposes upon the deceased husband or father in his lifetime, is continued against his estate pending its administration,' if the estate is not insolvent. It declares that the court must make a reasonable allowance out of the estate if the property set apart to the family is insufficient for their support; and for the court to hold that no allowance shall be made to the widow if she has sufficient property of her own, although the property set apart to her is insufficient of itself for her support, would be, in effect, an amendment of the law by judicial construction. There was nothing actually decided in Estate of Walkerley, 77 Cal. 643, 20 Pac. 150, in conflict with this conclusion, although it may be conceded that there are expressions in the opinion which, considered apart from the facts before the court, lend some support to the argument of respondents to this point." And the court concluded its decision as follows: "The order appealed from will be reversed, and the superior court will, upon the evidence already before it, and such further evidence as the parties may desire to present, make an order for an allowance to the widow, to continue during the progress of the settlement of the estate, and in such amount as it shall deem reasonable, and without regard to the fact that she may have separate property sufficient for her support. Order reversed." This language can receive no other construction than that the court below was to allow her a proper support out of the general estate, notwithstanding the special gift in her husband's will of the Buri-Buri rancho as "her sole and separate property." In the phrase at the close of the opinion, "without regard to the fact that she may have separate property sufficient for her support," the word "separate" was clearly used in the sense in which the deceased used it in his will,—to denote, generally, property owned by a single individual, and not in the technical sense in which it is used in certain parts of the Codes to distinguish, as between a living husband and wife, property owned by both jointly, called "community property," from that owned by one of the spouses individually, called "separate property." Indeed, in this technical, statutory sense, the word "separate" is hardly applicable at all to the property of a person at a time when he or she is single or unmarried. Moreover, the language of the court was directed to the facts of the case before it,—to the contention that, because respondent here received sufficient money from the Buri-Buri rancho to supply her necessaries, therefore she was not entitled to any allowance. Moreover, the record showed that the respondent had no other property than that derived from the Buri-Buri rancho to which the language of the court can be applied.

It is contended that there is a difference between the two appeals, in this: that, at the first hearing, the record did not affirmatively show that there had been a partial distribution of the Buri-Buri rancho property, while the record on this present appeal does show that fact. If that be so, we cannot see what possible difference it makes. The material point around which appellants' contention revolves is that respondent received a certain amount of money from this particular Buri-Buri property, sufficient to support her, and that, therefore, she is not entitled to further allowance; but the fact that she received this money appeared just as clearly and just as fully in the first record as in the present one.

That being so, how would the situation have been substantially changed by the fact that a formal order of distribution had been made? But the truth is that the former decision was made with the understanding and upon the theory that the order of distribution had been made. When that appeal was pending, there were also pending several other appeals growing out of the estate of Lux, which were intimately related to each other, and submitted at the same time, and decided on the same day. See 100 Cal., from page 593 to page 617, and 35 Pac. 341, 345, 639. In one of these, at least (Miller v. Lux, 100 Cal. 609, 35 Pac. 639), the transcript showed this distribution. Whether or not the court, in deciding one of these appeals, had the right to look into the records in the others, need not be discussed, because, in the appeal we are now discussing (In re Lux's Estate, 100 Cal. 593, 35 Pac. 341), counsel for respondents there (appellants here) stated affirmatively that the distribution had been made, and argued upon that basis. In their brief in that case, speaking of the petition for allowance, they say: "On the contrary, it shows that she has $110,000 derived from said estate through the sale of her life estate in the Buri-Buri rancho, theretofore distributed to her, from which she gets an income of $458.33 per month." And, again: "More than that, her testimony shows affirmatively that the petitioner was not then dependent upon the estate for support; that she had received $110,000 from the sale of her life estate in the Buri-Buri rancho (theretofore distributed to her)." See Supreme Court Records, vol. 1165, pp. 13, 15. Under these circumstances, there is nothing in the very technical point that the record in the former appeal did not show the distribution. Of course, the contention, even if sound, would not apply to any period prior to the date of the distribution, which occurred in July, 1890.

It appears by affidavit that, since this appeal was taken, the respondent has died; and the point is made by the appellants that the right died with her as to all the allowance not actually paid her before her death. The views of this court on the point were pretty fully indicated at the oral argument by conversations between counsel and the Chief Justice. It is sufficient to say that the order, like any money judgment, was the property of the respondent. The appeal merely suspended its operation; but upon its affirmance, if pending the appeal she has died, it goes to her heirs or personal representatives. Of course, there can be no allowance for any time subsequent to her death.

We see no other matters necessary to be discussed. On the former appeal this court said: "The amount of the allowance is a question which rests very largely in the discretion of the superior court, and its action in the matter will not be disturbed on appeal unless it clearly appears that the discretion has been improperly exercised. Of course, as was said in Re Stevens' Estate, 83 Cal. 325, 23 Pac. 380: 'The court is not restricted in making this allowance to a bare support to the widow. Regard should be had * * * to the mode in which she lived during the lifetime of her husband.' The allowance is to be sufficient to provide all the necessaries of life, and this will include all those things which are reasonable and proper for use in the home and in social intercourse, in view of the condition and value of the estate, and the station and surroundings of the family." Tested by these views, the conclusion of the court below cannot be disturbed here, unless we travel beyond the legitimate province of an appellate court. The order appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; HARRISON, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the order of affirmance. If the case was rightly decided on the former appeal, there is no error in the last order of allowance; and, if it was not rightly decided on the former appeal, that decision has, nevertheless, become the law of the case. The contention here is that the superior court erred at the last hearing in disregarding the legacy of $500 a month and the partial distribution of the Buri-Buri rancho. As to the legacy of $500 a month, the superior court rightly understood the decision of this court as containing a direction to disregard it. I think myself that it should have been considered, because it was a provision made by the testator himself for the support of his widow out of the community property, and to that extent I think the former decision of this court was erroneous. As to the Buri-Buri rancho, I do not think the life estate devised to the widow is, upon a proper construction of the will, chargeable with the support of the family. That interest, whether distributed pending the administration or at the close of it, was to go to the widow intact and undiminished by any charge for expenses of administration or support of family.

TEMPLE, J. I dissent. The former appeal, reported in 100 Cal. 597, 35 Pac. 341, was taken by the widow from an order made May 13, 1892. The order was reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings. Such proceedings were had, and a new order was made March 22, 1894, from which the present appeal is prosecuted by the next of kin. Lux died testate in March, 1887, and it is stipulated that his estate is of the value of $10,000,000. Nearly all was community property. His family consisted solely of his widow. The first allowance was for $2,500 per month until the return of the inventory. This sum was paid to her monthly until November, 1891,—four years and eight months. The court ruled, however, that the inventory had been returned August 30, 1888, and that after that time the allowance was paid by the executors at their peril; that is, they would only be allowed a credit for such sum as the court should determine ought to have been allowed. The order of May 13, 1892, was for $1,000 per month from August 30, 1888. From this order the widow took an appeal, and on the appeal contended that the order was erroneous (1) because it was retroactive, and deprived her of the preliminary allowance which she claimed continued until the filing of the inventory of May 16, 1890; and (2) because it only continued the allowance until November 15, 1891, instead of during the progress of the administration. This court held that the order was properly made to operate from August 30, 1888, but reversed the order appealed from, and directed the probate court to make an allowance to the widow to continue during the progress of the settlement of the estate, and in such amount as it shall deem reasonable, without regard to the fact that she may have separate property sufficient for her support.

One trouble with the judgment of reversal and with the opinion is that there was no claim made that Mrs. Lux had any separate property, and in fact she had none except the homestead, which had been conveyed to her before the death of the testator. There was no claim that she was deriving any income from it. It appears, then, that she had sold her life estate in the Buri-Buri rancho, and had realized $137,000 from the sale, and it was this resource which was specially considered, although it is inaccurately called "separate property." The report does not show that it then appeared that there had been a partial distribution of the estate by which the Buri-Buri rancho was set apart to Mrs. Lux, and, with the record used on that appeal before me, I find no evidence that such partial distribution had been made. The case presented was that Mrs. Lux had sold her interest as a devisee, the grantee taking it subject to administration. But a widow is not compelled to sell her interest in the estate in order to procure the means of living. The court, in its opinion, carefully guarded against the contention that, if there had been a partial distribution of the estate, such fact would not affect the right of the widow to her support out of the estate. It said: "Of course, we are not to be understood as holding that the value of the property set apart for the use of the family, under section 1465 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or the income of such property, is not to be considered in determining what is a reasonable allowance to be made from the remaining portion of the estate for the support of the family during the progress of the settlement of the estate; nor that such order for family support, when made, may not be subsequently modified by the court if the condition of the estate or the relation of the family thereto should change; as if, for instance, it should appear that the value of the estate was materially less than shown at the date of the order sought to be modified, or that its indebtedness is greater than was then supposed, or in the event of a partial distribution to the widow or children before the final distribution of the estate." If the court may modify or discontinue an allowance because there had been a partial distribution, such fact should be considered in making the allowance if the distribution was made before the discretion of the court is called into exercise. The record on this appeal shows that there had been a partial distribution by which the Buri-Buri rancho was set apart to Mrs. Lux for life, and also rents which had then accrued, amounting to $33,460. It was assumed that the amount of rents, after deducting expenses, was $27,000. This was in July, 1890. The order of reversal must be construed in the light of the opinion. It cannot be understood as directing the court to fix an allowance which should not be modified, even if those changes should take place which are mentioned in the above extract from the opinion. And so, I think, if, on the rehearing, a different state of facts were shown, there is nothing in the opinion or the judgment which would prevent the court from taking such new facts into consideration.

Respondents argue the case as though the probate court was bound to determine the question as to what allowance will be necessary during the entire progress of the settlement of the estate, at the time the exempt property is set apart to the widow and family. There is no such requirement in the statute, and, if there were, it would have been a very unwise one. The power of the court and its duty extends to the entire period of administration. It must make such allowance—and such only—as shall be necessary during the progress of the settlement of the administration. The general expectation is that the administration will be closed in about one year. The exempt property may be amply sufficient for that period, and utterly insufficient for a further period. If forced to determine the matter when the exempt property is set apart, it would necessarily determine that no further allowance was necessary. So, too, the exempt property may be unproductive for the first year, and after that produce an ample revenue. I think, if the court were to make an allowance for the first year, and none for the second because none was required, it would literally comply with the statute. It would have made such reasonable allowance out of the estate as was necessary for the support of the family during the progress of the settlement of the administration. The duty of the court to make such allowance as may be necessary, and its control over the allowance that it may do so, continues during the entire administration. This proposition is, I think, involved in the above extract from the opinion rendered on the former appeal. The true doctrine was accurately stated in Re Walkerley, 77 Cal. 643, 20 Pac. 150. Upon this subject, the former opinion, taken as a whole, merely holds that the family of the deceased is entitled to a support from the estate during the progress of the settlement of the estate, although the widow or children may have other resources sufficient for that purpose. The probate judge was of the opinion that, under the order made, he was not at liberty to take into consideration the fact that there had been a partial distribution, or the fact that the widow was entitled, under the will, to $500 per month for life. His construction of the opinion was a reasonable one, but, as to the paragraph above set out, the court expressly disclaimed the intent to so hold. I think the probate court in this matter erred. As the court found that $2,500 per month was necessary for the support of the family, and it appears that through the partial distribution and the provision made in the will, of which the widow might have availed herself, the sum of about $1,000 was provided, that sum should be deducted from such monthly allowance.

Mrs. Lux has died since this appeal was taken, and it is claimed that her right to an allowance died with her; that she had no title or vested right which could descend to her heir or pass to her administrator. There is surely much plausibility in this contention. In the former opinion it was suggested that the duty of the husband and father for the support of the wife and children rested upon his estate during administration. If a father give to his wife or minor child money to spend for her or its support, the money belongs to the father or husband until expended. If the money were placed in the hands of the widow or guardian for the minor children, it must be held in trust for that purpose. Upon this theory, logically, when allowance money is paid to the widow, she takes it in trust for the purposes for which it was allowed. Certainly, the widow has no vested interest in an allowance before it is actually made. It is not on the same plane as her distributive share as an heir in the estate. The intent is that the money shall be immediately expended, and shall not swell the estate of the beneficiaries. She is not, before the amount is judicially determined, entitled to any specific sum, or indeed to anything, but only that the probate judge shall determine whether there is a necessity for an allowance. The title to the money paid as an allowance is not settled by section 1468. The provisions of that section would be inapplicable. Take the case where there are minor children who are not the children of the widow, and who have guardians of their person and estate. In such case the court might conclude that the widow's share of the exempt property was ample for her support, but that the children needed an allowance. In such case she would not be entitled to any portion of it, and there can be no doubt of the power of the court to dispose of the fund so that the children would be supported. And in such a case, if one of the children were to die, would its share of the unused allowance go to its estate? In this case there are no children, and the suppositions are made simply by way of an argument that, until there is money due under some valid order, the widow has no vested interest. Ordinarily, the allowance is doled out in such small sums, by means of frequent payments, that this question does not become important; but here the allowance was $30,000 per annum, and payments have been stayed for several years by appeals taken from the order. Therefore, when Mrs. Lux died, a large amount had accrued. Since there were no minor children, we are not forced to consider questions that might be embarrassing under different circumstances. The practice has been that, when the money has been paid, the court is not further concerned about it. It will not require the beneficiaries to account for it, but will assume that it was necessary. So far, therefore, as concerns the money which has been paid,—if not above what is finally adjudged to be necessary,—no question can arise. And I think the same rule must prevail in regard to allowances which had accrued, but which had not been paid, when Mrs. Lux died. Since it was adjudged in the former appeal that the court would not consider other resources in determining what allowance is necessary, if she had been forced to look elsewhere for her means of support while payments were suspended by the appeals, she, or, in case of her death, her estate, should be reimbursed therefor.

It is said that, until the order has become final, she had no vested right. I do not think it necessary to hold that the order must be final in the sense in which a judgment must be final to be used as evidence of a right. If there had been no appeal, it would not have been final, in that sense, until the time for the appeal had elapsed. It was operative, however, and, though the right to claim the benefit of it was suspended by the appeal, it was at all times so far operative that her right to the allowance accrued as each fell due, subject to the chance that the order would be reversed. I think the order appealed from should be modified by reducing the amount of the allowance to $1,500 per month, and, as modified, affirmed.

In re LUX'S ESTATE. (S. F. 51.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 19, 1896.)

EXECUTORS — ACCOUNTING — PAYMENTS WITHOUT ORDERS FOR FAMILY ALLOWANCE.

That payments by executors to testator's widow for a family allowance were without a previous order of court does not deprive them of a right to credit therefor to the extent that the court may find that they were reasonable and proper.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Mateo county; George H. Buck, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Charles Lux, deceased. From an order settling certain accounts of the executors, the next of kin appeal. Affirmed.

J. H. Campbell and D. M. Delmas, for appellants. Mastick, Belcher & Mastick, Garber, Boalt & Bishop, and F. E. Spencer (Wm. Rix, of counsel), for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by the next of kin of Charles Lux, deceased, from an order settling certain accounts of the executors of the will of said deceased. The only items to which objections are pressed are certain disbursements of $2,500 per month to the widow of said deceased, as allowance for her maintenance. A decision was made and an opinion rendered this day in another appeal (In re Lux's Estate [S. F. 137] 45 Pac. 1023), taken by these same appellants, from an order making an allowance of $2,500 per month for maintenance of said widow, by which said order was affirmed; and this present appeal has been presented by appellants mainly upon the theory that the records in the two appeals are substantially the same. If that be so, then the order therein appealed from must be affirmed, upon the authority of the decision in said appeal, S. F. 137. However, the two records are not the same. In the appeal S. F. 137, the main objections urged against the correctness of the allowance were that it appeared that the court did not consider certain moneys received by the widow from certain property of the deceased; but in the present appeal the court expressly found the fact of her receipt of said moneys, and that, "taking into consideration" that fact, the $2,500 per month were "reasonably and properly advanced to said widow as a family allowance, and for her use and support." Moreover, in this appeal, as was held by this court when these matters were before it on former appeals (In re Lux's Estate, 100 Cal. 606, 35 Pac. 345; Miller v. Lux, 100 Cal. 609, 35 Pac. 345, 639), the question is not whether there had been a valid pre-existing order for allowance when the executors made the disbursements to the widow, but whether they were reasonable and proper, and therefore should be allowed in the settlement of their accounts. This court there said: "The fact that such payments were made without a previous order of the court does not deprive the executors of the right to a credit therefor, to the extent that the court found such advances were reasonable and proper." In re Lux's Estate, 100 Cal. 608, 35 Pac. 345. We see no reason for disturbing the action of the court below. The order, decree, and judgment appealed from are affirmed.

BARTLETT v. McGEE. (S. F. 97.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 20, 1896.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—SUFFICIENCY OF TITLE—RECOVERY OF MONEY PAID.

Where a purchase contract gives the vendee 30 days for examination of title, provides for a deposit, and its return if title proves invalid, without specifying the time within which the conveyance is to be made, an unrecorded contract for sale of lands, of which the vendee has no notice, between the vendor and a third person, existing when the contract was made, and which, by mistake, included the same land, is a defect which will render the title invalid, and entitle the vendee to recover the deposit if the vendor fails within a reasonable time to remove the defect.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Action by Samuel Bartlett against James McGee to recover a deposit on a contract for the purchase of land on defendant's failure to furnish a good title. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. A. Moore, for appellant. Whitmore & Schutleff, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. On August 26, 1887, the defendant agreed to sell to A. Bartlett (brother of plaintiff) a certain lot of land situate in Berkeley, Alameda county. At the date of the agreement, A. Bartlett deposited with defendant $950 as a partial payment of the purchase money, on the express condition that it should be returned to him in case defendant's title should prove invalid. The agreement and deposit were evidenced by the following written memorandum, signed by the defendant:

"$350. Berkeley, August 26, 1887. Received of A. Bartlett the sum of three hundred and fifty ($350) dollars, being partial payment on a deposit of eleven hundred dollars in the sale of a certain block in the McGee tract, in Berkeley, bounded by Catherine street, McGee avenue, Bancroft Way, and Allston Way, containing twenty-four lots, 50x130, the purchase price being eleven thousand dollars, and the terms as follows: Deposit, ten per cent.; one-third cash on perfection of title and surrender of deed, and the balance at seven per cent. interest, payable in one and two years; thirty days allowed to search title. If the title proves invalid, the deposit will be returned. The sale is subject to the approval of the owner, James McGee. C. H. McLenathen & Co.

"August 26th. Received $600 additional on above deposit. C. H. McLenathen & Co."

On April 3, 1888, A. Bartlett assigned the agreement, with all his rights thereunder, to plaintiff, who, on April 23, 1888, commenced this action to recover the deposit of $950, on the alleged ground that defendant had failed and refused to make or tender conveyance of a valid title. The judgment was in favor of the plaintiff for the sum demanded; and defendant has appealed from the judgment, and also from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

It is alleged in the complaint that the defects in defendant's title were (1) that the land described in the agreement was subject to a recorded mortgage; and (2) that it was subject to an agreement in writing by and between defendant and one George Bates, executed August 25, 1887 (one day prior to that between defendant and Bartlett), whereby defendant agreed to sell said lot of land to Bates, and to give Bates until October 1, 1887, to examine the title. Upon the expiration of the 30 days allowed plaintiff in which to examine the title, to wit, on September 26, 1887, A. Bartlett met defendant and his counsel, at the request of the latter, for the purpose of paying the first installment of purchase money, receiving deed from defendant, and executing mortgage to defendant to secure deferred payments, as per agreement. Bartlett then produced and tendered to defendant a sufficient sum of money to make the first payment, but on the express condition that defendant should first show satisfaction of the mortgage, but said nothing on that occasion about the contract of sale to Bates. Defendant then admitted the existence of the unsatisfied mortgage of record, but said he could not satisfy it so late in the day (it then being about 5 o'clock p. m.), but that he would satisfy it the next day, and would allow Bartlett to retain sufficient of the money tendered to satisfy the mortgage until defendant should satisfy it. Bartlett declined to accept this proposal, and refused to pay any part of the purchase money, except on the condition upon which he made the tender. On the next day (September 27th) defendant satisfied the mortgage, and tendered to Bartlett a deed of the land, with proper certificate of satisfaction of the mortgage, and demanded of Bartlett payment of the first installment, and that he perform his part of the agreement. Bartlett refused to take the papers thus tendered, or even to hear them read, though he was informed of their general purport. A few days thereafter, about October 3d, Mr. Bates notified Bartlett that he (Bates) held a contract with defendant, dated August 25, 1887, for the purchase of the same lot described in defendant's contract with Bartlett, and that he was about to commence an action against defendant to enforce specific performance thereof. Thereafter, on October 25, 1887, Bartlett demanded of defendant a return of said deposit of $950, and then, for the first time, objected to defendant's title, on the ground of defendant's agreement to sell the land to Bates. Defendant then (as in his answer) denied the existence of the alleged contract with Bates, and refused to return the deposit. Thereafter, on November 11, 1887, Bates commenced an action for the specific performance of his said contract, of which the following is a copy:

"For and in consideration of the sum of one thousand dollars to me in hand paid, and the receipt of which I hereby acknowledge, I covenant and agree to sell to George Bates, of the town of Berkeley, a certain block of land situated in the town of Berkeley, county of Alameda, state of California, and bounded as follows: On the south side by Bancroft Way, on the east by Grant street, on the north by Allston Way, and on the west by McGee avenue, otherwise called 'Hamilton Street,' on the following terms: George Bates shall be allowed till October 1, 1887, to examine title; and, if title is not perfect, then the deposit shall be immediately returned. If the title be good and valid, George Bates shall pay on or before said first day of October the sum of two thousand six hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-six cents ($2,666.-66), and on the first of October, 1888, a further sum of three thousand six hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-seven cents ($3,-666.67), and on the first day of October, 1889, a further sum of three thousand six hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-seven cents ($3,666.67); making in the aggregate the sum of ten thousand dollars in addition to the thousand dollars already paid. Deferred payments shall bear interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum from October the first, 1887, and shall be secured by a mortgage on the property sold. On the completion of the payment to be made on October the 1st, 1887, the two thousand six hundred and sixty-six $^{66}/_{100}$ dollars, I agree to give to said George Bates a grant, bargain, and sale deed to the whole of the block hereinbefore described, free of all liens and incumbrances, except the mortgage to be given by him to me for the balance of the purchase money. And whereas said George Bates intends to subdivide said block, and sell the subdivisions, I hereby agree to release from the effect of the mortgage any portion of the block in behalf of the purchaser of such subdivision, on the following terms: Whenever I shall receive a sum of three hundred and thirty-three dollars, I will release a lot not greater than fifty feet broad by a hundred and thirty feet long, and in the same proportion for larger or smaller lots. I also agree to open the street past the block, called 'Allston Way,' whenever said George Bates shall wish it.

"Witness: R. A. Morse."

Though this contract bears no date, it is admitted that it was executed on August 25, 1887; and there is no question that the description therein plainly embraces the whole lot described in defendant's agreement with Bartlett of August 26, 1887. But it is claimed, and for all purposes of this action may be assumed, that the lot which defendant afterwards agreed to sell to Bartlett was included in the description by mistake. It is further claimed by appellant that the mistake was corrected on August 26, 1887, by canceling the contract of August 25th, and executing another, which excluded the Bartlett lot; but, on sufficient evidence, the court found that the contract of August 25th never was canceled nor reformed, and that no substitute therefor was ever executed. About five months after the commencement of Bates' action, and while it was pending, to wit, on April 23, 1888, the plaintiff commenced this action; and the pendency of Bates' action continued about 17 months after the commencement of this action, to wit, until September 27, 1889, when it was dismissed; but on what terms or for what reason it was dismissed does not appear.

It is admitted, and I think properly, by counsel on both sides, that time of performance by either party was not of the essence of the contract, and that each party was entitled to a reasonable time within which to perform his part, provided he did not absosolutely refuse to perform it before the expiration of such reasonable time; and, accordingly, I think defendant satisfied the mortgage, and removed all objection to his title on that ground, within a reasonable time; but, assuming that the Bates contract was a valid objection to his title, he was bound to cure that defect also before he would have been entitled to performance on the part of Bartlett, unless Bartlett had waived that objection by failing to urge it on September 26, 1887, when the only ground of objection urged by him was the incumbrance by mortgage. As to such waiver, it is sufficient to say that the court properly found that Bartlett did not know of the existence of the Bates contract until after the 26th day of September, 1887, nor until about the 1st day of October, 1887, when he was notified thereof by Bates as aforesaid. On this point the evidence was conflicting, but the preponderance thereof seems to be clearly in favor of the plaintiff. Surely, Bartlett could not have waived a defect in the title before he had notice thereof, actual or constructive. The Bates contract was not recorded.

The court found, under the heading of "Facts," that the defendant did not exercise due or reasonable diligence in clearing his title from the contract of August 25, 1887, or from the effects thereof, nor within a reasonable time make said title good or valid, as provided in his agreement with Bartlett; and in this connection it should be observed that the defendant never offered to clear his title of the cloud cast upon it by the Bates contract. In his answer, he simply denied the existence of the Bates contract, although Bates' suit on that contract had been pending five months before he answered. The court found, as a conclusion of law, "that the making and existence of the contract of August 25, 1887, between defendant and said George Bates, rendered the title to the said land and premises invalid and imperfect, and subjected the same to reasonable doubt and litigation, * * * and not good or valid as contemplated by said agreement." I think this conclusion is fairly deducible from the facts found, and is correct. Turner v. McDonald, 76 Cal. 177, 18 Pac. 262; Sheehy v. Miles, 93 Cal. 288, 28 Pac. 1046; Peckham v. Stewart, 97 Cal. 147, 31 Pac. 928; Reynolds v. Borel, 86 Cal. 538, 25 Pac. 67. To satisfy defendant's contract, the title must not only have been good in point of fact, but it must also have been free from any reasonable objection. It is not sufficient that it may be shown to be good as the result of an action instituted for the purpose of reforming defects in any deed or contract by which it appears to be defective.

In his brief, counsel for appellant contends that several of the findings are "contrary" to the evidence, but there is no specification in his statement on motion for new trial of any particular in which he claims that the findings are not justified by the evidence. The findings of fact cover 12 pages of the transcript, and are numbered from 1 to 16, some of which contain several distinct propositions. The nearest approach to a specification of any particular in which it is claimed the evidence does not justify the findings is the following: "The findings of fact numbered from one to sixteen, inclusive, are contrary to the evidence, and each and every one thereof are contrary to the evidence, in finding precisely to the contrary of the facts proven; and, for like reason, the said decision and the whole thereof is against law." Nevertheless, I have carefully examined the evidence, with the result that, in my opinion, it is sufficient to justify all the findings. The objections to the findings are based upon the assumption that the evidence showed that the cloud upon defendant's title might have been removed by correcting a mistake in the Bates contract; but conceding the mistake, and that the evidence in this case was prima facie sufficient to warrant a decree correcting it, at suit of defendant against Bates, yet, so far as plaintiff was concerned, the cloud remained, and so obscured the title that he was not bound by his contract to accept it, and risk the result of a lawsuit with Bates. That Bates denied the mistake, and insisted upon the validity of his contract, was sufficiently evinced by the pendency of his action against defendant to enforce that contract, which action had been pending five months before this action was commenced. The only answer offered by appellant to this view of the case is a charge of collusion between plaintiff and Bates, of which there is no evidence, and which was positively denied by plaintiff and Bates.

Certain errors in law are specified by appellant in the statement on motion for new trial, and some of them are relied upon here, but none of them are sufficiently plausible to merit special consideration. They, too, are principally founded on the mistaken view of the law that it would be a sufficient defense to prove that the land for which plaintiff contracted was included in the Bates contract by mistake, and that the Bates contract ought to be reformed so as to exclude it. Unfortunately for this theory, the Bates contract could not have been reformed in this action, nor in any action to which Bates was not a party, and possibly not in any action. I think the order and judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order and judgment are affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Ansel Smith, Judge.

Action by Robert B. Oullahan and others against Frank T. Baldwin and others to recover brokerage commissions under contract of defendants with Gaman & Lyon, assigned to plaintiffs. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Mich. Mullaney, Louttit, Woods & Levinsky, Carter & Smith, and F. H. Smith, for appellants. J. C. Campbell and Nicol & Orr, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This action was brought by a real-estate broker to recover commissions for services performed in finding a purchaser of certain real estate. Judgment went for respondents, and this appeal is prosecuted from that judgment, upon a bill of exceptions setting out the evidence. The court is now asked to reverse the judgment upon the evidence, and order a judgment for appellants; but it has no power to make such an order upon this record, for the findings of fact are against appellants, and it is only when those findings are favorable to an appellant that judgment may be ordered in his favor. Here those findings are attacked as unsupported by the evidence, and under such circumstances a new trial is all the relief that could be granted by this court, conceding the appeal to be meritorious. The case has been before the court in the past (100 Cal. 648, 35 Pac. 310); and a new trial was then ordered upon practically the same grounds relied upon by this appeal, namely, the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings of fact. At that time the case was carefully considered from the standpoint of both law and fact, and for that reason we deem it unnecessary to now express our views in detail. In various particulars the evidence is materially different from that disclosed by the record upon the previous appeal; hence the doctrine of the law of the case cannot be invoked. And, weighing and testing this evidence as to its sufficiency, we have concluded that the findings of fact have sufficient support therein. Upon the most material issues of fact we find a sharp conflict, and as to those issues the evidence of respondents is now much more direct and explicit than that given at the previous trial.

The court made the following findings of fact: "That defendants were at all times from the making of such power of attorney to Gaman & Lyon to and including the whole of the 22d day of September, 1887, ready, able, and willing to sell said lands to said Barrows on the terms and conditions stated in said power of attorney, and were ready, able, and willing to enter into a written agreement with said Barrows for the sale of said premises; that said Barrows was not ready or willing to purchase said lands on the terms and conditions set forth in said power of attorney, nor was he at any time ready or willing to pay defendants for said premises on the terms and conditions set forth in said power of attorney made by defendants to Gaman & Lyon." Again: "That defendants then requested said Barrows to enter into a written contract with them for the purchase of said premises in accordance with the terms and conditions set forth in the power of attorney by them made with said Gaman & Lyon, and then demanded payment of $10,000 in accordance with the terms of said power of attorney; that said Barrows refused to make or enter into any agreement with defendants for the purchase of said premises." These findings of fact were supported by the evidence of Judge Budd and respondent McDougall, and, even conceding findings of fact looking in the opposite direction would not be disturbed by this court as being without support in the evidence, still such concession gives appellants no help here. The record now discloses that Dr. Barrows withdrew from all negotiations at noon upon September 22d. Hence any acts of his brokers after that time would avail nothing in proving Barrows a purchaser ready, able, and willing to purchase under the terms of the contract. For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

PACKARD v. CRAIG. (L. A. 102.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 20, 1896.)

ELECTION CONTEST—NEW TRIAL—APPEAL—EVIDENCE TO SUSTAIN JUDGMENT—REVIEW—EVIDENCE—TESTIMONY OF ELECTION OFFICERS—TALLY SHEETS.

1. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1111–1127, regulating election contests, are special and summary; and, the only remedy provided therein for a party aggrieved by the decision of the superior court being an appeal to the supreme court, a motion for a new trial cannot be made.

2. The objection that the judgment in a contested election case is not sustained by the evidence cannot be made on appeal, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1126, authorizing such appeal subject to rules of law regulating appeals in other cases, unless the appeal has, as required in other cases, been taken within 60 days after judgment.

3. In a contested election case, testimony of election officers as to the regularity of the election, of the count of ballots, and of the tally sheets, and the tally sheets themselves, are admissible.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Kern county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by N. R. Packard against F. W. Craig. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order refusing a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Ahern, J. W. P. Laird, and Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for appellant. N. E. Conklin, Alvin Fay, and J. E. Patten, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an election contest brought by Packard, plaintiff, against Craig, defendant, to determine the right between said parties to the office of county clerk of Kern county. Judgment went for the defendant, Craig; and plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and also from the refusal of the court to grant the motion for a new trial, which Packard made, or attempted to make. The appeal from the judgment was not taken until more than 60 days after the judgment was rendered.

The main point for a reversal made by the appellant is that the decision is not justified by the evidence. But respondent contends that the evidence cannot be reviewed here—First, because the appeal from the judgment was not taken until 60 days after it was rendered; and, second, because in this procedure a motion for a new trial cannot be entertained. He objected to any proceedings being taken with respect to the motion for a new trial, and one of the grounds for denying it was that a motion for a new trial had no place in this action. The contention of the respondent that we cannot here review the evidence must be sustained. This question was thoroughly considered and disposed of by the court in the case of Dorsey v. Barry, 24 Cal. 449. That case reviewed the act of 1850 upon the subject of contested election proceedings, to be found in Wood, Dig. 380–382. That act was the same as the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure upon the subject, commencing at section 1111, and extending to section 1127. There are some few verbal differences between the said act of 1850 and the said provisions of the Code, but substantially, and almost literally, they are the same. In Dorsey v. Barry the court said, "The act itself provides a complete mode of procedure, leaving but little, if anything, dependent upon implication, or the common law powers of the court." The court, after reviewing the whole question, and saying that in any event the proceeding would be void unless the special term provided for in that act had been extended, then said: "Even in the event that the court was still holding the special term, the order granting the petitioner's motion for a new trial was without authority and void. The statute has not made provision for the reexamination of the issues of law or of fact in that court, but has expressly provided for the taking of an appeal." The court declares that the proceeding is a summary one, wholly statutory in its nature, and intended to be expeditious, and not incumbered by the delays which would be occasioned by such proceeding as a motion for a new trial. The fact that the county court then had jurisdiction of the matter, while such jurisdiction is now in the superior court, does not affect the rule there declared. That decision was approved in Casgrave v. Howland, 24 Cal. 457, and the principle restated as follows: "In Dorsey v. Barry, 24 Cal. 449, we held that the proceedings authorized by article 6 of the act to regulate elections are special and summary, and that no remedy can be had under the provisions of that article, except such as is therein expressly or by necessary implication provided. We also held that a new trial was not authorized by the provisions of the article in question, and that the remedy of a party who is dissatisfied with the judgment of the county court is by appeal only." In People v. Rosborough, 29 Cal. 417, the court, in distinguishing a proceeding in insolvency from a contested election case, say: "We held in Dorsey v. Barry, 24 Cal. 449, relied upon in argument, that the jurisdiction in contested election cases was special,—a statute creation; that the proceedings were intended to be summary, and that the subject-matter made it essential that they should be so in order to make them of any avail, and that the special procedure was withal so complete in itself that it was manifestly the intention of the legislature that the litigation should be kept to the method which the act prescribed, and end where it ended; and, therefore, that that class of cases was not within the scope of the 193d section of the practice act, relating to new trials." We have been referred to, and have been able to discover, no subsequent case overruling or inconsistent with the cases above cited. Mr. Hayne, in his work upon New Trials (volume 1, par. 5), says that from his examination "the decision in Dorsey v. Barry has never been disturbed, and it may therefore be taken to be the settled rule that there can be no motion for a new trial of an election contest." We have not been referred to any case, since the decision in Dorsey v. Barry, where the court has been asked to entertain a motion for a new trial in such a case; and it will be observed that, in nearly all the other special and summary statutory provisions, express authority is given to use the proceeding of a motion for a new trial, while in the case of a contested election the appealing party is confined to an appeal from the judgment. The cases cited by appellant are cases which merely involve the constitutional right of this court to entertain an appeal from a judgment in a contested election case. We therefore hold that the court below was right in refusing to entertain the motion for a new trial in the case at bar. Section 1126 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "either party aggrieved by the judgment of the court may appeal therefrom to the supreme court, as in other cases of appeal thereto from the superior court"; and therefore an appeal from the superior court to the supreme court, in a contested election case, is subject to the provision that upon such appeal the point that the decision is not sustained by the evidence cannot be raised unless such appeal shall have been taken within 60 days after the judgment. Therefore in the case at bar we cannot inquire whether or not the judgment is supported by the evidence, and there is no doubt that the findings support the judgment.

The only question before us, therefore, is whether or not the court erred in admitting certain evidence offered by the respondent and objected to by the appellant. That evidence was of this character: The respondent called a number of persons as witnesses who were officers of election at several precincts in the county in which the election here involved took place, who testified that the elections at the said precincts were properly conducted; that the ballots were properly counted, and the tally sheets properly filled up, etc. Respondent also introduced, in one or two instances, the tally sheets themselves. We cannot say that such evidence was not admissible. Whatever weight might or should be given to such evidence, it certainly had some relevancy to the matters at issue, and cannot be said to be incompetent or immaterial. The fact which the appellant endeavors to show is that a count of the ballots themselves, received by the court in evidence, shows a majority for the appellant; but, under the views above expressed, that fact cannot be inquired into here. There is nothing in the findings themselves which shows that state of facts. Therefore, upon the face of the record as it presents itself to us in this case, we can see no reason for reversing the judgment. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. COMYNS. (Cr. 133.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 21, 1896.)

GRAND LARCENY — EVIDENCE — CONVICTION OF LESSER OFFENSE.

Defendant was indicted for grand larceny. The evidence showed that a large number of persons were in the house from which the property was stolen, after the theft; that the value of the articles missing was $150; that the value of the articles traced to defendant's possession was less than $50. Held error to withdraw from the jury the question of defendant's guilt of the crime of petit larceny, under Pen. Code, § 487, defining petit larceny to be the theft of articles of which the value does not exceed $50.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Edward A. Belcher, Judge.

Frank Comyns was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals. Reversed.

Robert Ferral and Edward M. Comyns, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

HENSHAW, J. Defendant was convicted of grand larceny. Upon this appeal he urges but one ground for reversal. That is an alleged error of the trial court in instructing the jury. The court charged the jury as follows: "If you are not satisfied that he [defendant] is guilty of the offense charged against him, your verdict will be not guilty." Thereupon the attorney for the defendant asked, "Does your honor say to the jury that petit larceny is not embraced in the charge?" To which the court answered, "Precisely." To this ruling defendant's counsel entered his exception, and urges it as error upon this appeal. The jury returned a verdict, "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty as charged." It appeared by the record that defendant and one James Goggins were charged with having upon the 22d day of August, 1895, stolen various articles, principally jewelry, which articles in the aggregate exceeded in value the sum of $50. Defendant demanded and obtained a separate trial. Upon the trial it was shown that the articles in question were taken from the house of Charles F. Tay. Neither Tay nor his family was living in the house upon August 22d, nor had they been for some time prior thereto. The house was in charge of a Chinese servant. Upon the evening of August 22d, Tay was summoned to his home by a telephone message. Upon his arrival he found several people in the house, who were gathered there by the commotion created by the Chinaman. "There was a good deal of confusion upstairs. The bureau was open, the contents on the floor, the mattresses turned up." The owner of the property testified that in his opinion the value of all of the articles which he missed was about $150. He testified further that, as to most of them, he had seen them for the last time during the week preceding that in which he discovered their loss. The defendant, Comyns, was seen in Mr. Tay's yard about half-past 2 o'clock of the afternoon of the day when Mr. Tay was first notified of his loss. So far as the evidence shows, he was alone. The Chinese servant testified that he left the house at about a quarter of 2 o'clock in the afternoon of that day, and, upon his return, found that the house had been entered, and some of the rooms ransacked and rifled. He had last seen any of the missing articles four or five days preceding the discovery of their loss. Upon the 7th day of September, following, defendant was arrested while in company with the said Goggins. Of the property taken, there were traced into or through the possession of defendant an opera glass, a ring, and a pistol, of an aggregate value far below $50.

Under this state of the evidence, was the court justified in withholding from the jury the consideration of the lesser offense of petit larceny? There are several separate and distinct offenses which are grouped by our Code under the common designation of grand larceny. If the property stolen is taken from the person of another, then, without regard to its value, the crime is grand larceny. If the property taken is a horse, cow, mule, goat, sheep, etc., then, without regard to the value of the animal, the crime is grand larceny. In all other cases the value of the property taken becomes an essential element in determining the offense. When the property taken is of a value exceeding $50, the crime is grand larceny. When the property taken does not exceed in value $50, the crime is petit larceny. Pen. Code, § 487. In this case, conceding the defendant to have committed the crime of larceny, it was essential for the jury to determine the value of the property which he stole. If, as a result of their deliberations, they believed the defendant to have stolen property exceeding in value $50, their verdict should have been guilty of the offense charged in the information. If, however, they believed that the property stolen by the defendant did not exceed in value the sum of $50, defendant would not have been entitled to an acquittal at their hands, but, under proper instructions from the court, they should have found him guilty of the lesser offense. All this is undisputed and indisputable, but it is argued that, because the evidence for the people showed without conflict that the property stolen did exceed in value the sum of $50, the court was justified in removing from the jury the consideration of the lesser offense of petit larceny embraced within the graver charge. But, making for the purpose of this consideration the utmost concession which could be claimed by the people, namely, that the jury was conclusively bound by the evidence to find that the property stolen exceeded in value $50, and that they could not, in the exercise of their legal discretion in weighing evidence, find it to be of any less value, still no justification is shown for the refusal of the court to instruct upon the lesser offense. If, for example, but a single article had been stolen, a diamond, and the only evidence in the case was that the diamond greatly exceeded in value the sum of $50, some force would appear in the argument that the defendant, if the jury believed he stole that article, was guilty of the crime of grand larceny, and some reason would appear in justification of the court's refusal under such circumstances to submit to their consideration the lesser offense. But in this case only a small portion in value of the articles stolen was traced to the defendant. The evidence shows that at the time the owner's attention was called to the loss of his property, and at the time when he entered the house and made personal discovery of his loss, the house was in confusion, and people were in and about it. The evidence also shows that most of the articles had not been seen by the owner, or by any one else, for several days before the date upon which it is charged this defendant stole them. It was for the jury to say and decide whether the defendant was guilty of a larceny of articles in value exceeding $50. Under the circumstances indicated, they might have been satisfied that the defendant stole the property found in his possession, and might have doubted whether the theft of the other articles not traced to his possession was to be attributed to him, or to some other criminal acting independently of him. We do not here mean to imply that the evidence presented to the jury was not sufficient to warrant them in finding the defendant guilty of the offense of grand larceny. It was quite sufficient; but that is not the question. They might not have been satisfied, or have entertained a reasonable doubt of his guilt of the graver offense, and have been entirely of the opinion that he was guilty of the lesser. But the consideration of the lesser offense was withdrawn from them by the court. In so doing, it in effect charged the jury that if they believed the defendant to have stolen any of the property, whether much or little in value, they must find him guilty of having stolen property exceeding in value $50. They were thus denied the right to consider any of the other facts or circumstances in the case. If, in other words, they believed that the defendant had stolen the few articles found in his possession, and no others, and that these articles so stolen by him were of a less value than $50, nevertheless, under the instructions of the court, it would have been their duty to render the verdict which they did. Under the facts and circumstances of this case, therefore, it was clearly error for the court to withdraw from the consideration of the jury the question of the defendant's guilt of the lesser crime of petit larceny, embraced within the one charged; and the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. It is so ordered.

HIGGINS v. WILLIAMS et al. (S. F. 165.[1]

INJURY TO EMPLOYE—NEGLIGENCE OF MANAGER—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. The negligence of a foreman and manager, under whose direction and superintendence a steam shovel was set up and put to work, in failing to have a key put in a pin to hold it in place, which defect he knew of, or should have known of, and by reason of which a bucket fell from it onto an employé working with the shovel, is the negligence of the master.

2. The employer is none the less liable for the negligence of a foreman and manager to whom he had intrusted the construction of a sewer, in setting up and putting to work a steam shovel in an unsafe condition, because the employer did not own the shovel, and did not know that the manager had hired it and put it to work.

3. An employé working in a trench, in excavating, is not precluded from recovering for injury from the falling of a bucket from the steam shovel because a pin had not been made secure by a key, though one outside the trench could have seen that the key had not been put in; he having been hurriedly put into the trench, without opportunity to examine the shovel, and having a right to rely on the machine being all right.

4. An instruction, in an action against a master by a servant for injury, that the duty which defendant owed plaintiff, to furnish safe machinery, was a personal one, which he could not escape by intrusting it to an employé, cannot be complained of because not stating that defendant was only required to furnish "reasonably safe" machinery, as the court was not passing on the degree of safety required.

5. A requested instruction, that "I also instruct you that it was not needful to instruct plaintiff, although a minor of eighteen years, that if a bucket of 500 pounds weight should fall on him it would hurt or injure him," may be refused, because not a statement of law.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Henry C. Higgins against C. B. Williams and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellants. J. C. Needham and C. L. Russell, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff, a minor 18 years of age, was employed by defendants in digging a trench for the construction of a sewer in the city of Modesto. While so employed, he was seriously injured by the falling of an iron bucket which was being used to hoist the earth from the bottom of the trench. He brought this action, by his guardian ad litem, to recover damages for the injuries sustained, and recovered a verdict, on which judgment was entered, for the sum of $3,000; from which judgment, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal.

Two points only are made for a reversal: First, that the court erred in denying defendants' motion for a nonsuit; second, that the court erred in its instructions to the jury.

The motion for nonsuit was based upon two grounds: (1) That plaintiff had failed to prove that defendants knew of any defect in the machine by which the bucket was hoisted; and (2) that the injury to plaintiff was the result of the fault of a fellow servant. It appears that defendants had entered into a contract to construct a system of sewers in the city of Modesto, and were engaged in performing the contract. They had intrusted the management of the work to one Arthur R. Wilson, who was their foreman, and had authority to hire and discharge and direct the men employed. At the point where the plaintiff was injured, the trench had been sunk to such a depth that it was necessary to have the earth hoisted by machinery; and, to do this hoisting, Wilson, without the knowledge of defendants, caused a machine known as the "Carson Trench Machine" to be set up and used. The machine was operated by a steam engine, and by it the buckets, when filled with earth, were hoisted, and, after being emptied, were lowered back, to be again filled. The trench was divided into sections about seven feet long and five or six feet wide, and in each section two buckets were used, and two men were employed. The machine was set up and started in the afternoon of one day, to see if everything was in order; and the next day it was started with a full crew, and in the afternoon of that day the accident happened. About 1 or half past 1 o'clock of that day, plaintiff was directed by Wilson to go to work in the trench where the machine was, to fill empty buckets. As directed, he went to work, and about two hours thereafter one of the filled buckets which was being hoisted fell and struck him, causing the injuries complained of. One Daniels, who was working in the same section with plaintiff, was called as a witness for him, and, after describing the machine, stated how the accident happened, as follows: "I made an investigation right then as to the cause of the accident. I found that the pin that held the headblock had come out, which was the immediate cause of the accident. That is the headblock that held the main cable. * * * The pin in that block came out, letting the cable down, and the tubs fell, of course. When the pin came out, the cable was not detached altogether from the block. The cable was over this block, and the tubs were being hoisted; and while they were being hoisted the pin came out, the block dropped, and the cables gave way, and the tubs fell. That pin did not break. It came out. A key was supposed to hold it there. There was no key in the pin. If there had been, it would not have come out. Nothing was supposed to hold the block there after the pin came out. * * * Mr. Wilson, the superintendent, said right after the accident that he knew the key was out. He said he didn't think the pin would come out; that he calculated to have a key put in there, and it rather slipped his mind. * * * I saw the Carson trench machine partly set up. In a machine they generally put a key in the end of the pin. I did not look to see whether any pin was in there, in the block, until after the accident occurred. The pin was out of the block then. I did not look at any time to see whether there was a key in the pin, but immediately I looked for the key to see if there was any key there. * * * Before we went into the trench that block was in plain sight on the machine, where we could see it. * * * I saw the block in plain sight, or could have if I had looked at it. I had as good an opportunity to see it as anybody, and so did Mr. Higgins, I suppose. * * * The bucket struck Mr. Higgins first, before it struck the empty bucket. It hit Mr. Higgins apparently back of the shoulders,—right on the shoulders. Mr. Higgins had been standing in the corner as close as he could get. His shovel was standing right up against this partition, and he turned and put his hand upon the shovel just as the bucket fell. It struck Higgins first, and then struck the empty bucket. It just struck the top of my head as it came down, and also struck Higgins on the shoulder and knocked him down,—a bucket filled with earth, maybe two feet deep. He was found with the bucket on top of him, resting partly upon the empty bucket and partly upon him. The bucket fell sixteen or eighteen feet." The above statements were corroborated by other witnesses, and, among other things, the plaintiff testified: "I did not know anything about the condition of the pin or cable before I went into the trench. I thought the machinery was all right, or Mr. Wilson would not send me in there. * * * I didn't have any opportunity to examine the machinery prior to going into the trench. Mr. Wilson did not invite me to look at the machinery. He invited us to hurry up. He said he wanted to start the machine, and he told us to get right down." It was also proved that the pin which held the block was about 1¼ inches in diameter and 4 or 5 inches long; and at its lower end was a small hole, through it, to put a key in, to prevent it from working up. "It was such an arrangement as is usually held fast by a key, and not left loose." The pin, when in place, stood about 10 or 15 degrees from perpendicular.

1. Upon the facts proved, the first question is, did the court err in denying the motion for nonsuit? The rule of law is well settled in this state that it is the duty of an employer to furnish his employés reasonably suitable and safe machinery and appliances with which to do the work required of them, and keep such machinery and appliances in repair and order. And it is a duty which cannot be delegated to another, so as to exonerate the employer from liability to an employé who is injured by the omission to perform the duty, or by its negligent performance. In Fuller v. Jewett, 80 N. Y. 52, the court said: "In respect to such act or duty, the servant who undertakes or omits to perform it is the representative of the master, and not a mere co-servant with the one who sustains the injury. The act or omission is the act or omission of the master, irrespective of the grade of the servant whose negligence caused the injury, or of the fact whether it was or was not practicable for the master to act personally, or whether he did or did not do all that he personally could do, by selecting competent servants, or otherwise, to secure the safety of his employés." And see Sanborn v. Trading Co., 70 Cal. 265, 11 Pac. 711, where the above language was quoted approvingly. In Daves v. Southern Pac. Co., 98 Cal. 24, 32 Pac. 710, the court said: "If the act was one which it was the duty of the employer to perform towards its servants, and one of them negligently performed it to the injury of another servant in the same common employment, then the offending servant in the performance of such duty acted as the representative or agent of his employer, for which the employer is responsible." And to the same effect are the cases of Elledge v. Railway Co., 100 Cal. 282, 34 Pac. 720; Nixon v. Lead Co., 102 Cal. 458, 36 Pac. 803; and Mullin v. Horseshoe Co., 105 Cal. 77, 38 Pac. 535. It clearly appears that the machine was set up and put to work under the direction and superintendence of Mr. Wilson, who was the foreman and manager for the defendants. It was defective and unsafe, because no key was put in the pin to hold it in place; and hence the accident. Wilson knew of this defect, or should have known of it, and his knowledge was the knowledge of defendants. In performing his duty he acted, not as a fellow servant with plaintiff, but as the representative or agent of defendants, and for his negligence they are responsible. It is urged for appellants "that plaintiff had as good a chance to see that the key was out as any one," and hence that he should not recover. But he did not know that the key was out, and no opportunity to examine the machine was given him. He was taken from other work in another part of the town, and hurriedly put into the trench to fill buckets with earth. He relied on the machine being all right, and had a right to so rely. Magee v. Railroad Co., 78 Cal. 430, 21 Pac. 114. Besides, unless he also knew, or ought to have known, of the danger to which he was exposed by working near the machine, he cannot be said to have recklessly exposed himself to such danger, or to have voluntarily assumed the risks of working there. Sanborn v. Trading Co., 70 Cal. 261, 11 Pac. 710; Colbert v. Rankin, 72 Cal. 197, 13 Pac. 491; Gisson v. Schwabacher, 99 Cal. 419, 34 Pac. 104; Mullin v. Horseshoe Co., 105 Cal. 83, 38 Pac. 535. It follows, in our opinion, that the motion for nonsuit was properly denied.

2. Appellants complain of instructions numbered 2, 4, and 5, given to the jury at the request of the plaintiff, and insist that they were erroneous and misleading. The instructions referred to read as follows: (2) "The duty which the defendants owed to the plaintiff to furnish him with safe machinery and appliances, was a personal one, and such a duty as the law will not permit them to escape by trusting it to an employé who negligently performs it." (4) "To render defendants liable to plaintiff in damages, it is not necessary that they should have had actual knowledge of the unsafeness of the said machine. The proof is sufficiently made out by plaintiff when it is shown that said machine was defective and unsafe in such respect that, if a proper inspection of it had been made by defendant, such unsafeness and defectiveness would have been ascertained in time to prevent the injury. If the unsafeness was conspicuous, defendants will be presumed to have had knowledge of it." (5) "The duty of the master to furnish safe machinery is not affected by the fact that he does not own the machinery furnished. It is sufficient if it is used by such employer. The duties which an employer owes to his servants, and which he is required to perform, are to furnish suitable machinery and appliances by which the service is to be performed, and to keep them in repair and order; to exercise ordinary care in the selection and retention of sufficient and competent servants to properly conduct the business in which the servant is employed; and to make such provisions for the safety of employés as will reasonably protect them against the dangers incident to their employment. The performance of these duties cannot be shifted by an employer to a servant, so as to avoid responsibility for the injury caused to another servant by his omission." It is objected that instructions 2 and 5 were erroneous because they implied that defendants were required to furnish safe machinery for plaintiff to work with, when in fact they were only required to furnish reasonably safe machinery. But the court was not passing upon the question suggested. It simply, in effect, told the jury that the duty of defendants to furnish safe machinery was a personal one, which could not be delegated so as to relieve them from responsibility for its negligent performance, and in this there was no error. It is further objected that instructions 4 and 5 were erroneous because they, in effect, told the jury that, to render the defendants liable, it was not necessary that they should have had actual notice of the unsafeness of the machine, or have been the owners of it. And it is said that they never saw the machine, or knew of its being used, until after the accident, and never authorized its use, and that plaintiff had as good an opportunity to see that the key was out of place as defendants, even if present. It was entirely immaterial whether defendants owned the machine, or knew of its use, before the accident occurred, or not. They lived in San Francisco, and intrusted the doing of the work to Mr. Wilson. They paid for the transportation of the machine to Modesto, and for the use of it, at the rate of $8 per day, during all the time it was used on this contract,—some three months. Wilson testified that in his judgment the use of the machine was the best thing to do, and he did it. His use of it was therefore defendants' use of it, and his knowledge of its defects their knowledge. In Stephenson v. Southern Pac. Co., 93 Cal. 561, 29 Pac. 234, it is said: "The rule is, of course, well settled that the master is civilly liable for the wrongful or negligent act of the servant, committed while in his service and within the scope of his employment; that is, in the transaction of the master's business." And the following language is quoted with approval from the opinion delivered in Cosgrove v. Ogden, 49 N. Y. 257: "The test of the master's responsibility for the act of the servant is, not whether such act was done according to the instructions of the master to the servant, but whether it was done in the prosecution of the business that the servant was employed by the master to do." The instructions, as given, were, in our opinion, proper, and without prejudice to defendants. The court refused to give the first instruction asked by defendants, and this refusal is assigned as error. The instruction did not include, as one of the conditions upon which plaintiff could not maintain his action, that he knew, or might have known, that his employment involved danger to himself. This was an obvious defect in the instruction, and the refusal to give it was therefore not error. See cases before cited. All that was material in instruction No. 6 was given in the exact language asked by defendants. The part omitted was as follows: "I also instruct you that it was not needful to instruct the plaintiff, although a minor of eighteen years, that, if a bucket of five hundred pounds weight should fall on him, it would hurt or injure him." This was not a statement of any rule of law, and the failure to give it did not constitute error. The court refused to give instruction No. 8 asked by defendants, and this refusal is also assigned as error. In Brymer v. Southern Pac. Co., 90 Cal. 496, 27 Pac. 371, an instruction in the same words was asked and refused, and the refusal was held to be error. In that case the injury resulted from the breaking of a chain used in raising a derailed and wrecked car, and the defect was latent and concealed, while in this case the defect consisted in failing to put a key in a pin or bolt, and was patent. In some respects, therefore, the instruction was not applicable to the facts of this case. In so far, however, as it was applicable, the law declared in it was clearly stated in other instructions given, and we think that was sufficient. We discover, therefore, no prejudicial error in the refusal. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

MINI v. MINI. (Sac. 53.)

DIVORCE—COMPLAINT—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY.

An allegation in a complaint for divorce that plaintiff is possessed of "considerable property, both real and personal, situate and being in the state of California," plaintiff's separate property, is sufficient to admit of evidence of a definite description, there being no special demurrer, but a default.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Solano county; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by Damiana Mini against Erminia Mini. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. G. W. Dinkelspiel and A. Ruef, for appellant. Coghlan & Harvey, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action for divorce on the ground of adultery. After the statement of a complete cause of action for a divorce on the ground of adultery the complaint contains the following: "That the plaintiff is possessed of considerable property, both real and personal, situate and being in the said state of California, all of which is the separate property of the plaintiff, having been acquired by him before his said marriage, or acquired by him subsequent thereto, from the rents, issues, and profits thereof." The prayer of the complaint is for a divorce, "and that it be adjudged and decreed therein that the said defendant has no right, title, claim, or interest in or to said property owned and possessed by plaintiff, or any part thereof." Summons having been regularly served on the defendant in the county of Solano, in which the action was brought, she failed to appear by demurrer or otherwise, and judgment for the relief prayed for was rendered against her by default. The judgment describes the separate property of the plaintiff, in which it was adjudged that the defendant had no title nor interest, with great particularity and certainty. The defendant brings this appeal from the judgment, and the only ground upon which a reversal is asked is that the complaint does not describe the separate property of the plaintiff with sufficient certainty. Conceding that, in respect to the alleged separate property, the description thereof was not sufficiently definite or certain, the defect was waived by defendant's default and failure to demur. Code Civ. Proc. §434; Gimmy v. Gimmy, 22 Cal. 633; Kelly v. Murphy, 70 Cal. 560, 12 Pac. 467. In the absence of a special demurrer, the allegation was a sufficient foundation for evidence of a definite description of the property. Bates v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 484, 30 Pac. 605; San Francisco v. Pennie, 93 Cal. 468, 29 Pac. 66; Schluter v. Harvey, 65 Cal. 158, 3 Pac. 659; Garner v. Marshall, 9 Cal. 269. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

LOVE v. ANCHOR RAISIN VINEYARD CO. (S. F. 256.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 21, 1896.)

CORPORATIONS — NOTICE TO OFFICER — DECLARATIONS OF PRESIDENT—SPECIFICATIONS OF ERROR—EXCEPTIONS.

1. A specification of insufficiency of evidence, "that the evidence clearly showed that the total amount due * * * was not the sum of ——, but was the sum of ——, and no larger or greater sum whatever," is insufficient.

2. Notice to one who is secretary, bookkeeper, and director of a corporation, that a note given by it had been assigned, is notice to the corporation.

3. In an action by the assignee of a note given by a corporation to its president, declarations of the president as to the amount due at the time of the transfer are not admissible against the corporation.

4. An exception, "To which said charge, and the whole thereof, defendant then and there duly excepted," is not sufficiently specific.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Louisa P. Love against the Anchor Raisin Vineyard Company, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. F. Hanlon, for appellant. Thos. A. McGowan, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to recover upon a promissory note, made by the corporation defendant August 4, 1892, for $6,261.29, payable one day after date to the order of John Conly, in gold coin, with interest at 8 per cent. per annum, and indorsed by the payee thereof to plaintiff. Plaintiff had a verdict for $5,532.38, upon which verdict judgment was entered. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The evidence embodied in the statement on motion for a new trial shows that the note was indorsed to the plaintiff herein after maturity, viz. on October 4, 1893. Plaintiff, in her complaint, admitted the payment of certain sums of money to Conly on account of the note, and at the trial it was shown and admitted that those payments amounted to $1,687.55. They were indorsed upon the note, and tallied with a ledger account of defendant in evidence, in which, under bills payable, the note was entered as a liability in favor of the payee, Conly, and the several payments credited to defendant in said account on account of money, etc., paid to said Conly. This is all plain and simple, and the verdict of the jury is founded on this basis. Defendant, however, produced another account, kept with Conly personally, in which he stands charged with a balance of, say, $2,667.80, which defendant claims should have been deducted from the balance due on the note, thus reducing the verdict by that amount. We will refer hereafter to this individual account with Conly, and to the circumstances which probably actuated the jury in concluding that it was not entitled to be treated as a payment on the note.

Upon the close of the testimony the court instructed the jury, in part, as follows: "Gentlemen of the Jury: This is a question of accounting and bookkeeping. You have heard the evidence in this case, and you will have to ascertain from it, as best you can, the amount of money that is due to the plaintiff here. That the defendant owes the plaintiff is admitted by the defendant; but the question is, how much? The defendant claims that the amount claimed by the plaintiff is excessive, and that it is entitled to certain credits thereon, in consequence of demands which they had as against John Conly, who was the payee of the note transferred to the plaintiff. If you should find from the evidence that any of these items which counsel have called to your attention were designed and intended at the time to have been payments on account, or to the credit of the note, and that such items were agreed upon and determined before the date of the indorsement of the note to the plaintiff, which was October 4, 1893, they would be entitled to have them credited upon the amount due upon the note,—principal and interest. If you should conclude that they are not entitled to any of these credits, then it would be your simple duty to ascertain the amount of principal and interest due, after deducting the amount of the cash payments which are contained on the back of the note." The propriety of this instruction depended upon the evidence in the case. That evidence tended to show: (1) That from the formation of the corporation up to, say, December, 1893, John Conly was president, director, general manager, and a large stockholder of the defendant. (2) That during 1892 and 1893 A. S. Neal was secretary of the corporation defendant. (3) That John Conly, the president, had advanced money to the corporation until on August 4, 1892, the corporation was indebted to him in the sum of $6,261.29, for which sum the note in question was given, and the account balanced upon the corporation books; the note being entered in the account of bills payable, and the sums as credited on the back of the note being charged in said last mentioned account. (4) Plaintiff, being aware that the note was overdue, and hence that any payments thereon were liable to be offset against the note, on or about the date of the transfer to her, and before such transfer, applied, through her husband, James Love, to A. S. Neal, the secretary of the defendant, to know if the indorsements on the note constituted all the offsets thereto, and was informed that they did, except that there might be one or two small payments not indorsed; that the amount due was about $5,000; that he and Conly had compared it recently, and found it exact. Two payments, aggregating $250, were not then on the note, but were indorsed thereon subsequently. (5) Defendant had notice of the transfer of the note to plaintiff on the 4th or 5th of October, 1893. (6) The individual account of Conly with defendant on the 4th day of October, 1893, the date of the assignment of the note to plaintiff, showed a balance in favor of said Conly amounting to some $1,143.86. This balance occurred in this wise: Some time in 1892 a resolution was passed by the directors of defendant allowing Conly a salary of $100 per month, as general manager, from the organization of the company, which salary on the 31st day of July, 1893, aggregated $3,416.66, which sum was placed to his credit in the books of the company. After the transfer of the note to plaintiff, and on the 15th day of October, 1893, the directors of defendant, with the consent of Conly, passed a resolution rescinding the resolution to allow said Conly a salary of $100 per month, and the sum of $3,466.16 so standing to his credit was charged back to him; thus leaving a balance in favor of the corporation, which, together with $420 charged him in December, 1893, on account of two assessments, aggregated $2,119.80. The reasons given by defendant for the rescission of the resolution allowing a salary to Conly were: (1) That there was an understanding with the stockholders of defendant that all of its officers should serve without pay. (2) That the resolution allowing the salary was passed when but three directors were present. It does not appear, so far as we have discovered, of how many directors the board consisted. The minute book of defendant was missing, and was claimed to have been lost. Under these circumstances, we are not surprised that the jury failed to credit defendant with the balance thus shown in its favor. It looked too much like an effort, after the transfer of the note, to saddle upon the plaintiff an offset not justly chargeable to her, and which defendant had not intended to so charge until after the transfer of the note. In view of the testimony, the instruction of the court to the jury was proper.

We have thus stated in a general way the tenor of the evidence, and its sufficiency to support the verdict. In strictness, however, the specifications of the insufficiency of such evidence, as contained in the statement on motion for a new trial, are so indefinite that they might well have been disregarded. There are some eleven specifications in reference to the evidence. One will serve as a sample of all the others: "(1) That the evidence clearly showed that the total amount due by defendant to plaintiff on the date thereof was not the sum of $5,532.38, but was the sum of $2,520.48, and no larger or greater sum whatsoever." This form of specification is clearly insufficient. Adams v. Helbing, 107 Cal. 298, 40 Pac. 422; Moore v. Moore (Cal.) 34 Pac. 90; Spotts v. Hanley, 85 Cal. 165, 24 Pac. 738; Eddelbuttel v. Durrell, 55 Cal. 279; Hayne, New Trials, § 150; Parker v. Reay. 76 Cal. 105, 18 Pac. 124.

The second point made by appellant for reversal is that the defendant had no notice of the transfer of the note until suit brought. The learned counsel overlooks the testimony of James Love, who testifies that he notified Neal, the secretary, bookkeeper, and a director of defendant, of the transfer of the note to plaintiff on the 4th or 5th of October, 1893, immediately after the taking of the note. This was a sufficient notice. Thomp. Corp. § 5195.

We think the court erred in admitting the declaration of Conly that there was $5,000 due upon the note at the date of its transfer to the plaintiff. It is true that he was president of the corporation defendant, and, under ordinary circumstances, his admission would bind the defendant, made within the scope of his authority. But as payee of the note, about to make a sale of it, his interests were antagonistic to defendant, and his declarations would not be binding upon the defendant. We are of opinion, however, that this error does not call for a reversal. The note showed for itself what was due, after deducting the indorsements. Defendant's secretary testified that there was due on the note October 4, 1893, the sum of, say, $4,603.53, without interest, and the interest up to that date was some $517.33; thus bringing the amount up to, say, $5,091.27. Defendant's books showed the same thing, and the only question really in dispute was as to the right of defendant, under the circumstances hereinbefore stated, to offset the individual demand against Conly. Plaintiff's calculation showing the amount due on the note, and defendant's claim for the amount of its demand against Conly, were not only admitted in evidence without objection, but both of them were, by consent of counsel, submitted to the jury for their consideration. Under these circumstances, the error complained of was harmless. Burnett v. Lyford, 93 Cal. 115, 28 Pac. 855; Silvarer v. Hansen, 77 Cal. 584, 20 Pac. 136; Duffy v. Duffy, 104 Cal. 605, 38 Pac. 443.

We need not again refer to the charge given by the court, upon its own motion, to the jury, or to the strictures thereon, for the reason that the only exception thereto is as follows: "To which said charge, and the whole thereof, defendant then and there duly excepted." This was general, and not sufficiently specific to call the attention of the court to the portions thereof now assailed. Rogers v. Mahoney, 62 Cal. 611; Frost v. Creamery Co., 102 Cal. 525, 36 Pac. 929; Moore v. Moore (Cal.) 34 Pac. 91; Cockrill v. Hall, 76 Cal. 192, 18 Pac. 318; Sukeforth v. Lord, 87 Cal. 399, 25 Pac. 497. Upon the whole case, as presented, we recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BRITT, C.

CULLEN et al. v. GLENDORA WATER CO.
(No. 19,360.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 25, 1896.)

In bank. For former opinion, see 45 Pac. 822. Modified.

PER CURIAM. The judgment heretofore rendered herein is modified so as to read as follows:

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial of the issues involving the regularity and validity of the order for the issuance of the bonds of the district. The denial of a new trial as to the issues involving the organization of the district is affirmed.

ALTOONA QUICKSILVER MIN. CO. v. INTEGRAL QUICKSILVER MIN. CO. (No. 18,408.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 20, 1896.)

MINES AND MINING—POSSESSION FOR STATUTORY PERIOD—WORK ON MINE—NEW TRIAL—ACTION TO QUIET TITLE—JUDICIAL NOTICE—PLEADING AND PROOF.

1. An action in a state court to quiet title to mining lands is not an action under Rev. St. U. S. § 2326, to determine which of the parties is best entitled to purchase from the United States; and therefore, though defendant has filed application in the United States land office for patent for the land, and plaintiff has filed an adverse claim, and such section provides that it shall be the duty of the adverse claimant, within 30 days after filing his claim, to commence proceedings in a court of competent jurisdiction, to determine the question of the right of possession, and that a failure to do so shall be a waiver of his adverse claim, it is immaterial that the action to quiet title is not commenced within 30 days from the filing of the adverse claim in the land office, unless plaintiff, by his failure to commence action within that time, loses not only his claim to a patent, but also his right of possession; and as this, if so, constitutes a forfeiture, it must be pleaded and proved by defendant as a defense.

2. The court takes judicial notice, without averment and proof, of how long after a certain event an action pending before it was commenced, the date of such event being averred and admitted in the action.

3. In an action to quiet title to mineral lands, where plaintiff relies on a location by a certain person, he may prove, without having averred, that such person was a citizen of the United States, or had filed a declaration of intention to become such, and was therefore competent, under Rev. St. U. S. § 2319, to make the location.

4. Under Rev. St. U. S. § 2332, providing that, where a person holds and works a mining claim for the time prescribed by the statute of limitations for mining claims of the state in which it is situated, he may obtain a patent, "in the absence of any adverse claim," such possession and working for the statutory period, before the adverse right exists, is equivalent to a location under the acts of congress.

5. Where plaintiff, in an action to quiet title to mineral lands, bases his rights on two grounds,—possession and location,—and the verdict for him does not show on which ground it was based, a new trial is properly granted, the instructions having authorized the verdict on either ground, while there was no evidence in the case, at the time it was submitted to the jury, to establish a valid location, though evidence sufficient for the purpose, which had been introduced, was erroneously stricken out on defendant's motion.

6. While the mere placing of a watchman on a naked mining claim to warn prospectors, and thus prevent a relocation, is not labor on the mine such as is required to hold it, still the services of a watchman looking after buildings erected to work a mine constitutes such labor, though the mine is idle at the time.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Trinity county; T. E. Jones, Judge.

Action by the Altoona Quicksilver Mining Company against the Integral Quicksilver Mining Company. Verdict for plaintiff. From an order granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. W. H. Shanahan (Cross, Hall, Ford & Kelly, of counsel), for appellant. D. G. Reid and Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is an action to quiet title to certain mining ground in the county of Trinity, in which the court and the parties have encountered many difficulties because, misled by the case of Anthony v. Jillson, 83 Cal. 296, 23 Pac. 419, they have persisted in treating it as a contest in the United States land office for the right to enter certain mineral lands. In the case referred to, counsel and the court so speak of the controversy, but no question in relation to the character of the proceeding was before the court. Congress could not impose upon the state courts the duty or the labor of determining for the land office who is entitled to purchase from the United States, and it has not attempted to do so. Nothing is referred to the state courts for trial. But the contestant is required to test his right to the possession of the mining ground in the local courts. This he must do, if in a state court, by some proceeding authorized by the laws of the state. If we could suppose that there was no mode provided in the state laws for doing this, no action of which the state courts would have jurisdiction in which this could be done, the act of congress would not confer the jurisdiction which was lacking. This is not an action brought under section 2326[1] of the Revised Statutes of the United States to determine which of the parties is best entitled to purchase from the United States, but only an ordinary action to quiet title. The proceedings in the land office of the United States are utterly immaterial here, unless they tend to show title or right of possession in one of the parties. Unless, therefore, defendant was prepared to maintain the proposition that if plaintiff did not commence his suit within 30 days from the time he filed his claim in the land office he not only lost his claim to a patent, but also his right of possession, it mattered not whether the suit was commenced within 30 days. This, if the position be correct, would constitute a forfeiture, and the defendant would be required to plead and prove it as a defense. Under the state laws either party may bring an action to determine an adverse claim, but the jurisdiction and the procedure governing the action depend entirely upon our state constitution and laws. This action seems well adapted to the object sought to be accomplished by the congressional law, for in it the rights of the parties are wholly determined by the acts of congress, and involve the same questions as to the relative rights of the parties which the officers of the land office would otherwise have been required to pass upon. But it does not matter to the state court whether its judgment can be made available in the land office or not. This view was taken by this court in Quigley v. Gillett, 101 Cal. 462, 35 Pac. 1041, where it was said: "The action was brought 'to determine the question of the right of possession' of certain mining land, and that was the only question involved. The court had nothing to do with the proceedings in the land office, and no power to determine as to their regularity or irregularity, sufficiency or insufficiency." To the same effect is 420 Min. Co. v. Bullion Min. Co., 9 Nev. 240. It was there held that the act of congress simply required the contestant to bring such action as was authorized by the laws of the state to determine the right of possession, and that such action, when brought, would be governed and determined by the practice and rules of pleading there prevailing, irrespective of the act of congress requiring the suit to be brought. The rights of the parties will be entirely determined by the laws of the United States granting the right to enter upon the mineral lands, and to extract metals therefrom, and to acquire title thereto, but the suit must be tried in every respect as though no contest was pending in the land office of the United States in regard to the right to purchase the same. The court would be at liberty to order a special verdict if that was desired by the parties, because it would be more serviceable in the contest, for that may be done in any case, and such contingency is provided for in our practice.

[1] Rev. St. U. S. § 2326, provides that where, during publication of notice of application for patent for mining lands, an adverse claim is filed, it shall be the duty of the adverse claimant, within 30 days after filing his claim, to commence proceedings in a court of competent jurisdiction, to determine the question of the right of possession, and a failure to do so shall be a waiver of his adverse claim.

If these views be correct, it was, of course, error to instruct the jury to find against plaintiff on the ground that it did not appear that the suit was begun within 30 days after plaintiff filed its claim in the land office. For another reason I think it was error. The time of the filing of plaintiff's adverse claim in the land office at Redding was averred and admitted. The court knew judicially when the action was commenced, and therefore that the suit was commenced within 30 days. It is not necessary either to aver or prove facts which are within the judicial knowledge of the court. The instruction was a simple direction to the jury to find a verdict against the plaintiff. With the reason given for so instructing, the jury had nothing to do. This direction the jury disobeyed. Why the court proceeded to give other instructions, elaborately considering the law applicable to the facts of the case, after this explicit direction, it is impossible to conceive. It was confusing to the jury, for, if they were to obey the explicit direction, they had nothing to do with the other instructions, at least so far as plaintiff's case is concerned. Furthermore, the court, by subsequent instructions, expressly submitted to the jury the whole case, including plaintiff's claim, and even wrote out and handed to them the form of the verdict which they should render if they found for the plaintiff. In various instructions it submitted to the jury the question as to whether plaintiff or its grantors had complied with the law in regard to the location and working the mine, and as to its claim of right by actual adverse possession. The jury found for the plaintiff. In so doing they disobeyed the express direction to find against the plaintiff, but they obeyed the other direction to consider and pass upon the rights of the plaintiff, and to find according to the facts and principles of law declared by the court. The judge, in considering the case on motion for a new trial, was convinced that he had erred in directing the jury to find against the plaintiff, but thought, nevertheless, he was bound to grant a new trial on the authority of Emerson v. Santa Clara Co., 40 Cal. 543, in which it was held that a verdict against the instruction of the court is a verdict against law. This case is not within the reason of that case. Here the instructions were, in effect, contradictory, and the verdict, while opposed to one instruction, is warranted by others.

But, as the order granting a new trial must be affirmed for other reasons, this point need not be further discussed. This plaintiff relied in part upon a location of the land in controversy by one John A. Lytle. To show that Lytle was a competent person under the laws of the United States to make such location, it was incumbent upon plaintiff to show that Lytle was a citizen of the United States, or had filed his statement declaring his intention to become such. The plaintiff put in competent and sufficient evidence to show that Lytle was a natural-born citizen of the United States, but it was then stricken out on motion of defendant on the ground that it had not been pleaded. This ruling was very far reaching. By section 2319, mineral lands of the United States are open for exploration, occupation, and location to citizens and those who have declared their intention to become such, only. Under this ruling plaintiff could derive no title through the location or occupation of Lytle, because this fact was not averred. I do not think in an action to quiet title a plaintiff is bound to show the source of his title in his complaint, but to prove his right under that location it was incumbent upon plaintiff to prove that Lytle was competent under the laws of the United States to take, hold, and locate mineral land. The court instructed the jury to the effect that one who has not located mineral land in the mode prescribed by law and the custom of miners may yet acquire a right thereto by holding and working the same for five years "in the absence of an adverse claim." Defendant's counsel contend that section 2332—the section referred to—only provides that a patent shall issue in such case when there is no adverse claim, but, where any one has located the same land according to law and the custom of miners, then mere possession gives no right whatever. The act of congress has been otherwise construed in various cases. 420 Min. Co. v. Bullion Min. Co., 9 Nev. 240; Id., 3 Sawy. 634, Fed. Cas. No. 4,989. Judge Sawyer says that the laws of the state constitute a part of the laws by which a mining right is determined. It must therefore follow that, where such possession has continued for five years before the adverse right exists, it is equivalent to a location under the laws of congress. See, also, Harris v. Mining Co., 8 Fed. 863; Belk v. Meagher, 104 U. S. 279; Anthony v. Jillson, 83 Cal. 302, 23 Pac. 419. But, while the instructions upon that subject state the law correctly, nevertheless I think the order must be affirmed. As already stated, the plaintiff also relied upon the location made by Lytle, and much testimony was taken upon that subject, and at the request of plaintiff the jury were told that if they found that plaintiff and its grantors had held the claim for 18 years, basing their right upon the location made by Lytle, then every reasonable presumption should be indulged in favor of the validity of such alleged location. In connection with this they were also told of the two modes provided by congress for acquiring title to mineral lands. This was in effect telling them that, if Lytle made the location, it could be relied upon by plaintiff as a source of title. But they were not only told in another instruction that they must find against plaintiff, but the court had stricken out all evidence of the citizenship of Lytle. Therefore, as the case then stood, there was no proof of a valid location made by Lytle. We cannot say that the jury did not base their verdict upon such alleged location, or that they found that plaintiff had held, worked, and possessed the claim for five years. We cannot say, therefore, that the instruction was not injurious.

The defendant also complains of the instruction of the court in regard to the work required upon a mine in order to hold the same. The jury were told that it might consist in digging, etc., "or, if the mine be idle, it may consist of the services of a watchman or custodian in looking after the property and taking care of the same." To constitute a general rule, this would require some qualification. If this sort of care was necessary to preserve tunnels, buildings, or any structures erected to work the mine, and which would be necessary in case work were resumed, I see no reason why it would not constitute work upon the mine as much as the erection of such structures in the first instance would. But if there was only the naked claim to be looked after, and a watchman were placed there merely to warn prospectors, and thus prevent a relocation, it would not be labor upon the mine in the sense of the statute. As applied to the facts of this case, the instruction was not injurious, for it was not disputed that there were reduction works, houses, and barns, as well as tunnels and pits, to be looked after. The buildings were upon the claim in dispute, but plaintiff claims two other locations, which are not involved in this controversy. Most, if not all, the earthworks from which ore was extracted were on the other two claims. Defendant contends that the work was not for the purpose of working the claim in controversy, nor adapted to that purpose. This raised a question of fact to be determined by the jury. The fact, however, if so it was, that the claims did not actually touch each other, and there was a narrow strip of land between the locations, would not determine the question. Mines may be conceived of as so situated that the same work may be, and appear to be, expended in opening or developing both mines, although they are not actually contiguous. On the other hand, not all expenditures made with a view to working a mine would be considered work expended upon a mine under this rule; for instance, work done at a distance from the mine in the construction of a mill.

The form of the verdict was sufficient. Whether it would answer the purpose of the parties in the land office does not concern us. It complies with all the requirements of our laws and practice. The order is affirmed.

HALE v. McGETTIGAN et al. (Sac. 220.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 25, 1896.)

ENACTMENT OF STATUTES—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—PARTIAL INVALIDITY OF ACT—COUNTY OFFICERS—TERM OF OFFICE.

1. Where the legislative journals are silent as to the observance of any constitutional requirement in the passage of bills, it will not be presumed that such requirement was disregarded.

2. Const. art. 4, § 2, forbidding the introduction of bills after the expiration of 50 days from the commencement of the legislative session, does not invalidate Act March 24, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 346), which was reported, after the expiration of said period, as a substitute for several bills introduced within the requisite time, some of which purported to amend the county government act of 1891 in toto, and others to amend certain sections of said act.

3. Act March 24, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 346), entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of county and township governments," provides (section 60) for the election of county officers every four years, except as otherwise provided. Section 57 designates the several officers of a county, while section 170 fixes the compensation of county and township officers in counties of the eighth class, and declares (subdivision 26) that "the officers mentioned in section 57 of this act" shall be elected every two years. Held, that the officers referred to in said subdivision are those in counties of the eighth class only.

4. The invalidity of section 170, subd. 26, as contravening the constitutional prohibition against special legislation, does not invalidate the rest of the act, which is complete in itself without the invalid provision.

5. County Government Act 1883, § 15 (St. 1883, p. 301), provided for the election of a board of supervisors in each county at the general election in 1884, and declared that such officers should so classify themselves by lot that three of them should hold office for four years, and two of them for two years, and that the supervisors elected in 1886, and every two years thereafter, should hold office for four years. Section 60, after providing that elective county and township officers, excepting superintendents of schools and assessors, should be elected every two years, declared that "supervisors shall be elected as hereinbefore provided," and that assessors and school superintendents be elected every four years. County Government Act 1891, § 15 (St. 1891, p. 297), provided that the supervisors elected in 1888 and 1890, and every four years thereafter, should hold office for four years, while section 60 was identical with the same section of the act of 1883. County Government Act 1893, § 15 (St. 1893, p. 349), is the same as the corresponding section in the act of 1891; and section 60, after providing that the election of all elective county and township officers except as otherwise provided shall be quadrennial, instead of biennial, declares that "supervisors shall be elected as hereinbefore provided." Held, that with the exception of the two supervisors in each county, to whom a term of two years fell by lot, as authorized by Act 1883, the term of office of supervisors, which was originally fixed at four years, has not been changed by any subsequent act.

In bank. Appeal from superior court of Solano county; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by one Hale against McGettigan and others to determine the validity of a statute, and for a construction of the same. A demurrer to the complaint having been overruled, judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Calvin B. Webster, for appellants. R. B. Carpenter, Frank R. Devlin, Reed & Nusbaumer, F. C. Lusk, and Garret W. McEnerney, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. This action was brought for the purpose of determining the validity of the county government act, approved March 24, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 346), and to obtain a judgment that the county and township officers elected under that act hold their respective offices for the term of four years. A general demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and, the defendants declining to answer, judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, from which the defendants have appealed.

1. It is contended on the part of the appellants that the act in question never became a law, for the reason that it appears from the legislative journals that the bill therefor was introduced in the legislature after the expiration of 50 days from the commencement of the session, in contravention of the provisions of section 2, art. 4, of the constitution. The respondent contends, on the other hand, that the enrolled bill deposited with the secretary of state is conclusive of the validity of the act, and that it is not competent for the court to go behind this enrolled bill for the purpose of determining whether the legislature complied with this requirement of the constitution, and, in support thereof, cites the case of Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 253, where it was held that the certificates of the presiding officers of the two houses that a bill had been passed were conclusive of the point in question. It is urged by the appellants, in response to this, that the present constitution prescribes certain formalities to be observed by the legislature, and certain times at and within which the steps essential to enact a statute are to be observed, which were not contained in the constitution of 1849, under which the case of Sherman v. Story was decided, and that, unless these constitutional requirements for the enactment of a statute are complied with, an act passed by the legislature does not become a law, and that the journals of the legislature may be examined for the purpose of ascertaining whether the act was passed in conformity with these requirements. It is, however, unnecessary for us to determine in the present case whether the journals of either branch of the legislature may, under any circumstances, be examined for the purpose of impeaching the validity of an act that has been duly enrolled and deposited with the secretary of state, since we are of the opinion that it does not appear from those journals that the act in question was not constitutionally passed. The session of the legislature at which the act in question was passed commenced January 2, 1893. Before the expiration of 50 days from this date, eight different bills, entitled "An act to amend 'An act to establish a uniform system of county and township governments, approved March 31, 1891,'" and 29 other bills amendatory of different sections of the same act, were introduced into the assembly. Of these latter, assembly bill No. 74 was entitled "An act to amend section 165" of said act. These several bills were referred to the committee on county and township government, and on March 2d that committee reported to the assembly a substitute for all of said bills, and recommended its passage, and the substitute was thereupon ordered printed. Assem. J. p. 824. March 8th, assembly bill No. 74 was read the first time, and placed on file for second reading. March 9th, this bill was read a second time, whereupon "the committee on county and township governments offered a substitute [the county government bill], entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of county and township governments,'" which was read and adopted. Assem. J. p. 1,001. And on the same day the assembly ordered that the other of the above bills that had been referred to this committee be withdrawn and stricken from the files, "they having been embodied in the omnibus county government bill, now known as 'Substitute for Assembly Bill No. 74.'" Page 1,003. Various amendments were thereafter made to the "Substitute for Assembly Bill No. 74," and on March 13th it was passed by the assembly, and transmitted to the senate, where it was afterwards passed by that body. There can be no presumption that the legislature has disregarded any constitutional requirements in the passage of a statute, and, if the journals are silent upon the observance of any constitutional requirement, it cannot be assumed that such requirement was omitted by the legislature. People v. Dunn, 80 Cal. 211, 22 Pac. 140. If a bill has been introduced in either house within the first 50 days of the session, whatever is proper in the way of amendment is as admissible after the 50 days as before, and this will include whatever is within the purpose of the bill. By the same rules a substitute that is germane to the subject of the bill may be adopted without violating this provision of the constitution, since such substitute is, in effect, only an enlarged amendment to the bill for which it is offered. Toll v. Jerome, 101 Mich. 468, 59 N. W. 816. The various bills for which the substitute in the present instance was reported related to the county government act of 1891,—some of them purporting by their titles to amend the entire act, and others to amend certain sections of the act; and it was within the proper function of the committee to which they were referred for consideration to consolidate them into one bill, if in its judgment it was expedient, and to report the same as a substitute for them all. Such report and substitute, instead of being the introduction of a new bill, was only bringing together before the house, in a revised form, bills that had already been introduced and referred to that committee, with a recommendation from it for the action by the house which that committee deemed advisable.

2. It is further contended by the appellants that the provision in section 60 of the act for holding the election of county officers every four years is either superseded by a provision in section 170 that such election shall be every two years, or, if the latter provision is to be limited to counties of the eighth class, that the uniformity of the act is destroyed, and the entire act must be held to be unconstitutional. The first 161 sections of the act are general in their character, prescribing the duties and powers of the several county and township officers, and are applicable to all the counties in the state. By section 162 the several counties are divided into 53 classes, "for the purpose of regulating the compensation of all officers hereinafter provided for," and in the succeeding 53 sections the compensation of the officers of these several classes is fixed. Section 57 of the act designates the several officers of a county, and section 58 those of a township. Section 60 declares: "All elective county and township officers, except otherwise provided for in this act, shall be elected at the general election to be held in November, 1894, and every four years thereafter, unless otherwise herein provided, and shall take office at twelve o'clock meridian on the first Monday after the first day of January next succeeding their election." Section 170 fixes the compensation of county and township officers in counties of the eighth class, and is divided into twenty-six subdivisions. Subdivision 26 is in the following terms: "The officers mentioned in section fifty-seven of this act, except as hereinafter provided, shall be elected in the year eighteen hundred and ninety-four, and every two years thereafter, and shall take office at twelve o'clock meridian on the first Monday after the first day of January next succeeding their election." And subdivision 24 provides that all of the provisions in the section relating to counties of this class shall take immediate effect. These provisions of section 170, if literally construed, are in direct conflict with the provisions of section 60, in this respect: that by section 60 "all elective county and township officers" are to be elected every four years, while by subdivision 26 of section 170 "the officers mentioned in section fifty-seven of this act" are to be elected every two years, and from this repugnance it is contended that the act is thereby rendered of no effect. It is a cardinal rule in the interpretation of a statute that all its provisions shall be given effect, if possible, and if, by proper construction of the language used in different sections, provisions which are apparently conflicting can be harmonized, it is the duty of courts to so interpret the statute that all its provisions will be allowed to stand. It is not to be assumed that the legislature intended by the same statute to enact two inconsistent provisions, and to declare that the terms of all county officers should be four years, and at the same time that they should be two years. For the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the legislature in the matter, we may consider the form in which the different provisions of the statute have been cast, as well as the position of the different provisions in reference to other parts of the act. The provision for holding an election every two years is found in the subdivision of the section relating to counties of the eighth class, and should not be construed as applicable to any other class, or as impairing the previous provision for all classes, unless imperatively required by its language. By limiting the clause used in this subdivision of section 170—"the officers mentioned in section fifty-seven of this act"—to the officers mentioned in section 57 who may be elected in counties of the eighth class, we avoid a construction which would neutralize the provisions of section 60, and at the same time follow a natural rule of construction, in holding that the legislature intended the provisions of section 170 for counties of the eighth class alone, and that all of its subdivisions are subordinate to this intention, and inapplicable to the counties of any other class. This construction finds support in the fact that the day upon which the election for county officers is to be held is found only in section 60, whereas subdivision 26 of section 170 designates merely the year in which the officers are to be elected, thus impliedly referring to the former section for the day of election, and making that section applicable to the officers of the eighth class. It must therefore be held that the legislature did not intend that the provisions of this subdivision of section 170 should be applicable to any other counties than those in the eighth class.

The question is then presented, what effect does this special provision for the counties of this class have upon the entire act? It is contended by the appellants that, by reason of this special provision for the counties of one class, the uniformity of the act which is required by the constitution is destroyed, and that the entire act is void. It is not to be controverted that a statute providing for a system of county governments, which in its terms is limited to a portion of the state, would be in contravention of the provisions of the constitution which require the legislature to pass a uniform system for the entire state. But it is contended by the respondent that the special provision for one class of counties, in an act purporting to provide for all classes, may be disregarded, as being beyond the power of the legislature, and the general provision of the act sustained and made applicable to all the counties of the state. Whether a statute containing an unconstitutional provision, with others which are constitutional, will be sustained as to those which are constitutional, and held invalid merely as to those which are not, depends upon the nature of the different provisions, in view of the evident purpose of the legislature. If the provisions are so interdependent that those which are invalid are to be regarded as the condition or consideration upon which others were enacted, and it is evident that the legislature would not have enacted the statute except in its entirety, and did not intend that any part should have effect unless the whole could be made operative, the entire statute must be held invalid. On the other hand, if the different parts of the statute are severable and independent of each other, and the provisions which are within the constitutional power of the legislature are capable of being carried into effect after the void part has been eliminated, and it is clear from the statute itself that it was the intent of the legislature to enact these provisions irrespective of the others, the unconstitutional provisions will be disregarded, and the statute read as if these provisions were not there. For the purpose of statutory construction, the intention of the legislature, as shown by the general scope and purpose of the law, is to be ascertained. It is never to be assumed that the legislature intended to enact an unconstitutional statute, or that it supposed that any part of its act was beyond its constitutional power; and, if the general scope of an act is within its power, the act is not to be rendered null by reason of a subsidiary provision which was beyond its power to enact. If the manifest purpose of the legislature can be carried into effect by upholding the act and disregarding such subsidiary provisions, that purpose will not be defeated by an unconstitutional provision contained in a subordinate section in the act. The title of the present act is, "An act to establish a uniform system of county and township governments"; and this title, as well as the scope of the statute, may be considered for the purpose of determining the intention of the legislature. It must be assumed, from the language used in the title, that the legislature intended to comply with the constitutional requirements to provide for the election of county officers by a uniform law, applicable to all the counties in the state, and that the act in question should be operative throughout the state. By reason of the constitutional prohibition against the passage of a special or local law upon this subject, any separate act containing the provisions of subdivision 26 of section 170 would have been invalid, and would not have affected the uniformity of the general act. The provisions of this subdivision are none the less unconstitutional when made an integral part of a general act from which they are severable, than they would be if found in an independent act, and, being unconstitutional, may be disregarded as fully as though embodied in a separate statute. In Christy v. Board, 39 Cal. 3, the legislature had changed the time for the election of the supervisors of Sacramento county, and provided that the terms of three of the supervisors then in office should be extended for two years beyond the time for which they had been elected. To the contention that the legislature had no power to extend the term of office, and that, therefore, the entire act was invalid, it was said that the power to change the time of the election was unquestioned, and that it was perfectly plain that such was the evident purpose of the act, and that "if, in addition to the exercise of this undoubted power, they have coupled it with an attempt to perform an unconstitutional act by continuing the incumbents in office until October, 1871, the only result would be that the attempt would be abortive, and that portion of the act would be void. But this result would in no degree impair the efficiency of the act as a valid enactment changing the time of the election from 1869 to 1871." Similar principles were announced in People v. McCreery, 34 Cal. 433; Rood v. McCarger, 49 Cal. 117; and Mills v. Sargent, 36 Cal. 379. See, also, Robinson v. Bidwell, 22 Cal. 379; Miller v. Kister, 68 Cal. 142, 8 Pac. 813. Mr. Cooley, in his treatise on Constitutional Limitations (page 211), states the rule as follows: "The constitutional and unconstitutional provisions may even be contained in the same section, and yet be perfectly distinct and separable, so that the first may stand, though the last fall. The point is not whether they are contained in the same section, for the distribution into sections is purely artificial, but whether they are essentially and inseparably connected in substance. If, when the unconstitutional portion is stricken out, that which remains is complete in itself, and capable of being executed in accordance with the apparent legislative intent, wholly independent of that which was rejected, it must be sustained. If a statute attempts to accomplish two or more objects, and is void as to one, it may still be in every respect complete and valid as to the other." We are of the opinion that the statute under consideration falls within this rule, and that, as the provisions of subdivision 26 of section 170 are invalid by reason of being without the constitutional power of the legislature to enact, they are to be disregarded, and do not affect the validity of the act itself.

3. Section 15 of the county government act of 1883 (St. 1883, p. 301) provided: "At the general election to be held in the year eighteen hundred and eighty-four a full board of supervisors must be chosen in each county. They shall so classify themselves by lot that three of them shall hold office for four years and two of them for two years. The supervisors elected at the general election in eighteen hundred and eighty-six, and every two years thereafter, shall hold office for four years. They shall take their office on the first Monday after the first day of January after their election." And section 60 of the same act, after providing that the elective county and township officers, excepting superintendents of public schools and assessors, should be elected every two years declared, "Supervisors shall be elected as hereinbefore provided," and that assessors and superintendents of schools should be elected every four years. The provisions of these sections remained in force until superseded by the county government act of 1891 (St. 1891, p. 297), of which section 15 was as follows: "The supervisors elected at the general elections held in the years eighteen hundred and eighty-eight and eighteen hundred and ninety, and every four years thereafter, shall hold office for four years. They shall take their office on the first Monday after the first day of January after their election." Section 60 of this act was identical with section 60 of the act of 1883, and contained the same provision for biennial elections, and also, "Supervisors shall be elected as hereinbefore provided," and that assessors and superintendents of schools should be elected every four years. Section 15 of the county government act of 1893 (St. 1893, p. 349) provides: "The supervisors elected at the general elections held in the years eighteen hundred and eighty-eight and eighteen hundred and ninety, and every four years thereafter, shall hold office for four years. They shall take their office on the first Monday after the first day of January after their election." Section 60, above quoted, after providing that the election of all elective county and township officers, "except otherwise provided for in this act," shall be quadrennial instead of biennial, "unless otherwise herein provided," also declares, "Supervisors shall be elected as hereinbefore provided." From these provisions it results that, with the exception of the two supervisors in each county to whom a term of two years fell by lot, as authorized by the act of 1883, the term of office of supervisors, which was originally fixed at four years, has not been changed by any subsequent act, and that the three supervisors who were elected in 1892 are entitled to hold their office for four years and no longer, and that an election for their successors must be held at the general election in 1896, while the two who were elected in 1894 will continue to hold their office until their successors are elected in 1898. Any different construction would have the effect to hold that the legislature by the act of 1893 intended to extend the office of the three supervisors elected in 1891 beyond the period for which they were elected, in disregard of section 9, art. 11, of the constitution. The provisions in the act of 1893 for quadrennial elections for county officers in the twenty-second and thirty-seventh classes of counties, "except three supervisors," evidently referring to the three supervisors who were elected in 1892, indicates that something of this nature was in the mind of the legislature.

We hold, therefore, that under the county government act of 1893 the term of office of all county and township officers is fixed at four years, and that those who were elected at the general election in 1894 hold their office for four years from the first Monday after the first day of January 1895; that the term of office of the three supervisors in each county who were elected at the general election in 1892 will expire on the first Monday after the first day of January, 1897; and that their successors are to be elected at the general election to be held in November of the present year. The superior court was therefore in error in holding that none of the county officers were to be elected at the coming election. The judgment is therefore, for this reason, reversed, and the superior court is directed to sustain the demurrer to the complaint.

ROHRER v. BABCOCK. (Sac. 175.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 26, 1896.)

INJUNCTION—TRESPASS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 526, permitting an injunction when it appears during the litigation that defendant is doing, or threatens to do, some act respecting the subject of the action in violation of plaintiff's right, and tending to render the judgment ineffectual, a preliminary injunction will issue to restrain an insolvent defendant from removing hay from the land of plaintiff's testator and feeding it to his cattle.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Siskiyou county; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth J. Rohrer, executrix, against A. L. Babcock. From an order denying a motion to dissolve a preliminary injunction, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Warren & Taylor (T. M. Osmont, of counsel), for appellant. Jas. F. Farraher, for respondent.

BRITT, C. The court below denied defendant's motion—heard on the plaintiff's complaint alone—to dissolve a preliminary injunction restraining defendant, during the pendency of the action, from "removing or molesting" certain 50 tons of hay, which same was grown and stacked, it seems, on land forming part of the estate of plaintiff's testator, and the question is whether sufficient facts are stated in the complaint to justify the issuance of the writ. It is there alleged, among other matters, that plaintiff, as executrix, is the owner of the hay, and that defendant, without right, has commenced hauling the same from the stacks, and feeding it to cattle and other live stock, and threatens to remove the whole of it and feed it to such stock, and will do so unless enjoined; that he is without means to respond in damages, and, if he is permitted to remove the hay, plaintiff will be irreparably injured. Defendant argues that plaintiff has ample remedy in the ordinary course of law, and, therefore, that no injunction lies. The complaint is meager in its detail of facts tending to show that plaintiff is remediless unless the writ of injunction is interposed in her behalf, but so much latitude is permitted to the discretion of the judge in allowing and dissolving interlocutory injunctions that the order made in this instance ought not to be reversed unless the complaint is barren of equity to such degree that this court can say there was an abuse of that discretion. It is, no doubt, true that in general an injunction does not lie to prevent trespass upon either real or personal property; and this for the reason that, commonly, purely legal remedies suffice for the plaintiff's redress. See Mechanics' Foundry v. Ryall, 75 Cal. 601, 17 Pac. 703. The reason of the rule ceasing, the rule ought to cease. Here replevin is the remedy which appellant most insists was appropriate to the plaintiff's case; but she avers—and the averment must, for present purposes, be taken as true—that defendant is feeding the hay to live stock, and will continue so to do unless restrained. She could maintain no action in the nature of replevin for hay not in defendant's possession, and obviously the several portions of it hauled away by him might, and probably would, be consumed before successive writs for its redelivery could be obtained and served; and, he being insolvent, judgment for its value would be of no avail. The facts are fairly within the provision of section 526, Code Civ. Proc., permitting an injunction when it appears during the litigation that defendant is doing, or threatens to do, some act respecting the subject of the action, in violation of the plaintiff's rights, and tending to render the judgment ineffectual. The following cases, among others, tend more or less directly to support our conclusion: Hicks v. Compton, 18 Cal. 206; West v. Smith, 52 Cal. 322; McDonald v. Bayne (Sup.) 12 N. Y. Supp. 772; Wilson v. Hill, 46 N. J. Eq. 367, 19 Atl. 1097. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

JURGENS v. NEW YORK LIFE INS. CO. (S. F. 283.)

LIFE INSURANCE—RESCISSION—RELEASE BY BENEFICIARY PARTIES.

1. One who has insured his life for the benefit of another cannot, after the beneficiary has acquired a vested right by the delivery of the policy, rescind the policy and recover premiums paid, without tender of release from the beneficiary, even where rescission can be compelled and does not require consent of the insurer.

2. Though a life policy provides that it shall not be in force till the premium is actually paid the agent, and that no agent has power to extend the time for paying a premium, still, where the agent unconditionally delivers the policy on receipt of insured's note, and thereby becomes answerable to the company for so much cash, the policy is in force, so that insured cannot rescind it without a release from the beneficiary.

3. Even if insured can, on some terms, secure a rescission of a life policy where the beneficiary refuses to join in a rescission, he must make the beneficiary a party to an action for such rescission.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Charles Jurgens against the New York Life Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Van Ness & Redman, for appellant. E. J. McCutchen, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. The appeal is from a judgment of nonsuit, and from an order denying a new trial. The action was brought to recover $1,462, paid as the first annual premium upon a policy of life insurance for $25,000, plaintiff claiming that the contract of insurance had been rescinded by him. He claims to have rescinded because he was induced to receive the policy and pay the first premium by the false and fraudulent representations of defendant's agent, one Eaton. The policy issued to him was precisely such a policy as he had applied for in writing; but the written application was made out by Eaton, and Eaton had assured him and induced him to believe that the policy would be an endowment policy for $25,000, which would be paid him at the end of 10 years, or, in case of his death within that period, to his wife, Katherine, whereas the policy delivered to him only entitled him to an endowment of three-tenths of the sum of $25,000, or $7,500. There was a similar misrepresentation in regard to the surrender value of the policy. In the written application of plaintiff he stated: "Inasmuch as only the officers of the home office of said company in the city of New York have authority to determine whether or not a policy shall issue on any application, and as they act on the written statements and representations referred to, no statements, representations, or information made or given by or to the person soliciting or taking this application for a policy, or by or to any other person, shall be binding on said company, or in any manner affect its rights, unless such statements, representations, or information be reduced to writing and presented to the officers of said company, at the home office, in this application." There was also a stipulation that the policy to be issued should not be in force until the premium was actually paid to the agent of the company, and accepted, during the life and good health of the insured. The application was referred to, and made part of, the policy. The application was made September 8, 1893. Eaton was a mere solicitor for the company, Mr. Hawes being the agent of defendant for California. To pay the premium, plaintiff executed a promissory note payable to his own order, indorsed in blank, and delivered it to Eaton. Eaton sold the note to the Central Bank of Oakland, and paid the money, less his commission, to defendant's agent, who on the 6th day of October sent the policy to plaintiff by Eaton. According to plaintiff's testimony, Eaton read, or pretended to read, a portion of the policy to him, and he then signed a statement which contained the following: "I find the policy is exactly as represented; and I can recommend your company as being first-class in every respect, and can recommend you and your company to my friends." The policy itself contained a provision that "no agent has power in behalf of the company to make or modify this or any contract of insurance, to extend the time for paying a premium," etc. The policy was delivered on Friday. On the following Wednesday, plaintiff complained to Eaton that it did not accord with his oral representations, and, at the suggestion of Eaton, called upon Hawes, defendant's agent. There he threw down the policy, and demanded the return of his note, on the ground that he had been defrauded, stating his grievance. He was informed then or subsequently that defendant did not have, and had never had, his note, and knew nothing of the representations made by Eaton. It does not appear that prior to this time any agent of defendant, other than Eaton, was aware that a note had been given. The contract itself provides that no agent is authorized to give credit, but I see no reason why Eaton might not, as agent for plaintiff, discount his note for him, and thus raise the money. If a discount was charged by the bank, it was probably deducted from Eaton's commissions. This was a private affair between Eaton and plaintiff. Plaintiff had stipulated in writing that no oral representations of Eaton should be regarded, and that the issuance of the policy, or the refusal of the risk, were based solely upon the written application and the report of the medical examiner.

Defendant contends that a rescission was not effected, because upon the delivery of the policy Mrs. Jurgens acquired a vested right, and no release from her was tendered. The general proposition involved in this contention is not disputed by appellant, but he contends that it has no application to this case. He contends that the doctrine has no application to cases in which a rescission may be compelled, and does not require the consent of the insurer. I can discover no reason for such a distinction, and no authority is cited in its support. If plaintiff was entitled to rescind in consequence of the fraud of defendant, nevertheless it was incumbent upon him to restore to defendant everything of value which he had received, and to place defendant substantially in the position formerly occupied by it. An offer to rescind is an offer to release the opposite party from the obligations of the contract. If the obligations are not to plaintiff, he cannot make that offer. In this case plaintiff could not do so without the consent of Mrs. Jurgens. Plaintiff says, if the facts justified plaintiff in demanding a rescission, such facts would constitute a defense for the company against Mrs. Jurgens. This is not true. They could not be heard to plead their own wrong in defense. Only actual rescission could be relied upon as a defense, and the argument assumes the point at issue, that a legal rescission has been made. The obligations imposed by the contract upon the defendant were to the plaintiff and his wife, and both should join in demanding a rescission. Trabandt v. Insurance Co., 131 Mass. 167; Insurance Co. v. Wilson, 111 Mass. 542.

Plaintiff also contends that, if the consent of Mrs. Jurgens is necessary to a rescission, then defendant by its fraud got itself into the trouble, and cannot object to a rescission, because plaintiff is unable to place it in statu quo; that is to say, he can recover from defendant the premium paid, although he gets for it and retains the entire benefit of the payment. For, of course, in the event of his death within the year, Mrs. Jurgens would collect $25,000, the full amount of the policy. This would not be rescission. The contract did not oblige plaintiff to continue paying after the year, and if he did not the premium paid was only in consideration of the risk carried during the year. On the supposition made, defendant would carry that risk.

It is also contended by plaintiff that by the very terms of the contract the policy never was in force; therefore Mrs. Jurgens had no interest in it. A somewhat similar state of things existed in Griffith v. Insurance Co., 101 Cal. 627, 36 Pac. 117. The policy was issued by the same company and contained the same condition, to the effect that the policy shall not be in force until the payment of the premium during the life of the insured. There the agents, though forbidden to give credit, took the notes of the insured, as here. The court said: "It was, in effect, so far as defendant was concerned, a payment of the premium to the agents, who held the note in lieu of so much money with which they were chargeable. It was, as to defendant, a payment of the premium to the agents, and not an extension of the time of payment." So, here, it does not appear that any agent of the defendant—other than the solicitor, whose agency was of a very limited character—ever knew of the note. The money was not received by Mr. Hawes for two days after plaintiff demanded its return, but, for all that appears, he may have believed that the money was in the hands of Eaton. And whether it was or not, since Eaton had no authority to take the note, he was answerable to the company for so much cash. This question is also covered by the case of Griffith v. Insurance Co., supra. It was there held that an express provision in the policy that the company shall not be liable until the premium is paid is waived by the unconditional delivery of the policy. It may be that, had Mrs. Jurgens refused to join in a rescission, plaintiff might still, on some terms, have procured a release from his contract; but, if he could, Mrs. Jurgens should have been a party to any action for that purpose. Appellant's counsel says that plaintiff cannot be compelled to bring a suit in such a manner that a judgment in his favor shall afford protection to the defendant. I understand that he is bound to do that very thing, though, if this were the only objection in this case, it might not now be available to the defendant. The judgment and order are affirmed.

McKENZIE v. JOOST et al. (S. F. 39.) [1]

EVIDENCE—CONFLICT—FINDINGS—REVIEW.

Findings of the trial court on evidence fairly conflicting will not be disturbed on appeal.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by George F. McKenzie against Herman Joost and others. From a judgment allowing him only nominal damages, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Van Ness & Redman, for appellant. John L. Boone, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an action upon an injunction bond given in an action in the United States circuit court, in which a temporary injunction was issued, enjoining the assignors of the plaintiff herein from infringing upon a certain patent right, issued originally to one Hancock for a certain dye used in dyeing broomcorn and brooms. In the suit in the United States court the injunction was finally dissolved, and this present action is upon the bond given for said temporary injunction. The court in the case at bar gave judgment for the plaintiff, but found that he was entitled to only nominal damages, and judgment in his favor to the extent of one dollar was entered. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and also from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The only point made by appellant for a reversal is that the testimony does not sustain the finding that the appellant was entitled to nominal damages only. We have examined the transcript and the briefs very fully, and it is only necessary to say that the evidence clearly brings the case within the rule that, where evidence is fairly conflicting as to an issue, the finding of the court below will not be disturbed. There was certainly evidence, and considerable evidence, tending to show that the assignors of appellant were not materially injured by the injunction, and it would serve no useful purpose for us to review the evidence here in detail. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

Ex parte LONG. (Cr. 122.)

HABEAS CORPUS—WHEN ISSUED.

A writ of habeas corpus for discharge from imprisonment under a judgment of conviction regular on its face, on a complaint charging a violation of a city ordinance, of which the court had jurisdiction, cannot be granted on the ground that the evidence failed to show a violation of the ordinance.

Department 1.

Application by William Long for a writ of habeas corpus. Dismissed.

Samuel B. McKee, for petitioner. Chas. E. Snook, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. Petitioner asks to be discharged on habeas corpus from restraint under a judgment convicting him of a misdemeanor, in selling beer without a license, in violation of section 1 of ordinance No. 1,093 of the city of Oakland, regulating the traffic in intoxicating liquors within the limits of that city. No question is made as to the jurisdiction of the court, or the sufficiency of the complaint in charging an offense under the ordinance; nor is the judgment in any way attacked as void for any reason or defect appearing upon its face. The contention of petitioner, upon which he bases his right to discharge, is, in substance, that the acts proven against him to sustain the charge made did not constitute an offense, within the meaning or intent of the ordinance, but that, if the ordinance must be construed so as to make the acts of petitioner an offense, then it is unreasonable, unjust, and oppressive, and an improper restraint upon petitioner's constitutional right to pursue a lawful business. What purports to be the evidence upon which petitioner was convicted is set forth in the petition, and we are asked by petitioner to look into this evidence, and determine as to its legal sufficiency to make a case under the ordinance, and, in the event we determine that it does not, to discharge petitioner for that reason. But, obviously, in this view, petitioner has wholly misconceived the functions of the writ of habeas corpus. The writ subserves no such purpose. Its office is in no sense that of review as upon appeal. The inquiry to be had thereunder does not extend beyond the question of jurisdiction, and the validity of the process on its face. When the complaint states facts which constitute an offense which the court has jurisdiction to try and punish, and the judgment is regular upon its face, there is no authority on habeas corpus to look beyond these, and say whether that jurisdiction has been in all respects regularly pursued. Mere error cannot be inquired into on such proceeding, and manifestly, jurisdiction to try and punish the offense being conceded, the question as to whether the evidence at the trial was sufficient to bring the case within the ordinance, and establish a breach of its provisions, was a question the improper determination of which would constitute error only, however gross the mistake thus committed. The misapplication of the law to any given state of facts does not constitute excess of jurisdiction, but error merely, which cannot be reviewed by this means. Ex parte Bird, 19 Cal. 130; Ex parte Max, 44 Cal. 579; Ex parte Cohn, 55 Cal. 193; Ex parte Lehmkuhl, 72 Cal. 53, 13 Pac. 148; Ex parte Sternes, 77 Cal. 156, 19 Pac. 275. Whether, therefore, the ordinance, when properly construed, is, as contended by petitioner, a regulation aimed only at the keepers of saloons, dramshops, bars, and tippling places, and was not intended to apply to the business as carried on by the Oakland Bottling Company and its employé, the petitioner, is a question which cannot arise on the record before us. It is conceded that, as applied to saloons and the other classes of retail places enumerated, it is a competent exercise of the police power of the state, and valid; and, this being so, the record does not show any excess of jurisdiction. Writ dismissed and petitioner remanded.

HELLMAN v. SHOULTERS, Treasurer, et al. (L. A. 8.)[1]

SALE FOR STREET-IMPROVEMENT ASSESSMENT — INJUNCTION.

Injunction will not lie to restrain the sale of abutting property for nonpayment of a bond representing the assessment against the property for street improvements merely because the notice of sale did not state the amount of costs and penalties, even if the omission would render the sale void; at least, where plaintiff makes no offer to pay what is due.

In bank. For opinion in department, see 44 Pac. 915.

VAN FLEET, J. After a re-examination of this case by the court in bank, we are satisfied with the views expressed in the opinion of Mr. Justice TEMPLE, filed upon the hearing of the case in department 2 (44 Pac. 915); and that opinion, with the suggestions which we deem it proper here to add in response to the petition for a hearing in bank, will stand as the opinion of the court.

1. Counsel strenuously contends that the bonds in question cannot be considered as the bonds of the municipality, but that they are, in legal effect, the obligations of the several property owners, or are not the obligations of any one. We cannot see any distinction between these bonds and those considered in the case of Lent v. Tillson (Cal.) 14 Pac. 71, referred to in the opinion in department. In each case they are made payable only out of a special fund to be raised by assessment on the property benefited. It is expressly declared in each act that the city should in no event be liable upon them, and no personal liability for their payment is by either act imposed on any one. The fact that in one case the bonds are to be paid generally out of a fund raised by assessment on all the property benefited, and in the other case are to be paid severally by assessment on each particular lot, cannot affect the question of legislative power. The burden upon the property is precisely the same in either case. Liens upon property, where no person is bound to perform the obligation, are common in our law (Civ. Code, § 2890), especially in cases of taxation; and, in cases of this character, no personal liability can constitutionally be imposed upon the property owner. Taylor v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 241. But, if these bonds could not be considered municipal obligations, the result would be the same. So far as the questions in this case are concerned, the bonds really cut no figure, and might as well be eliminated from the case. The effect of the act in question is precisely the same, so far as the property owners are concerned, as if it had provided that any delinquent assessment of $50 or more should be payable in annual installments for such number of years, not exceeding 10, as the council should fix, with interest at a rate to be determined by the council, and that upon default in the payment of any installment the property should be sold to pay the assessment. Since the legislature might constitutionally have provided (as it did provide in the original Vrooman act) that the property should be sold at once to pay the entire delinquent assessment, the owner cannot complain of a provision allowing him an extension of time within which to pay any installment. The only possible question could be as to the authority of the council to fix the rate of interest. We agree with counsel for respondents that the imposition of interest may well be supported as a legitimate penalty for delinquency, from which the owner may protect himself by paying the assessment when due. As to fixing the rate of interest, that, as said in the opinion in department, is a matter of contract merely. The city council is authorized to contract for the doing of the work, and must, in its resolution of intention, fix the rate of interest. This is one of the terms upon which bids are invited, and presumably enters into the price bid. If the rate of interest, as fixed, is high, the presumption is that the price bid will be proportionally low. We can therefore see no such inequality as to affect the uniform operation of the law, or to distinguish this case from the ordinary class of municipal contracts for street work.

2. As to the publication of the ordinance or resolution of intention, it may be added that appellant's contention is practically disposed of by the case of City of Los Angeles v. Teed (Cal.) 44 Pac. 580, 582.

3. Counsel for appellant contends that the notice of sale published by the treasurer was insufficient because it did not state the amount of the costs and penalties. This point is made for the first time in the petition for rehearing, and the respondents have had no opportunity to reply to it. This fact itself would be a sufficient reason for ignoring it. Moreover, it must be remembered that this is a suit in equity for an injunction to restrain a sale for the collection of a tax; and no such injunction will lie to correct mere errors or irregularities in the proceedings, even such as would render the sale void,—certainly not where the plaintiff makes no offer to pay what is due. Esterbrook v. O'Brien, 98 Cal. 671, 33 Pac. 765. The judgment and order are affirmed.

LOFTUS et ux. v. FISCHER et al.
(BEHLOW, Intervener. Sac. 6.)[1]

PARTNERSHIP—ACTION FOR DISSOLUTION—INTERVENTION.

A complaint by a husband and wife alleged that the husband, defendant, B., and L. formed a co-partnership, in which their respective interests were represented by shares of stock in a corporation formed by them, and that defendant, in fraud of the husband, procured the issuance of certain stock to B. and L., and then purchased it from them, and, for relief, asked for the return of the stock so fraudulently issued to the partnership, and for an accounting and dissolution. A complaint in intervention by B. alleged that the stock was rightfully issued to himself and L., and that defendant fraudulently procured a sale thereof to himself, but the intervener had subsequently made a bona fide purchase of L.'s interest, and, for relief, asked for the rescission of the fraudulent sales to defendant, and the restoration of the stock to himself, but did not ask a dissolution of the partnership. Held, that the complaint in intervention should be dismissed, as being in relation to a matter not germane to the original action.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by E. C. Loftus and wife against Jacob A. Fischer and others for the rescission of sales of stock, and the dissolution of a partnership. Charles J. Behlow intervened. From a judgment dismissing the complaint in intervention, the intervener appeals. Affirmed.

Henry S. Foote, for appellant. James L. Crittenden, F. W. Street, J. B. Curtin, Scrivner & Schell, Wheaton, Kalloch & Kierce, Estee & Miller, Reddy, Campbell & Metson, and John F. Rooney, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal by Behlow from the judgment dismissing his complaint in intervention in the above-entitled action. In the original complaint he, with others, appeared as a plaintiff. Upon appeal to this court it was held that defendants' demurrer to the complaint for misjoinder of parties, and improper joinder of causes of action, was well taken. Behlow v. Fischer, 102 Cal. 208, 36 Pac. 509. Upon the return of the cause to the trial court an amended complaint was filed, which omitted Behlow and other parties as plaintiffs, leaving the action to be prosecuted solely in the name of Loftus and his wife. In all other respects pertinent to this consideration, the amended complaint was the same as the original. It contained the same averments of partnership, and the formation of the corporation to conduct its affairs. It averred that, by agreement among the partners, their interests in the co-partnership should be represented by certain shares of stock to them issued. Then follow the same averments of fraud practiced by Fischer upon Behlow and Long, by which, it is asserted, Fischer succeeded in purchasing from them their stock in the corporation. In short, with the omission of the parties plaintiff above noted, the amended complaint is, for all essential purposes, the same as the original, which was reviewed in the 102d volume of our Reports (36 Pac. 509). None of the matters of fraud therein contained, and charged to have injured Long and Behlow, appears in any way to concern the interests or rights of the remaining plaintiffs. Their complaint is still for a dissolution of the co-partnership. Whether or not Fischer has fraudulently acquired property of Behlow and Long is clearly of no concern to them. Upon the filing of the amended complaint, Behlow disappeared from the case as a plaintiff, but shortly after appeared again as intervener. His complaint in intervention is, for the most part, an exact transcript of the amended complaint. With the exceptions now to be noticed, it is identical with that pleading. The first point of difference is this: The amended complaint charges that Fischer, in fraud of the plaintiffs Loftus, unlawfully caused to be issued to Behlow 19,200 shares of the stock, which afterwards, and as a part of his design, Fischer fraudulently obtained from Behlow. The complaint in intervention is silent upon this; for Behlow's contention is that the stock was rightfully issued to him, but fraudulently obtained from him by Fischer. The complaint in intervention charges, as does the amended complaint, that Fischer purchased Long's 5,000 shares through fraud, and still holds them. But the complaint in intervention in this regard goes further than the amended complaint. Behlow pleads additionally that Long, for a valuable consideration, has sold to him "the said part of his interest in said co-partnership represented by 5,000 shares so fraudulently purchased as aforesaid by Jacob A. Fischer." This allegation seems to have been designed to afford Behlow some standing as a partner. It is, of course, insufficient for that purpose; for, admittedly, the title to the stock is in Fischer, and Behlow's action is for rescission and recovery of it. Behlow does not ask for a dissolution of the partnership, since his status as a partner was lost by the sale of his stock, as decided on the former appeal. His prayer is for a decree of rescission, and a restoration to him of the stock, which he alleges he was induced to part with through fraud. In short, as this court had decided that his cause of action could not be considered and decided in the bill for a dissolution of co-partnership, as he was no longer a partner, he undertakes, by intervening, to have the same causes of action passed upon. The complaint is still an action for a dissolution of a co-partnership. The intervention is nothing but an action for rescission of executed contracts of sale, and for a recovery of the stock sold. Whether or not, after a decree of rescission, Behlow would be re-established as a "partner," it is not necessary here to consider. As the term "partnership" is understood in the law, it is certainly novel to consider a co-partnership wherein one's interest is much or little, as he buys or sells stock of a corporation; where one ceases to be a partner by selling all his stock, and immediately takes on the character again if he purchases new shares; where, with 60,000 shares, there may be 60,000 partners one day and 2 the next. But these considerations need not be discussed; for, whether Behlow parted with his partnership interest advisedly or not, by his own pleading he did part with it, and cannot join in an action for the dissolution of a co-partnership of which he has ceased to be a member. Behlow v. Fischer, 102 Cal. 208, 36 Pac. 509. His complaint in intervention was therefore properly dismissed. He neither joins the plaintiff in claiming what is sought by the complaint, nor the defendant in resisting the demands of the complaint, nor is he opposed to both. He merely pleads an individual cause of action in his own right against defendant Fischer. If, as to the 19,200 shares issued to him, and by him to Fischer, he should intervene against the demand of the complaint that this stock belongs to the partnership, and join with Fischer in asserting the legality of its issue, he would, as to this matter, and to this extent, at least, unite with defendant in resisting the claim of plaintiffs. This he does not do. His claim in that regard is to recover the property from Fischer, not for the partnership, but for himself,—a matter with which the plaintiffs have no concern. For the reasons given in Loftus v. Fischer (S. F. 34) 45 Pac. 328, the motion to allow the costs of the clerk's certification is denied. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. LYNCH v. BUDD, Governor. (S. F. 600.)

LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR—APPOINTMENT TO VACANCY—TENURE.

Under Const. art. 5, § 15, providing that a lieutenant governor shall be elected at the same time and places as the governor, and Const. art. 5, § 8, authorizing the governor, when a vacancy occurs in any office for the filling of which no provision is made by the constitution, to fill such vacancy by granting a commission, which shall expire at the end of the next legislature, or at the "next election by the people," one appointed by the governor to fill a vacancy in the office of lieutenant governor for the filling of a vacancy in which there is no special constitutional provision will hold office till the next gubernatorial election.

In bank. Application on relation of John C. Lynch against James H. Budd, governor, for a writ of mandate. Denied.

J. J. De Haven, for petitioner. W. W. Foote and Garret W. McEnerney, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the governor to include in his proclamation for the coming election a call to fill the office of lieutenant governor for the unexpired term of Spencer G. Millard, deceased. Respondent has filled the vacancy caused by the death of the lieutenant governor by the appointment of William T. Jeter, who has duly qualified.

In this case both parties concede—as, indeed, the exigencies of each require him to do—that the vacancy caused by the death of Millard was one which the governor had the power to fill. If there can be question of the power of the governor in this respect, therefore, we have not considered it. And no question has been made, nor have we considered, whether a mandate will issue to compel the chief executive to perform an act which, if it be his duty to perform, is enjoined upon him by the constitution as the executive, nor whether he can be compelled to perform any public duty at the instance of one who has no vested right to have it performed, nor any interest special to himself, or other than that which every citizen has in its performance; or, rather, we have not considered whether to issue the mandate asked for would trench upon the province of the executive.

The constitution provides (section 3, art. 4) that members of the assembly shall be elected in 1880 and biennially thereafter. Section 2, art. 5, provides that the governor shall be elected "at the time and places of voting for members of assembly, and shall hold his office for four years from and after the first day of January subsequent to his election." Section 15, art. 5, is as follows: "A lieutenant-governor shall be elected at the same time and places, and in the same manner, as the governor; and his term of office and his qualifications of eligibility shall also be the same. He shall be president of the senate, but shall have only a casting vote therein. If, during a vacancy of the office of governor, the lieutenant-governor shall be impeached, displaced, resign, die, or become incapable of performing the duties of his office, or be absent from the state, the president pro tempore of the senate shall act as governor until the vacancy be filled or the disability shall cease. The lieutenant-governor shall be disqualified from holding any other office, except as specially provided in this constitution, during the term for which he shall have been elected." And in the following section it is provided that in case of the death, resignation, impeachment, absence from the state, or inability to act of the governor, "the powers and duties of his office shall devolve upon the lieutenant-governor for the residue of the term, or until the disability shall cease." It will be seen that in case of a vacancy in the office of governor the vacancy is not to be filled, but the powers and duties devolve upon the lieutenant governor, who does not cease to be lieutenant governor. Under such circumstances it would hardly be contended that when the powers and duties of the governor devolve upon the lieutenant governor the latter thereby becomes governor, and can appoint a lieutenant governor. Nor do I think it could be contended that when the president pro tempore of the senate acts as governor he could appoint a person to fill the vacancy in the office of lieutenant governor. If he could, he would then appoint himself out of office, and it would be his duty to do so.

But it is conceded by the parties that upon the death of the lieutenant governor the governor may fill the vacancy by appointment. This is unmistakably within the language of section 8, art. 5, which reads as follows: "When any office shall from any cause become vacant, and no mode is provided by the constitution and law for filling such vacancy, the governor shall have the power to fill such vacancy by granting a commission, which shall expire at the end of the next legislature or at the next election by the people." An office has become vacant, and there is no other mode provided by the constitution or laws to fill it. "The next election by the people" does not mean the next general election or the next election held by the people, but it must mean that the appointee shall hold until some one has been elected to fill that office. But there is nothing in this provision which indicates when this election shall be held, but only that until some one has been elected to fill the vacancy the appointee shall hold. This section does not direct that such election shall be at the next general election. It provides simply for filling vacancies by appointment, and that such appointees shall hold until the office is filled in the manner provided by law; but does not itself provide for such election or direct when it shall be. If, however, the phrase "the next election by the people" is equivalent to the phrase "the next election," and we assume that it was intended thereby to indicate the election at which such vacancy would be filled, we would feel compelled to hold that the next election is that which the constitution has provided for filling that particular office; that is, the next gubernatorial election. Many authorities may be cited in support of this proposition. In Matthews v. Shawnee Co., 34 Kan. 606, 9 Pac. 765, the governor appointed a judge to fill a vacancy. The constitution provided for an appointment to fill the vacancy until the next regular election. Upon a contest the supreme court said: "The words 'regular election' do not necessarily mean general election, or township election, or any state, county, city, or district election. They simply mean the regular election prescribed by law for the election of the particular officer to be elected." State v. Philips, 30 Fla. 579, 11 South. 925, involved a municipal office. The court said: "When it is declared that the city council shall fill vacancies until the next regular election, it means until the next regular election provided by the charter for electing the officer whose term has become vacant." To the same effect are State v. Gardner, 3 S. D. 553, 54 N. W. 606; Sawyer v. Haydon, 1 Nev. 75; People v. Wilson, 72 N. C. 155; State v. Cobb, 2 Kan. 32; and People v. Mathewson, 47 Cal. 442. The effect of these decisions is that the term "next election" means the next election for a lieutenant governor, and that the language used in section 8 cannot be understood as itself directing that at the next succeeding general election the vacancy shall be filled.

Is an election at that time authorized by any law? The constitution contains no provision for holding an election for filling this vacancy, and is silent as to whether the appointee shall hold for the residue of the term. And this is more noticeable because as to some other officers there are explicit directions upon the subject. In regard to justices of this court and judges of the superior court, it is expressly provided that in case of a vacancy the appointee shall hold until the election and qualification of a successor, "Which election shall take place at the next general election." Sections 3, 5, art. 6. In regard to railroad commissioners, the provision is that the appointee shall hold office for the residue of the unexpired term. The constitution is equally silent in regard to filling vacancies in other executive offices. A similar state of things existed under the constitution of 1849, and the legislature passed a law for filling such vacancies ("An act concerning offices;" April 28, 1851; St. 1851, p. 415). This act did not provide for the election of a lieutenant governor. Like the governor, he was required, in case of resignation, to resign to the legislature if that body was in session; if not in session, to the secretary of state. Such is also the requirement of the present code. Pol. Code, § 995. Like the old statute, the present code contains no provision in regard to an election to fill a vacancy in the office of lieutenant governor. As to other state officers, the provision is that they shall hold for the balance of the unexpired term. There has never been in the laws a provision for an election to fill a vacancy occasioned by the death or resignation of a lieutenant governor. Perhaps it was not supposed that such vacancy would ever be filled, even by appointment. At all events, there is no law, either constitutional or statutory, for such an election. In such case there can be no election. People v. Weller, 11 Cal. 49; People v. Mathewson, 47 Cal. 442; Kenfield v. Irwin, 52 Cal. 164. In Sawyer v. Haydon, 1 Nev. 75, it was said: "We think no court or judge has gone so far as to hold that the people might hold an election or vote for any particular officer at a general election, unless some special provision was made for electing such officer for the particular term for which he is seeking to be elected, either in the constitution or some statutory enactment." This was also said in People v. Mathewson, 47 Cal. 442. The efficacy of an election depends upon the law in pursuance of which it is held, and the fact that an office is elective does not of itself, without some law authorizing and regulating the election, render valid any attempted election. The writ is therefore denied.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; McFARLAND, J.; VAN FLEET, J.; HARRISON, J.; HENSHAW, J.

GAROUTTE, J. I concur in the judgment. The constitution provides that the powers and duties of the office of governor, in case of vacancy, shall devolve upon the lieutenant governor for the residue of the term, or until the disability shall cease. The constitution further provides that in case of a vacancy in both the office of governor and lieutenant governor the president pro tempore of the senate shall act as governor until the vacancy be filled. The constitution does not provide that the president pro tempore of the senate shall perform the duties of the office of lieutenant governor in case a vacancy exists in that office. And this omission to so provide is, to my mind, an unintentional lapse on the part of the framers of the constitution. Such appears to be plain when we consider that there is an express provision of that instrument casting upon the president pro tempore of the senate authority to perform the duties of the office of governor if there be no lieutenant governor, taken in connection with the many other provisions of that instrument which all point to that conclusion. But no authority is found in the constitution vesting the president pro tempore of the senate with the duties of the lieutenant governor when a vacancy occurs in that office, and hence any such question is foreclosed.

The foregoing conditions being present, a vacancy occurred in the office of lieutenant governor upon the death of the incumbent, and the governor had the power to fill such vacancy by virtue of section 8, art. 5, of the constitution. That section reads as follows: "When any office shall from any cause become vacant, and no mode is provided by the constitution and law for filling such vacancy, the governor shall have the power to fill such vacancy by granting a commission, which shall expire at the end of the next legislature or at the next election by the people." It follows that the result of this litigation in part rests upon the true construction of the words "the next election by the people." It is conceded by the present incumbent of the office that the next election by the people since his appointment will be the coming presidential election to be held in November, but he claims the words should be construed to mean "the next election by the people at which a lieutenant governor is regularly to be elected." If the framers of an instrument of the dignity and importance of a state constitution had intended such to be the law, it was easy for them to have said so, and they should have so declared in terms. And, in the absence of a declaration of that kind, I do not consider myself authorized to so interpret a phrase of that instrument; certainly not unless the intent of its authors to that effect is plainly apparent; and we look in vain for such intent. Upon a question of statutory construction it was said in Blythe v. Ayres, 96 Cal. 582, 31 Pac. 924: "We are not here to construct a statute, but to construe a statute. We can neither interpolate nor eliminate, and we are bound to assume that the legislature enacted the law as it now stands with a due comprehension of the meaning of words, and of the rules of statutory construction, and that they incorporated into the act all that was intended, and that they intended that effect should be given to all that was found therein." And that principle of construction applies with full force here. If any layman of ordinary intelligence, be he merchant, doctor, or mechanic, should have the question submitted to him as to the proper signification of the words here under consideration, to wit, the officer's commission shall expire "at the next election by the people," he would say without hesitation that the commission expired at the next general election. Such is the fair and legitimate construction of the language. There are some decisions of courts of other states which in a measure look in an opposite direction from the views here expressed. But these decisions are largely based upon provisions of law not identical with the one here involved. Many of those provisions use the term "regular election," and in such cases stress by the court is laid upon the word "regular" as a most material element in arriving at the true construction of the language. Notwithstanding the foregoing construction of the constitutional provision is favorable to the petitioner, still the relief he asks must be denied. For, though the appointee's commission expire at "the next election by the people," still, in the absence of some law authorizing the election of a lieutenant governor at that time, no election can be held, and I find no such law. A provision of constitution or statute declaring a certain day upon which the commission of an officer shall expire is in no sense a provision that an election shall be held upon that day to fill the office. Under these conditions the present appointee of the governor will hold until his successor is elected and qualified, regardless of the day upon which his commission may expire; and his successor can only be elected at a time fixed by law, which time will be at the regular state election in the year 1898.

RALPHS v. HENSLER et al. (L. A. 83.)

PLEADING—EFFECT OF AMENDMENT.

Admissions in an original answer cannot be used against defendant after the filing of an amended answer omitting them.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action by George A. Ralphs against L. E. Hensler and another. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

McKeeby & Appel, for appellants. Jones & Weller, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Appeals from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial. The nature of this action is sufficiently indicated in the opinion rendered upon the first appeal. Ralphs v. Hensler, 97 Cal. 296, 32 Pac. 243. The second trial of the action was entered upon by the respective parties under the same pleadings which were considered upon the first appeal. Plaintiff, after making his formal proofs, introduced the power of attorney, and exhibited to the court defendants' answer. That answer was then a subsisting, operative pleading, and contained the averments and admissions which, in the opinion of this court as declared in the ninety-seventh volume of our Reports, amounted to a ratification by defendant Hensler of the acts of her attorney, performed under the insufficient power given to him. At the conclusion of the taking of plaintiff's evidence, defendant moved for a nonsuit, and among the grounds urged was the one that the amended complaint upon which the action was being tried failed to state a cause of action. The particular in which the amended complaint was insufficient will be found designated and discussed in the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice De Haven rendered upon the former appeal. The trial court held properly that the complaint was radically defective, but granted plaintiff's attorney leave to amend. The amendment which plaintiff's attorney thus made was a very simple, though important, one. It consisted in embodying in his amended complaint a true copy of the mortgage. Defendants' attorney made no objection to the allowance of this amendment, merely insisting that in case it was made he should be permitted to file an amended answer. He obtained this general leave to file an amended answer without disclosing the form which his amendment would take, and, indeed, by practicing what amounts to concealment upon the court of the nature of it. As plaintiff's attorney pointed out to the court in the discussion which was had upon the matter, there was nothing in the amendment which he proposed to make upon behalf of the plaintiff by attaching to the complaint a copy of the mortgage, which called for or necessitated any amendment to the answer, and he asked of defendant's attorney, "What is there to answer to?" The only enlightenment which court or counsel was given upon the matter is found in the evasive reply, "There is something." What that something was in due time appeared. The case was continued to allow the filing of the amended pleadings. The amended answer of defendant filed in pursuance of the leave of court thus obtained was an answer which omitted all of the averments which the defendant had theretofore solemnly made, and which this court had held to amount to a ratification. The court took further evidence, none of it, however, bearing upon the question of ratification, and rendered its judgment in favor of plaintiff.

The principal contention upon this appeal is that at the time when the judgment was rendered there was no evidence before the court of a ratification; that the pleading in which acts constituting a ratification had been set up by defendant, and which pleading amounted to a binding admission against her, was no longer subsisting and operative; that it had been superseded for all purposes by the amended answer which was before the court when the cause was determined; that the record discloses that the pleading containing the admission was never introduced in evidence; that it was merely exhibited to the court, and that, if introduced in evidence, when the pleadings were changed and the admission withdrawn, it ceased to be evidence in the case, and could not, therefore, have been properly considered by the judge. This contention of appellant must be sustained. It was early held in the case of Mecham v. McKay, 37 Cal. 154, that an original pleading containing an admission against interest, which original pleading had been superseded by an amended pleading, could not be admitted in evidence against the pleader, and it was said: "If the party amends his pleading, stating the facts differently, he would reap no benefit from his amendment if the adverse party were at liberty to use the first pleading as an admission to overthrow the amended pleading." This case has frequently been followed. Ponce v. McElvy, 51 Cal. 222; Pfister v. Wade, 69 Cal. 133, 10 Pac. 369; Wheeler v. West, 71 Cal. 126, 11 Pac. 871. Under the rule as thus laid down defendants' answer containing the admissions amounting to a ratification was superseded, and ceased to be a subsisting pleading. Its declarations could not have been received or considered by the court. But, in the absence of those declarations, there is no other evidence in the case tending to show ratification, nor is it even contended by respondent's attorney that the power of attorney executed by Mrs. Hensler to McCarthy contains sufficient authority for the execution in Mrs. Hensler's name of the note and mortgage in suit. It follows that the judgment and order must be reversed, and the cause remanded; and it is ordered accordingly.

In re WINTER'S ESTATE. (Sac. 103.)

WILL—CONSTRUCTIONS.

Testator gave property to his wife "for the remainder of her life. Then it is to be sold, and the proceeds divided between my surviving brothers and sisters." Held, that the division was to be, not among the brothers and sisters surviving at the death of testator, but at the time for distribution.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Daniel Winter, deceased. Appeal from decree of distribution. Affirmed.

J. A. Louttit, for appellant. Elliott & Elliott, for respondent Winter. Baldwin & Thompson, for respondent administrator.

VANCLIEF, C. The will of Daniel Winter, among other things, contained the following paragraph: "Thirdly. I will and bequeath to my wife, Annie Winter, all of my estate, that I die possessed of, excepting the ranch I am living on, on Union Island, San Joaquin county, California, which I will and bequeath to my wife, Annie Winter, for the remainder of her life. Then it is to be sold, and the proceeds to be divided between my surviving brothers and sisters." Four brothers and one sister survived the testator; but two of the brothers died during the life of Annie Winter, the widow of the testator, leaving next of kin, respectively, their heirs at law. The other two of the brothers and one sister survived the widow of the testator, Annie Winter, who was executrix of the will. After the death of said executrix an administrator of the estate of the testator with the will annexed converted the ranch into money, and applied to the court for distribution thereof in accordance with the will; and thereupon the court decreed that all the money proceeds of the ranch be distributed equally to the sister and the two surviving brothers, allowing no part of the money to go to the heirs of either of the two deceased brothers. The appellant, who is the assignee of the heirs of the deceased brothers, contends that two-fifths of the money should have been distributed to him, as assignee of the heirs of the deceased brothers. The solution of the question depends upon whether the survivorship mentioned in the will relates to the time of the death of the testator, or to the time when the ranch was to be sold, after the death of the widow, Annie Winter. If to the former, then each of the brothers, upon the death of the testator, took a vested interest in the bequest, which, upon his death at any time thereafter, passed to his heirs, and became assignable by them. If, on the other hand, the survivorship relates to the time the land was to be sold, then only the brothers and sisters of the testator surviving at the time the sale of the land should have been made could take any interest whatever. In other words, if the survivorship relates to a point of time after the death of the life tenant, each brother took only a contingent interest in the bequest of money, dependent upon his surviving the life tenant, which might not happen. The question to what period survivorship is to relate must depend rather upon the apparent intention of the testator in each case, than upon any rigid rule, or any technical words. And this intention is to be collected either from the particular disposition, or the general context of the will. Newton v. Ayscough, 19 Ves. 536; Denny v. Kettell, 135 Mass. 139. The meaning of that clause of the will now under consideration seems to be plain. The widow took a life estate; at her death the ranch to be sold, and the proceeds to be divided among the surviving brothers and sisters, i. e. to the brothers and sisters then surviving. The exact wording of the clause is: "To my wife, Annie Winter, for the remainder of her life. Then it is to be sold, and the proceeds to be divided between my surviving brothers and sisters." I do not think that can be construed to mean the brothers and sisters surviving at the time of the testator's death. In Brograve v. Winder, 2 Ves. Jr. 638, the testator having directed that certain real estate should be converted into money at a stated period, and the proceeds then distributed, Lord Chancellor Loughborough said: "In this will, the penning of which is very particular, when once you fix his intention, that they shall take it in money, which is clearly the sense of this will, there is no gift till the distribution. The object of the distribution is pointed out to be among the persons named, or the survivors or survivor. That excluded the possibility of taking in, as objects of the distribution, persons who are dead." In Olney v. Hull, 21 Pick. 313, the court said: "In this will it is perfectly clear that the testator intended to give to his wife the improvement of his farm during her life or widowhood. And, having carved out this estate for her, he gave the remainder to his surviving sons, to be equally divided between them. Had he given generally to his sons, all who happened to be alive at his decease, viz. all who survived him, would have taken. * * * The time when the estate was to be divided among the sons is certain and definite. It was when the intermediate estate terminated by the death or marriage of the tenant. Among whom was it to be divided? Not those who survived any prior event, not those who survived the father, but those who survived that particular event,—those surviving the death or marriage of the widow." As a general rule, if a legacy be given to two or more, to be equally divided between them, or to the survivor or survivors of them, the survivorship must be referred to the period of division. Russell v. Long, 4 Ves. 551; Elwin v. Elwin, 8 Ves. 547; Cripps v. Wolcott, 4 Madd. 15. If a previous life estate be given, then the period of division is the death of the tenant for life, and the survivors at that time take the whole. Daniell v. Daniell, 6 Ves. 300; Jenour v. Jenour, 10 Ves. 566; Browne v. Lord Kenyon, 3 Madd. 416; Denny v. Kettrell, 135 Mass. 139; 3 Jarm. Wills, 585–589; Rop. Leg. 563.

Section 1336 of the Civil Code provides: "Words in a will referring to death or survivorship, simply, relate to the time of the testator's death, unless possession is actually postponed, when they must be referred to the time of possession." Whatever may be the meaning of the latter clause of this section, it is enough for the purposes of this appeal to say that it is not in conflict with any of the authorities above cited. Taken literally, it would seem to remove all doubt in this case that the words in the will referring to survivorship relate to the time of the sale of the ranch, since possession of the legacies (in money) to the brothers and sisters was actually postponed until such sale. Moreover, the will does not purport to devise to the brothers or sisters any interest in the land, but legacies in money to be raised by a sale of the land, although, no doubt, a court of equity would consider the land personal from and after the time when it should have been converted into money according to terms of the will. In this respect the case is like that of Brograve v.

Winder, supra, in which it was held there was no gift till the distribution of the money. I think it reasonably clear the intention of the testator was to bequeath the money proceeds of the ranch only to those of his brothers and sisters living at the time appointed in the will for the distribution of the money, and that the lower court did not err in so deciding. It follows, I think, that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

WARD, Sheriff, v. HEALY (ASHER, Intervener. Sac. 89).

INSOLVENCY—EFFECT ON EXECUTION LIENS—INTERVENTION BY ASSIGNEE—PLEADING AND PROOF.

1. Where property is in the sheriff's custody under execution levy at the time of the adjudication of insolvency of the execution debtor and the appointment of a receiver, the lien thereon of the execution creditor, and his right to compel a sale thereof in satisfaction of his judgment, are not affected by the insolvency proceeding.

2. One intervening as assignee in insolvency must aver and prove the assignment to him.

3. While an assignee in insolvency may intervene in an action by the receiver in insolvency, and join in seeking a recovery against defendant, his prayer that plaintiff, as receiver, may be compelled to account to him, as assignee, for any recovery, is at least superfluous, as the assignee, without resorting to a separate action, may call the receiver to account before the court in insolvency.

Department 2. Appeal from the superior court, Lassen county; W. T. Masten, Judge.

Action by F. G. Ward, Sheriff of Lassen county, against Matt Healy. M. Asher intervened. Judgment against defendant, and he appeals. Reversed.

Spencer & Raker and F. E. Spencer, for appellant. Shinn & Shinn, for respondent. Goodwin & Goodwin, for assignee.

HENSHAW, J. These appeals are from the judgment, and from the order denying defendant a new trial. Plaintiff for cause of action set forth that upon May 25, 1893, one James M. Smith was by the superior court adjudged to be an insolvent debtor, and on said day plaintiff, sheriff of the county, was appointed receiver of his property. Upon the 8th day of June, 1893, plaintiff "gave the bond required by said order, and entered upon the discharge of his duties as receiver, and, acting as such receiver, took possession of sixty head of horses belonging to the insolvent." Thereafter he gave due and legal notice that upon June 24, 1893, he would, as receiver, sell said horses at public auction. Defendant claimed some interest in or lien upon the horses, and sought an order from the court prohibiting the sale. Thereupon such proceedings were had in the matter that the following stipulation was entered into between defendant and the receiver, and spread upon the minutes of the court: "Counsel now agree that the sheriff now proceed to sell the property now in his keeping, and advertised to be sold this day, belonging to the said insolvent; the proceeds of said sale to be held by him subject to the decision of this court as to its disposal." In pursuance of this stipulation, plaintiff proceeded to sell, and did sell, the horses at public auction, to defendant, for the sum of $658.50, and delivered them to defendant upon the day of the sale. Plaintiff has demanded payment of said sum, which defendant refuses to pay. Defendant, for answer, denied that plaintiff was the receiver in insolvency; denied that plaintiff sold the horses as receiver, but admitted and averred that he sold them as sheriff. He admitted also his purchase of the horses at the sale, and likewise admitted that he had failed to pay the purchase price. But in this regard he alleged that, before the appointment of plaintiff as receiver, he was a judgment creditor of said James M. Smith, and had caused to be issued and placed in plaintiff's hands, as sheriff for levy, a writ of execution. Plaintiff, as sheriff, levied upon, took into and retained in possession the said horses, under and by virtue of the writ of execution, before the insolvency proceedings of said Smith were commenced. This possession continued until after the sale. It was the lawful duty of plaintiff, as sheriff, to sell the horses under the writ for the benefit of defendant, and it was defendant's right to become a purchaser at the sale, and have the proceeds of the sale applied as a payment upon his judgment. M. Asher intervened as assignee in insolvency, asking that defendant be compelled to pay the purchase price to plaintiff, and that plaintiff be directed to account to him for the same.

There were thus presented three different claims: The plaintiff, who sued as sheriff, contends that he did not sell as receiver, nor under execution, but under the stipulation, and is therefore entitled to recover the money, and hold it until directed by the court to turn it over either to the assignee, or to the judgment creditor; the intervener demands the money as part of the insolvent's property; while the defendant insists that the purchase price should be applied in reduction of his judgment.

As to plaintiff's contention that he did not sell either as receiver, or under the execution, but under the stipulation, it need but be said that unless he sold either as receiver, or as sheriff under execution levy, he had no legal right to sell Smith's property at all. He could not sell in both capacities. He had no authority to sell except in one or the other. Smith was not a party to the agreement, and the only legal effect of the stipulation was that the rival claimants agreed to permit the sale, leaving for future determination the question whether the sale should be legally regarded as made in the insolvency proceedings, or under the execution. By this action a decision upon that question is sought. It is undisputed that if the execution levy was made before the insolvency proceedings were commenced, and the levy was not released at the time of, or before, the sale, the judgment creditor's rights are prior and superior to those of the receiver, and the sale should be treated as made under the execution. The court found that the sheriff did not levy upon the horses under the execution, and did not take the horses into his possession until after the adjudication of insolvency. These findings are attacked, and, we think, successfully. It is uncontradicted that the writ of execution was placed in the sheriff's hands, and receipted for by him, upon May 15, 1893. The order of adjudication of insolvency was made May 25, 1893. The evidence upon the subject is that of Frank Strong, a deputy sheriff. He is asked: "Q. Did you make a levy on the property under that execution? A. Not that day. I had previous to that, some time about the 15th of May. Q. You brought the execution to us last night, and showed us you had found it, and you found it in the sheriff's office? A. Yes, sir; but I don't recollect ever seeing that execution after I went out to levy on the execution. I left the writ at home, and only took copies with me." He further testified that on about the 15th day of June he went out to Madeline Plains, and took the horses from the charge of the sheriff's keeper into his own immediate custody; that he attended to all matters connected with the taking and sale of the horses; that the sheriff personally had nothing to do with them; and that the sole official position which he held was that of deputy sheriff. It is also in evidence, without conflict, that defendant's attorneys instructed the sheriff not to release his levy under the writ, and to sell the property levied upon.

The only answer which respondent's counsel make to this evidence of a levy upon May 15th is that appellant's counsel knew that it "had reference to a levy upon real estate, and had no relation to any matter in question in this suit." To which appellant's counsel retort that "they know the witness meant what he said, and that his statement did not have reference to a levy on real estate." With this wide divergence of knowledge upon their part, we are left to draw our own information from the record itself. In that no intimation appears of any levy upon real estate, or that the evidence is not addressed to the taking of the horses; and it may also be suggested that, if the evidence had no relation to any matter in question, it was the plain duty of respondent's counsel to see that it was eliminated from the bill of exceptions. If, then, as appears from the foregoing, the property was in the sheriff's custody, under execution levy, at the time of the adjudication of insolvency and the appointment of the receiver, defendant's lien thereon, and his right to compel a sale thereof in satisfaction of his judgment, was in no way affected by those proceedings. Vermont Marble Co. v. Superior Court, 99 Cal. 579, 34 Pac. 326.

From what has been said, it necessarily results that a new trial must be ordered, in view of which it becomes pertinent to consider some of the other contentions of appellant.

The complaint in intervention nowhere averred that an assignment had been made to Asher, the intervener. Upon the trial no evidence was offered to show any assignment to him. It is the assignment which vests title in the assignee. The averment of such assignment was necessary in pleading, and essential in proof; otherwise the assignee has no standing in the case, and neither pleads nor establishes in himself a cause of action. Defendant's demurrer to the complaint in intervention should have been sustained, and his motion for a nonsuit against the intervener for failure to prove the assignment should have been granted. Insolvency Act 1880, §§ 17, 18; King v. Felton, 63 Cal. 67.

So far as the complaint in intervention joins with the plaintiff in seeking a recovery against the defendant, it is within the rules permitting an intervention; but its demand that the plaintiff, as receiver, be compelled to account with the intervener as assignee is at least superfluous. If plaintiff recovers the moneys at all, he recovers them as receiver. As receiver, he is an officer of the court in insolvency. The assignee, without resorting to a separate action, may call him to account before the court in insolvency, and there have his accounts adjusted and settled without resort to a separate action in equity. The judgment and order are reversed, with directions to the trial court to sustain defendant's demurrer to the complaint in intervention, with leave to the intervener to amend.

HUGHES v. DOE. (S. F. 397.)[1]

DEED TO ONE LIVING AS WIFE OF GRANTOR—SUIT TO SET ASIDE.

In a suit by the wife of a grantor against the grantee to set aside deeds executed by him to one stated in the deeds to be his wife, and reciting that they were made in consideration of love and affection, and for the better maintenance, support, and protection of the grantee, which deeds were executed, the one three years, the other one year, before the grantor's death, and filed a few hours after his decease. the court found that defendant, in the lifetime of deceased, rendered to him such services as ordinarily devolve on a wife, which she erroneously believed herself to be, and that she at divers times paid him money arising from her business ventures, and that such services and payments were sufficient consideration for a half interest only in the property conveyed; and as conclusion of law found that plaintiff since the death of her husband had been entitled to possession of an undivided half of the property as tenant in common with defendant, and decreed cancellation of the deed to that extent. Held, that defendant could not complain thereof, it not appearing how much she paid deceased.

[1] Rehearing denied.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by John C. Hughes, as special administrator of Elizabeth L. Moxley, deceased, against Elizabeth W. H. Doe, sometimes called Elizabeth W. H. Moxley. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edward R. Taylor and A. Comte, Jr., for appellant. John C. Hughes and L. T. Hatfield, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. Elizabeth L. Moxley commenced this action to have two deeds of lands in the city of San Francisco, made by John S. Moxley to the defendant, vacated and set aside. The court below found the facts, and adjudged that each of the said deeds "be, and the same is hereby, canceled, annulled, and for naught held to the extent of an undivided one-half interest in the said real estate in said deed described." After the entry of the judgment the plaintiff, Elizabeth L. Moxley, died, and thereupon the present plaintiff, as administrator of her estate, was substituted in her place. From the judgment entered, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

The only points made for a reversal are that the findings were not justified by the evidence, and that the decision was against law. The evidence introduced covers about 250 pages of the printed transcript, and it is very elaborately discussed by counsel in their briefs. No useful purpose would, however, be subserved by setting it out at length, and we shall therefore confine ourselves to a statement of a few of the more important matters disclosed by it. It appears that John S. Moxley and Elizabeth L. Moxley were married in the city of Baltimore on the 15th day of May, 1849, and that they continued to be husband and wife so long as they both lived. Three weeks after the marriage Moxley started for California, leaving his wife in Baltimore with her mother and sister, where she continued to reside until she died. Moxley arrived in California in due time, and thereafter made his home in San Francisco most of the time until he died, on the 10th day of September, 1892. In 1868 he was in Virginia City, in the state of Nevada, and became acquainted with the defendant, who was engaged in carrying on a millinery business there. In the month of August in that year she became sick and confined to her bed, and while so confined he and she entered into a contract of marriage. Shortly thereafter she sold out her millinery business, and was removed to San Francisco, where she recovered from her illness, and where, in November following, he and she assumed marital relations with each other. In the winter of 1869, defendant, with some goods, went to Salem, Or., and opened a millinery store there. Thereafter she carried on the millinery business in Salem until the spring of 1878, when she closed it out, and went to Portland, Or., where she engaged in a like business, and carried it on for about a year and a half. She then sold out her interest in the business for $8,000, and returned to San Francisco, where Moxley and she thereafter lived together as husband and wife. While defendant was living in Salem and Portland she sent all her earnings to Moxley, and he bought goods as she needed them, and forwarded them to her. She also visited Moxley a few times at San Francisco, and he visited her a few times at her place of business. During the last 25 years of his life Moxley had many real-estate transactions in the city of San Francisco. He bought, mortgaged, and sold sundry pieces of real property. Among such transactions were the following: On March 9, 1867, there was conveyed to him a lot of land 120 feet by 109 feet in extent, situate at the northeasterly corner of McAllister street and Van Ness avenue, for the expressed consideration of $6,000. On August 1, 1891, there was conveyed to him a block of land bounded by Silver avenue, Silliman, College, and University streets, and known as "block sixty-nine of the University Mound survey," for the expressed consideration of $3,500. On November 29, 1878, Moxley conveyed to Elizabeth W. Harrington—that being defendant's maiden name—the lot situate at the corner of McAllister street and Van Ness avenue, and other property, for the expressed consideration of $8,000, and on May 1, 1880, he conveyed to her by the same name another piece of property for the expressed consideration of $1,000. The first of these deeds to defendant was recorded April 24, 1880, and the last on the day of its date. On May 17, 1880, Elizabeth W. Harrington reconveyed to Moxley the lot at the corner of McAllister street and Van Ness avenue, and also that described in the last-named deed, for the expressed consideration of $2,500. On August 15, 1889, Moxley executed to Elizabeth W. Moxley a deed of the lot situate at the corner of McAllister street and Van Ness avenue, and on August 1, 1891, he also executed to her a deed of the block bounded by Silver avenue, Silliman, College, and University streets. These deeds were acknowledged on the days of their dates, and in each of them the grantee was named as the wife of the grantor, and both purported to be made "for and in consideration of the love and affection which the said party of the first part has and bears unto the said party of the second part, as also for the better maintenance, support, and protection of the said party of the second part." The said deeds were not recorded until about 10 hours after Moxley died, when they were filed for record by defendant; and they are the deeds sought to be canceled and set aside in this action.

When Moxley died, he left no property other than that in controversy here, but defendant had other property. The plaintiff claimed that she was the lawful wife of Moxley, that the property in controversy was their community property, and that the said deeds were made to fraudulently deprive her of her community rights. On the other hand, the defendant claimed that from the time Moxley and she assumed marital relations in November, 1868, she believed she was his lawful wife; that she thereafter lived with him, and cared for him as a true and faithful wife; that she worked and made money which was used in making improvements on the McAllister street property and in paying street assessments, taxes, and other expenses thereon; that the Silver avenue property was bought and paid for solely with money made by her in her business; and that the said deeds were executed in good faith, and without any fraudulent intent, on the part of Moxley or herself, to deprive the plaintiff of any rights whatever. The court, among other things, found that the plaintiff was the widow of John S. Moxley; that the defendant was not the widow of said Moxley; that she was never married to him, and that her true name was Elizabeth W. Harrington; "that the defendant, in the lifetime of said John Smith Moxley, rendered to him such services and performed such duties as ordinarily devolve upon a wife, which she believed herself to be, and she at divers times paid to decedent sums of money arising from her efforts in business ventures; that all of the services so rendered, and the total sum of such payments, were sufficient to constitute a valuable consideration for the purchase of an undivided one-half interest in the property above described as conveyed to her, but no more." And as conclusions of law the court, among other things, found: "That plaintiff is now, and at all times since the 10th day of September, 1892, has been, entitled to the possession of an undivided one-half of the property hereinbefore described as the tenant in common with defendant." Without stating the case more fully, it seems enough to say that, in our opinion, the judgment cannot be reversed for want of evidence to justify the findings. It is true, there is nothing in the record to show how much money was paid to Moxley by defendant, and perhaps it would have been impossible to make such showing. Still the burden was upon the defendant to show an adequate consideration for the deeds, and it was the province of the court to weigh the evidence, and determine its effect. It attempted to do so, and we cannot say that its conclusions were wrong. We see no valid ground to support the contention that the decision was against law. The findings are very complete, and they cover all of the material issues raised by the pleadings. We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

McARTHUR v. MAGEE. (L. A. 99.) [1]

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 27, 1896.)

PLEDGE OF MORTGAGE—FORECLOSURE.

1. A pledgee of mortgage notes as collateral security, under an assignment which gives him the right, on default, to realize on the same by sale, but does not restrict him to that method, may either sell them, or, under Civ. Code, § 3006, which gives a pledgee of any evidence of debt the right to realize on it only by collection, he may realize on them by foreclosing the mortgage securing them, which, incidentally with them, passed into pledge.

2. An action by a mortgagee to foreclose a mortgage securing notes assigned as collateral security for the principal mortgage debt is not an action for the recovery of the principal debt, within Code Civ. Proc. § 726, which allows but one action for the recovery of any mortgage debt, so as to render a foreclosure of the principal mortgage a waiver of the mortgagee's right to foreclose the collateral mortgage to satisfy a deficiency judgment obtained in the foreclosure of the principal mortgage.

Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. M. McKinley, Judge.

Action by Charles H. McArthur against H. W. Magee for conversion. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Will D. Gould, Wm. E. Cox, and Chapman & Hendrick, for appellant. D. P. Hatch, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's complaint having been sustained, and plaintiff having elected to stand upon his pleading, judgment passed for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. The following are the facts pleaded and claimed to constitute a cause of action in conversion: On October 15, 1891, defendant, Magee, loaned to plaintiff $10,500, payable one year from date, with interest at the rate of 11 per cent. per annum. On the same day, McArthur and wife executed to Magee a mortgage on certain realty to secure this debt. At the same time, and as collateral security, they assigned to defendant four promissory notes secured by mortgage executed by Mrs. McCormick to McArthur. The notes were for $5,000 each. After McArthur's debt became due, Magee brought his action in foreclosure, obtained judgment, caused the mortgaged property to be sold, and himself became the purchaser thereof for the sum of $3,150. He caused a deficiency judgment to be entered against McArthur for the balance of the debt, amounting to $9,468.90. The McCormick notes falling due and remaining unpaid, Magee likewise brought suit in foreclosure upon them, and obtained judgment for the full amount due. The property was sold, and purchased by Magee, who subsequently obtained the sheriff's deed therefor. The written assignment to Magee of the McCormick notes and mortgage contained the following provision: "In case default be made in the payment of said ten thousand five hundred dollar ($10,500) note, then said Magee may maintain immediately an action against the assignors of this mortgage for the purpose of procuring, and may procure, a judgment fixing the amount due to him under said note, and directing that said McCormick notes and mortgage be sold by the sheriff for the purpose of satisfying the amount due to said Magee." It is averred that, in foreclosing and merging the McCormick notes and mortgage into a judgment, Magee converted plaintiff's property to his own use, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $20,000. It is also averred that defendant, Magee, has paid no part of the sum, nor has in any way accounted to plaintiff for said notes and mortgage. The prayer of plaintiff is that defendant be required to pay him $20,000, and to satisfy the deficiency judgment of $9,468.90 entered in the foreclosure suit of Magee v. McArthur. The demand, therefore, is for the face value of the McCormick notes thus alleged to have been converted, and for a satisfaction of the deficiency judgment.

[1] Rehearing denied.

Appellant argues in support of the sufficiency of his complaint that defendant held the McCormick notes and mortgages in pledge as collateral security, which may at once be conceded. He claims that as under section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt, or the enforcement of any right secured by mortgage, by bringing suit against McArthur on his $10,500 note, without mention of the McCormick notes as collateral security, and by taking a personal judgment for the deficiency against McArthur, Magee waived his security in the McCormick notes and mortgage. These last-named notes thereby became the property of McArthur, freed from any lien, and Magee's subsequent dealings with them amounted to a conversion. Appellant further contends that the above-quoted provision in the contract of assignment and pledge restricted Magee to a sale of the McCormick notes, and that his foreclosure and merger of them into a judgment was therefore a conversion. In disposing of the last contention, it need only be pointed out that by section 3006 of the Civil Code a pledgee is forbidden to sell any evidence of debt pledged to him, but his right is limited to collecting the same when due. This limitation, being designed for the benefit of the pledgor, may be waived by him, as was done in this case. But the effect of the contract is not to restrict the pledgee to the mode indicated, but is merely a permission added to his statutory right; i. e. under the contract he may either collect or sell, whereas by the Code he could only collect. Jones, Pledges, §§ 645–651. So far, then, as the contract affects the question, Magee was perfectly justified in collecting the McCormick notes, after default in the payment, by foreclosure proceedings.

Reverting to the first contention of appellant, it may be briefly said that Magee's right to foreclose the McArthur mortgage cannot be disputed. It was not incumbent upon him in that suit to make mention of the additional collateral security which he held, since the decree in the action of foreclosure could not have dealt with that security. Bank v. Middlekauff, 45 Pac. 840. When the mortgaged property, the primary source of payment of the McArthur debt, had been exhausted by sale, Magee was entitled to have entered, as he did, a personal judgment for the unpaid portion of the debt. Appellant seems to hold that, because the McCormick notes secured by mortgage were themselves security for the McArthur debt, the McCormick mortgage is to be regarded as a mortgage given primarily to secure the McArthur note; that Magee should have foreclosed the two mortgages in the one action; and that, having failed to do so, he waived the lien of the McCormick securities. But this is manifestly an untenable position. The land covered by the McCormick mortgage was not subjected to any lien to secure the McArthur note. It had been mortgaged to secure the McCormick notes, which notes having been pledged as collateral security the mortgage, as an incident, passed likewise into pledge. As is said in Bank v. Casaccia, 103 Cal. 641, 37 Pac. 648, "An action to foreclose a mortgage which has been assigned as collateral security for the principal debt is not an action for the recovery of the principal debt, but to preserve and enforce the security, which is a duty imposed upon the creditor by the contract of hypothecation, and the principal debt need not be enforced in such action." Magee was thus entitled, if, indeed, it was not his duty, to do exactly as he did,—foreclose the McArthur mortgage, obtain a personal deficiency judgment, and collect by foreclosure the proceeds of the pledged notes and mortgage. And, in doing any or all of these things, he was not chargeable with conversion. He was also entitled to purchase at the McCormick sale, as it is pleaded he did; and, in the absence of fraud, he took a free and absolute title, and was required only to account to McArthur for the proceeds. Kelly v. Matlock, 85 Cal. 122, 24 Pac. 642. Under these circumstances, McArthur's rights are to demand an accounting, under which the proceeds of the McCormick foreclosure would be applied to reduce or extinguish Magee's personal judgment against McArthur, and Magee would be required to pay over any surplus in funds, or to assign over, after reimbursing himself, whatever personal judgment for deficiency he might still hold against McCormick. But this is not what plaintiff sues for. He has not put defendant in default by demanding such an accounting. He does not plead a refusal so to account, or any facts from which such a refusal might be inferred. For all that appears in the complaint, defendant may have done for and given to plaintiff all that he was entitled to demand. In any event, it is certain that no cause of action for conversion is set out in the complaint. The general demurrer to it was therefore properly sustained. The judgment is affirmed.

ERTLE v. LEARY et al. (Sac. 148.)

COUNTIES—CONTRACTS FOR ERECTION OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS—STATUTORY REQUIREMENTS—JAIL.

1. The cells of a jail are a part of the building, and under the county government act of 1893, § 25, subd. 9, giving boards of supervisors authority to contract for the erection of public buildings, contracts for such cells must be let as therein provided.

2. Under the provisions of the county government act of 1893, § 25, subd. 9, that none of the public buildings therein authorized to be erected by a board of supervisors "shall be erected or constructed until the plans and specifications shall have been made therefor and adopted by the board," and "that all such buildings must be erected by contract let to the lowest responsible bidder after notice by publication in a newspaper of general circulation published in such county for at least 60 days," the letting of a contract for the construction of the cells in a new jail, on bids in which each bidder furnishes his own plans and specifications, is illegal, as it not only prevents the competition which it is the object of the statute to secure, but furnishes no standard by which the board can determine the lowest bid, and gives an opportunity for favoritism in awarding the contract.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; W. H. Grant, Judge.

Action by John Ertle against D. M. Leary and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

F. P. Tuttle, for appellants. John M. Fulweiler and Ben P. Tabor, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The demurrer of defendants to the complaint in this action having been overruled, they declined to answer, and plaintiff obtained judgment enjoining defendants—who are the county of Placer, the persons composing the board of supervisors of said county, and D. M. Leary and J. H. Van Dorn—from proceeding under a certain contract, of date November 28, 1894, whereby said Van Dorn undertook to construct parts of a new jail for the use of the county. The judgment also declared the contract to be void. Leary, it seems, represented Van Dorn in the negotiation and execution of the contract. He and his said principal appeal, and contend that the complaint stated no cause of action. It is to be gathered from that pleading that about February 21, 1894, the board of supervisors adopted plans and specifications for the erection of a county courthouse and jail, which jail was to contain cells in number and dimension as there designated, and in accordance therewith the first story of the courthouse and the outer walls of the jail were duly constructed by contract with one McCann. In August, following, the board advertised for bids for the construction of 12 jail cells, and required bidders to furnish complete specifications. Six bids were received, each upon plans and specifications submitted by the bidder, and not upon any previously adopted by the board. The bid presented by Leary, with accompanying plans and specifications, was accepted by unanimous vote of the supervisors, and a contract founded thereon was made with Van Dorn, by which the latter agreed to construct and deliver to the county "the jail of the size and dimensions set forth in the plans, specifications, and detail drawings adopted by said board," and made part of the contract, and the county agreed to pay him therefor the sum of $10,750. The work contracted for included steel cells, with floors, doors, prisoners' corridors, locking devices, and certain plumbing. If said work is done, the moneys of Placer county will be paid therefor, the cost of the county government will be increased, and the property of plaintiff, a resident taxpayer of the county, will, he says, be unjustly taxed.

Boards of supervisors, in their respective counties, have jurisdiction and power to cause to be erected and furnished, by contract let to the lowest responsible bidder, a courthouse, jail, and other public buildings, "provided, that none of the aforesaid buildings shall be erected or constructed until the plans and specifications shall have been made therefor and adopted by the board." County Government Act 1893, § 25, subd. 9. The jail in this case is a new edifice, and we agree with plaintiff that the cells are an integral part of the same, not "furniture," merely, as said by appellants. In the contract the structures to be completed and delivered by Van Dorn are themselves called "the jail," and they probably are the most essential part of the prison. They are therefore within the statute prohibiting the board from causing the same to be constructed until plans, etc., have been made and adopted. But the power given by the act to build the jail carries with it, as an incident, the right to determine the plan and mode, restricted only by such limitations as some statute imposes. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 140; Peterson v. Mayor, etc., 17 N. Y. 449. The provision of the statute above quoted requires that plans and specifications shall be adopted before the building is erected or constructed. Giving to this provision a literal construction would cause it to mean that the board should not construct a building until it had determined the mode and plan in which it should be constructed; but the requirement that before its construction the board shall first adopt certain plans and specifications, taken in connection with the provision immediately following in the same section, that "all such buildings must be erected by contract let to the lowest responsible bidder, after notice by publication in a newspaper of general circulation, published in such county, for at least sixty days," shows that the legislature has clearly restricted the board from entering into a contract for the construction of a building until after an opportunity has been given to bidders to bid for its construction according to plans and specifications which the board may have adopted at least 60 days before awarding the contract. In the present case it appears from the complaint that, in its invitation for bids, the board authorized bidders to furnish the specifications in accordance with which they would construct the jail, and that they were not required to bid for its construction according to the plans and specifications that had been adopted by the board in the previous February. Under this call, six bids were received by the board, and, in the language of the complaint, "each of said bids was and were upon plans and specifications drafted and submitted by each individual bidder, and none of said bids were made under or according to the plans and specifications theretofore adopted by said board of supervisors for the construction of said jail, cells, or interior part of said jail." One of these bids was by Van Dorn, and the contract was awarded to him. Thereafter certain changes were made in the plans presented by him, increasing the contract price, and the contract was entered into with him for the construction of the jail. It is only necessary to compare this transaction with the requirements of the statute, to perceive the invalidity of the contract. To permit each bidder to propose the plans and specifications according to which he will construct the building not only prevents competition in bidding for the work, but gives to the board an opportunity for the exercise of favoritism in awarding the contract, instead of being required to let it to the lowest responsible bidder; for, since neither of the bidders can know of the plans and specifications under which others are making their bids, there is no standard by which the board can determine which is the lowest bidder. Whether these plans and specifications increased the cost of the building above those previously adopted by the board, or not, is immaterial. There was no opportunity for competition in bidding to do the work according to the plans, and the board, by its own act, prevented itself from complying with the requirements of the statute, to let the contract to the lowest responsible bidder. The judgment is affirmed.

SANCHEZ v. GRACE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH. (L. A. 51.)

SEPARATE PROPERTY OF WIFE—VACATION OF HIGHWAY—CONVEYANCE—RELIGIOUS CORPORATION—POSSESSION OF CHURCH EDIFICE.

1. A conveyance of property to a married woman by deed, reciting that it is conveyed "as the separate estate of the grantee," prima facie makes it her separate property.

2. Land deeded to a married woman in exchange for other land owned by her becomes her separate property.

3. A deed of lots in a certain tract, as per map thereof, does not carry any part of what was at the date of the map a highway, on which the tract and lots abutted, though in the meantime the highway had been vacated, and the land conveyed to the grantor of the lots; he not having owned the fee in any part of the highway before its vacation.

4. Land deeded to trustees of a church society will, on the society becoming incorporated, and a church edifice being erected thereon, and used for religious services, be presumed to be in the possession of the corporation, though control is not assumed by any formal act or resolution.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by Maria S. Sanchez against the Grace Methodist Episcopal Church. Judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. Pollard, Henry Bleecker, and Cochran & Williams, for appellant. S. M. White, R. H. F. Variel, Henry T. Gage, and George D. Blake, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Action of ejectment, begun March 11, 1886, for a parcel of land in the city of Los Angeles. Judgment was for plaintiff. Appellant contends that plaintiff never had title in the disputed premises; that, if she did acquire such title, yet it was lost by her conveyance thereof, or by adverse user; and, lastly, that it (the defendant) never ousted the plaintiff or had possession of the premises.

1. In April, 1872, the city council of Los Angeles passed an ordinance vacating portions of a highway in said city commonly known as "Messer's Lane" (styled in the ordinance "Old First Street"), and establishing instead thereof a new street, called "First Street." Plaintiff then owned a number of lots including those designated as lots 23 and 24 (the latter a fractional lot), in block 4 of the "Sanchez Tract," which lots and block abutted on the north side of Messer's Lane. The Sanchez tract extended thence northerly, having an area of 14 acres, intersected by other streets, and bounded on the east by Alameda street. The land on the south side of Messer's Lane, opposite plaintiff's tract, was owned by T. D. Mott and Albert Johnson. The new street established by said ordinance was laid out a little to the south of said lane, so that there intervened between the south line of plaintiff's said lots and the north line of First street thus fixed a piece of land which included the whole of the former lane in that part of its course, and also a narrow, wedgelike strip off the Mott & Johnson tract. April 26, 1872, said Mott & Johnson executed a deed to plaintiff, conveying, "as the separate estate of the grantee," their interest in the whole of such intervening parcel; and on May 3, 1872, the city conveyed to plaintiff its "right, title, claim, and demand" in and to the same premises. The deed of the city recited a consideration of one dollar paid with the grantee's "separate funds and for her separate use," though it was really the result of exchange for other land of plaintiff, contained in the new street, conveyed to the city about the same time by her deed, in which her husband, Tomas Sanchez, joined. The premises in controversy on this appeal are included in the calls of said deeds of the city and Mott & Johnson to plaintiff, and are bounded north by said lots 23 and 24, south by First street, and on the other sides, respectively, by the west line of lot 23 and the east line of lot 24 if those lines were produced to First street.

It is argued that the title became vested in plaintiff's husband as community property. Prima facie, the deed of Mott & Johnson to Mrs. Sanchez, which conveyed, at least, that part of their tract between the new street and the vacated lane, made the estate granted her separate property (Swain v. Duane, 48 Cal. 358); and no attempt was made to rebut the presumption. Whether the deed from the city, reciting a consideration "paid with her own separate funds, and for her separate use," is attended with the like presumption, need not be inquired. It is conceded that the title to all the lands mentioned was originally in the city of Los Angeles, as successor of the Mexican pueblo of that name, and confirmed to it by patent of the United States; and if, as appellant contends and respondent virtually concedes, the title in the soil of Messer's Lane vested in the owners of the abutting lands upon the vacation of that street, or if it then reverted to the city, in either case the title accruing to plaintiff, whether as abutting owner or as grantee of the city, was received in exchange for other land owned by her and conveyed to the city, and unquestionably became her separate estate.

2. On March 29, 1875, plaintiff made a deed to one Leonis, and appellant claims that by this deed she divested herself of title in the demanded premises. Its descriptive portion was as follows: "All those certain lots of land * * * being parts of that tract of land situate on the east side of Alameda street, in said city, known as the 'Sanchez Tract,' and lots 11, 12, 13, 14, 21, 22, 23, 24, in block 4 of said tract, as per subdivision map of said tract made * * * in April, 1871." The map referred to did not exhibit the land in suit as part of the Sanchez tract. Said lots 11, 12, 13, 14, fronted north on Banning street, and abutted south on the other four lots. Admitting that, after the lane was vacated, the land in it was considered by plaintiff as part of the Sanchez tract, yet it was certainly an unsurveyed and unplatted part, and there is no language in the foregoing description apparently designed or sufficiently definite to carry any land not delineated on the map. A more serious question is whether the land in Messer's Lane, to the middle of it, did not become, when the lane was vacated, by a sort of accretion, parcel of the abutting lots, so as to pass with them by the deed to Leonis without further designation. See Challiss v. Railroad Co., 45 Kan. 398, 25 Pac. 894; Railroad Co. v. Patch, 28 Kan. 470,—cases turning upon a peculiar statute. We think no such rule can obtain in this case. The conveyance of land bounded by a highway is presumed to carry title to the median line of the way, but there is no reason in a like presumption to include land which has formed, but forms no longer, part of a highway. In 1875, when the deed was made to Leonis, the soil of the former lane, together with the strip off the Mott & Johnson tract, formed a body of land some 70 feet in width, lying between lots 23, 24, and First street, and wholly free from the legal incidents which pertain to the soil of a highway. There is therefore no more reason to say that any part thereof passed under the designation of those lots in the deed than for extending the scope of that description to adjacent land (if such there had been) which never was impressed with the highway use; more especially since neither party claims that plaintiff owned the fee in any part of said lane before its vacation as a highway. Harris v. Elliott, 10 Pet. 25, 54.

Defendant pleaded certain provisions of the statute of limitations,—sections 325 and 326, Code Civ. Proc. We have been unable to find in the record any sufficient evidence that the land sued for, whether alone or with other land, was for any period of five years before the commencement of the action protected by a substantial inclosure, or was usually cultivated or improved; so that those sections are not available as a defense.

3. In 1882, J. A. Forthman and W. B. Bergin, successors in interest of said Leonis, made a deed to seven named persons, called in the deed "Trustees of the Grace M. E. Church," of premises described thus: "Lot numbered 23 and fractional lot 24 in block 4 of the Sanchez tract, * * * with its continuance up to the line of First street added thereto by the city council of Los Angeles by straightening First street," etc. In 1883, the church—that is, as we understand the evidence, the professed Christian society composed of pastor and lay members called the "Grace Methodist Episcopal Church," governed locally by a quarterly conference consisting of official members, and acting as regards fiscal matters through a board of stewards—erected an edifice for public worship on the land described in this deed, including the premises now in dispute. Subsequently, in December, 1885, the corporation (appellant here) was formed under sections 593–603 of the Civil Code. Its constating instruments show that it was created, among other purposes, to take charge of the building, property, and temporalities of the church; that its principal place of business was to be in the church building; that the trustees to have the management of its affairs were seven in number, and were the same persons styled "trustees" in said deed of Forthman and Bergin; and that such trustees were elected for the purpose of forming the corporation at a meeting of the members of the quarterly conference of said church. Such title as passed by the deed of Forthman and Bergin has never been conveyed to the corporation. It is provided in section 595, Civ. Code, that such a corporation may hold all the property of the association owned prior to incorporation or acquired thereafter in any manner, and transact all business relative thereto. Appellant claims that it has never acted under this provision of the statute; that the seven persons named as grantees of Forthman and Bergin hold whatever title passed by that deed, and were in possession of the premises when the action was commenced; that the corporation "had nothing to do with either the purchase or occupation of said land."

We are concerned only to determine who was the actual occupant of the premises when the suit was brought. It must be conceded that no avowed taking of possession, nor assumption of control of the property by formal act or resolution of the corporation, is shown in the record. But we do not think this was necessary. It was the ecclesiastical society constituting the church, not the seven persons who signed the articles of incorporation, that became a legal entity, with power to transact all business relative to the church property. The trustees or directors were but its agents in that behalf. Civ. Code, §§ 593, 595, 603; Robertson v. Bullions, 11 N. Y. 243; People's Bank v. St. Anthony's Church, 109 N. Y. 512, 17 N. E. 408. It does appear that the church had a pastor to whom it paid a salary; that it collected funds, and furnished the building, and kept it in order. It is fair to infer that it was conducting the ordinary ministrations of the church in the ordinary way, by its pastor, board of stewards, sexton, etc., and for these purposes used the land in question as a place of worship. The society that was doing these things had become incorporated for the express purpose of having the property in charge, and no longer existed as a noncorporate association. We must therefore attribute such acts of possession to the corporate body which had legal power to permit and authorize them, rather than to a concourse of trespassers, none of whom individually had any right to direct the functions of the church in the utilization of the property. That the church permitted its taxes to be paid and its temporal affairs to be managed by a board of stewards, instead of the board of directors or trustees mentioned in the statute and the articles of incorporation, cannot affect the matter. It was the corporation which was created to control the temporalities of the church, not the board of trustees; and it is not important by what name it called its agents for that purpose. We do not mean to hold that the fact of incorporation of a religious or benevolent body necessarily estops a denial that the property enjoyed and used by it is possessed by the corporation, but only that the presumption of such possession is so strong as not to be rebutted by evidence of mere organic corporate inactivity, such as appears in this instance. It was said by a respectable court that a church edifice occupied for the purpose of religious worship by a society which had become incorporated, and not used in any other way, or by any particular individual, must, "from the very nature and necessity of the case, be adjudged to be in actual occupancy of the corporation." Lucas v. Johnson, 8 Barb. 249. It is not necessary in the present case to press the doctrine so far. The order denying a new trial should be affirmed,—a result to occasion, under the circumstances appearing, some degree of regret; but it serves to accentuate the propriety of ascertaining the title to realty before rather than after, undertaking its improvement.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order denying a new trial is affirmed.

CURRY v. HOLLAND. (No. 15,744.)

APPEAL—QUESTIONS OF FACT—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

Where the only point in dispute on an appeal relates to the value of the services sued for, on which the evidence is conflicting, the verdict of the jury will not be disturbed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Edward J. Curry against Patrick Holland. Judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial defendant appeals. Affirmed.

M. E. Babb and A. F. Low, for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Action to recover the reasonable value of work and labor performed by plaintiff for the defendant at the request of the latter, between September 14, 1888, and September 14, 1889, in cutting and fitting clothing in the tailoring establishment of the defendant, in the city of San Francisco. The plaintiff alleged in his complaint that his services thus rendered were reasonably worth the sum of $3,400, that he had been paid on account thereof only the sum of $2,260, and prayed judgment for the balance of $1,140. The defendant denied that the reasonable value of plaintiff's services exceeded $2,260, which had been paid him. The cause was tried by a jury, whose verdict was in favor of plaintiff for $1,140, the sum demanded. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and his appeal is from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The only point in dispute relates to the value of plaintiff's services, as to which appellant contends that the verdict is excessive and not justified by the evidence. Upon this issue, however, there was a substantial conflict of evidence, and for this reason the verdict of the jury should not be disturbed. The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

DUNN et al. v. DUNN et al. (S. F. 153.)

JUDGMENT—VALIDITY AGAINST INSANE PERSON—COLLATERAL ATTACK—INNOCENT PURCHASERS.

1. A judgment of foreclosure entered against an insane person having no guardian, without the appointment of a guardian ad litem, is irregular, but not void.

2. Where land sold under a foreclosure has passed into the hands of third persons, who are bona fide purchasers for value, the judgment under which the sale was made, if regular on its face, though voidable in direct proceedings, or as between the parties, cannot be collaterally attacked.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Lizzie F. Dunn and others against Catherine Dunn and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

F. W. Lawler and Henry K. Mitchell, for appellants. Smith & Murasky, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. February 26, 1878, one Mary A. Kingman owned the premises here in question. It was found that she was then, and long prior thereto had been, insane, incompetent to transact business or to understand the nature of her acts, and entirely without understanding, and continued to be in such mental condition up to the time of her death, in 1886. She had not been judicially declared of unsound mind, and had no guardian. On the date first mentioned, one Garwood loaned to Mary A. Kingman $400, and took from her a mortgage upon the property mentioned to secure the same. On the 11th day of September, 1878, Garwood commenced an action to foreclose the mortgage against said Mary A. Kingman. Personal service of summons was made upon Mary A. Kingman. She suffered default, and a decree of foreclosure was entered. A sale was had under the decree, Garwood being the purchaser for the sum of $555. No redemption was made, and Garwood obtained a deed from the sheriff, and in September, 1879, sold and conveyed the premises to the defendant Catherine Dunn for $3,500, paid by said defendant. It was found that defendant Catherine Dunn had no knowledge of the insanity of Mary A. Kingman before the commencement of this action, and that she purchased the property in good faith, and for a valuable consideration. The plaintiffs are heirs at law of Mary A. Kingman, and bring this suit to annul the mortgage, and the judgment of foreclosure. This cannot now be done. The defendant Catherine Dunn is a purchaser in good faith, and for a valuable consideration. Insane persons may be sued, and jurisdiction over them acquired, as of other persons. True, guardians should be appointed to represent them. It was, no doubt, the duty of the plaintiff to cause it to be done. But the judgment entered without the appointment of a guardian, though irregular, is not void. Undoubtedly it may be vacated in a direct proceeding, if no innocent purchaser has acquired rights under it. But public policy forbids that as to such persons the validity of the judgment shall be questioned. The judgment was regular on its face. The court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and of the person of the defendant. The judgment itself was an adjudication that the court had jurisdiction, and, on collateral attack, was conclusive, except as to infirmities shown in the judgment roll. There may be exceptions to this rule, but this is not one. It is a hardship upon plaintiffs, and it is possible that the mortgage and judgment were obtained by unfair means. But of these defendant had no knowledge, and the wrong cannot be righted at her expense. The judgment is affirmed.

DIXON v. RISLEY, Judge. (S. F. 514.)

APPEAL—MANDATE AND PROCEEDINGS BELOW—AMENDMENT OF PLEADING—PETITION FOR MANDATE.

1. Where the judgment for plaintiff is reversed on appeal, with leave to him to amend his complaint in certain specified respects, the trial court cannot impose payment of costs, as a condition to permission to file the amended complaint.

2. Even in a case where the trial court has a right to impose payment of costs, as a condition to permission to file an amended complaint, it should not order proceedings stayed for an indefinite period, till such costs are paid; but, if plaintiff refused to comply with the condition, it should proceed with the trial as the pleadings are, and then, if plaintiff is defeated, he can, on appeal, present the question whether, in refusing the amendment, the court abused its discretion.

3. A petition for mandate to require the trial court to allow filing of amended complaint, in accordance with the judgment of the appellate court granting leave to plaintiff to amend his complaint in certain specified respects, need not set out in detail the facts constituting the cause of action, or show what were the allegations of the amended complaint.

Department 2. Application by H. S. Dixon, an insane person, by his guardian, J. R. Dixon, for writ of mandate to E. W. Risley, judge of the superior court of Fresno county. Granted.

Minor & Ashley, for petitioner. Horace Hawes, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to require the superior court of the county of Fresno to allow plaintiff in a certain action there pending to amend his complaint, and to proceed with the trial. H. S. Dixon in April, 1891, commenced an action in the superior court of Fresno county to foreclose a mortgage. After the commencement of the action, plaintiff became insane, and J. R. Dixon was appointed guardian for him. An amended complaint was then filed, in which J. R. Dixon, as guardian of H. S. Dixon, was plaintiff. The defendants appeared and answered, and the case was tried, with the result that plaintiff recovered judgment. This judgment, on appeal to this court, was reversed and remanded, with leave to plaintiff to amend his complaint in certain respects specified. 39 Pac. 857. After the remittitur had been filed in the superior court, an order was made, by stipulation of the respective parties in open court, that in all further proceedings plaintiff be represented by his guardian, and have leave to file an amended and supplemental complaint. The amended and supplemental complaint was filed in pursuance of the order. Afterwards, upon defendants' motion, and upon notice, the court modified the order allowing an amended complaint to be filed, by requiring plaintiff, as a condition for permission to file the amended complaint, to pay the costs of the appeal, together with accruing costs, and ordered that all proceedings in the cause be stayed until such costs were paid; and the court further ordered that defendants' time to answer the amended complaint be extended until 10 days after compliance with the order on the part of plaintiff, and after notice of such compliance had been given. Plaintiff has not paid such costs, but, after the making of said last-mentioned order, he asked the court to vacate the same, and to set the cause for trial. This the court refused to do, and still refuses to proceed with the trial of said cause unless plaintiff first pays said costs.

The respondent demurs to the petition on the ground that it does not state sufficient facts, and as uncertain. The point of the demurrer, in regard to uncertainty, is that it does not set out the facts constituting the cause of action in detail, or show what were the allegations or contents of the amended complaint. This was not necessary. The court was directed to permit plaintiff to amend his complaint in certain respects, which were specified. He had an absolute right to make those amendments. Undoubtedly, it was within the power of the superior court to interpret the judgment rendered here, and to restrict the plaintiff to those amendments. If the court erred in its construction of the judgment rendered by this court, or abused its discretion in refusing other amendments, such error or abuse of discretion could not be corrected by mandate. Plaintiff would be forced simply to take his exceptions, and seek his remedy upon an appeal from the judgment. But when the court refuses to allow the amendments which were ordered by this court, even as understood by the trial court, it refuses to obey the direction of this court, and obedience may be compelled. It is not the province of that court to affix conditions to the exercise of privileges granted by this, unless, as is sometimes done, this court directs that the amendment may be made on terms to be fixed by the trial court. It is conceded that the learned judge of the superior court acted in making the order in no contumacious spirit, but conscientiously, in the discharge of his duty; but there has sometimes been friction, and, if the judge could impose conditions upon the exercise of rights granted by this court, a litigant could in some cases be deprived of the benefit of a judgment in his favor here.

In no event, however, was the court justified in making an order which is equivalent to a refusal, for an indefinite period, to try the case. If the court had the right to impose the conditions, and the plaintiff refused to comply with them, the court should proceed with the trial on the pleadings as they now are. Then, if the plaintiff were defeated, he could, on appeal, present the question whether, in refusing the amendment, the court abused its discretion. Under the order the plaintiff must pay the costs, or leave his case forever untried. Let the writ issue as prayed for.

POWER v. MAY, Treasurer. (Sac. 100.)

COUNTIES—OFFICERS—CONTRACTS FOR ATTORNEY'S SERVICES.

1. The board of county supervisors has power to employ an attorney to collect a claim due the county from the state. Lassen Co. v. Shinn, 26 Pac. 365, 88 Cal. 510, followed.

2. Where services have been rendered for the benefit of the county in a manner authorized by law, the board of county supervisors, having had original power in the premises, may cure informalities in procedure by a subsequent ratification and recognition of its liability.

3. A contract by the board of county supervisors with its clerk, under regular salary as such, to pay him a commission for collecting moneys from the state, he and the county attorney having agreed that the former should get the contract and the latter do the work, and the two divide the compensation, is void, as an attempt to increase the compensation of a public official during his term of office.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county.

Action by Maurice E. Power against E. A. May, treasurer of Tulare county. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

F. B. Howard and T. E. Clark, for appellant. Lamberson & Middlecoff, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal from a judgment given on the pleadings. Plaintiff applied for a writ of mandate against defendant, treasurer of Tulare county. In his complaint he averred simply that the auditor of the county had issued to him a warrant, payable out of the hospital fund, which warrant recited that it was "for commissions on moneys collected from the state on indigents." The warrant was presented to the treasurer, who refused to pay it, although there was and is sufficient unappropriated money in the fund for that purpose. After the filing of defendant's answer the court rendered the judgment appealed from.

Respondent contends that the only questions presented by the appeal are two questions of law: (1) Has the board of supervisors the power to employ an attorney for the purpose of collecting a claim due the county from the state? This question is completely answered by the case of Lassen Co. v. Shinn, 88 Cal. 510, 26 Pac. 365. (2) Can the board of supervisors legally allow a claim for the beneficial use of money, labor, or property, although the formalities necessary to bind the county have not been employed? Without entering into an elaborate consideration of this question, it is sufficient to say that this may at times and under certain circumstances be done, provided the power to do so be not withheld in the grant of powers to the board, and provided, further, that the service has been bestowed or the money expended for the benefit of the county in a manner authorized by law. Under such circumstances, if the board had original power in the premises, it may cure informalities or irregularities in procedure by a subsequent ratification and recognition of its liability. Waitz v. Ormsby Co., 1 Nev. 370; Pimental v. City of San Francisco, 21 Cal. 352.

But, while both of these questions may thus be resolved in favor of respondent, their answers do not, as respondent claims, remove all difficulties. The pleading of defendant is far from being a model. Indeed, it is an extremely bad pleading. It denies matters not averred in the complaint. It "alleges that defendant has been informed, and has reason to believe, and does believe" certain facts, but does not aver the existence of these facts. It expressly admits in one paragraph that there is money in the hospital fund sufficient to pay the amount claimed, after payment of all other sums legally chargeable against that fund, and elsewhere seems to aver that the moneys of the fund had all been exhausted before presentation of the demand. Imperfect and inartistic as the answer undoubtedly is, nevertheless it sufficiently sets forth certain matters in defense. If these matters constitute a defense, then it would be good against demurrer, and the court erred in rendering judgment upon the pleadings. The complaint discloses nothing of the nature or origin of the demand of plaintiff for which the warrant was ordered drawn. If the demand was illegal, then, indubitably, the treasurer was authorized to refuse payment of it, and to show this in his answer. It is the illegality of the claim which he seeks to show, and to do this he pleads that the board of supervisors, upon December 8, 1894, by resolution, ordered that John Broder be employed and authorized to collect from the state moneys due for the care of indigents, orphans, and half orphans, said Broder to receive as compensation 15 per cent. of all moneys so collected. At the date of this employment, and thereafter, Broder was clerk of the board of supervisors, under regular salary, paid by the county of Tulare. Maurice E. Power, the plaintiff, at that time and thereafter, was the district attorney of the county, and the agreement between the two was that Broder should secure the employment, Power should perform the service, and the two should divide the compensation. Plaintiff's claim, presented to the board, was "for commissions on $3,926.25 allowed by the state to Tulare county as per contract with John Broder," etc. Defendant also averred that the contract is nonassignable, and that it is void. There is enough here, if the allegations are true, to have entitled the defendant to a judgment. The averments, then, constitute a defense. Plaintiff's claim is expressly based upon the Broder contract. If by this contract the supervisors attempted to increase the compensation of a public official during his term of office, the contract is void, and cannot be made the basis of a recovery in the hands of any person. If Broder, as clerk of the board, colluded with Power, the then district attorney, to procure for themselves a contract, it was not only void as an attempt to increase their compensation, but void as against public policy, which sternly discountenances any personal interest upon the part of public officers in public contracts. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to deny plaintiff's motion for judgment.

KELLY et al. v. LEMBERGER et al. (S. F. 160.)

MECHANIC'S LIEN—REPUTED OWNER OF PREMISES.

1. A claim of lien sufficient in form is properly admitted, as against objection that it does not correctly state the names of either the owners or reputed owners of the premises, there being at the time no evidence before the court to contradict its terms.

2. Though one states, in his claim of lien, that a certain person is owner and reputed owner of the premises, his lien is not impaired by proof that such person was the reputed owner only.

3. A finding that one was the reputed owner of premises, as alleged in a claim of mechanic's lien, is not impaired by the fact that conveyances to other persons were on record.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; F. W. Henshaw, Judge.

Action by Kelly and others against Lemberger and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Morrison, Stratton & Foerster, for appellants. C. L. Colvin, T. F. Graber, and Charles F. Hanlon, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Four actions having been brought against the defendants to foreclose mechanics' liens upon certain land in Berkeley, they were consolidated and tried together under the above title. One of these actions was brought by H. W. Taylor, and judgment was rendered in his favor, giving him a personal judgment against Lemberger, and making the same a lien upon the land. Certain of the defendants moved for a new trial as against the claim of Taylor, and the present appeal is taken from the judgment and from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

The question presented by the appellants is the sufficiency of the claim of lien filed by Taylor, and the error relied upon by them in their motion for a new trial was the admission in evidence of this claim of lien and the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain certain findings. For the purpose of stating "the name of the owner or reputed owner, if known," of the land upon which the improvements were made, the claim of lien offered in evidence was as follows: "That Charles A. Bailey and Frank Lemberger are the names of the owners, and they are the reputed owners, of said premises, and caused said buildings and structures to be erected and constructed." The defendants objected to its introduction, upon the ground that it did not correctly state the names of either the owner or owners, or reputed owner or owners, of the premises, and excepted to the ruling of the court in admitting it in evidence. The claim of lien was, however, sufficient in form to comply with the requirements of the statute, and at the time it was offered it does not appear that there was any evidence before the court to contradict its terms. It was not error, therefore, to admit it in evidence.

From the findings of the court it appears that at the time the claim of lien was filed the appellant Bailey was the actual owner of the northerly 12 feet of the land, and that the wife of Lemberger owned the 24 feet adjoining, and the defendant Claims the southerly 36 feet. In the bill of exceptions the defendants specify, as one of the particulars wherein the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision, "that part of finding 1 which finds that at the time of the filing of the lien the defendant Frank Lemberger was the owner of all the land in said finding described." This exception, however, misconceives the language of the finding. The court did not find that he was the "owner," but that he was the "reputed owner," and the appellants have not excepted to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain this finding. The statute does not require the claimant to state the name of the actual owner, at the risk of losing his lien, but makes his statement of the name of the reputed owner as effective as that of the true owner. Corbett v. Chambers, 109 Cal. 178, 41 Pac. 873. The statement of the same name as owner and as reputed owner does not deprive the claimant of his lien. Arata v. Mining Co., 65 Cal. 340, 4 Pac. 195. And, as he is only required to state the name of the owner or reputed owner, "if known," he may, if he does not know the name, perfect his lien without naming any owner. Lumber Co. v. Newkirk, 80 Cal. 275, 22 Pac. 231. In the absence of any exception to this finding, we must assume that there was ample evidence to show that Lemberger was the reputed owner of the premises, and, if so, the statement of ownership in the claim of lien was sufficient. Its sufficiency was not impaired by the further statement that Bailey was also the reputed owner. The court does not find that Bailey was not a reputed owner at the date of Taylor's contract with Lemberger, or thereafter, but is silent in reference thereto, and its finding that he was the reputed owner prior thereto is immaterial. It appears from the findings that Bailey was the actual owner of a portion of the land, and no exception is made to the findings of the court that the buildings were constructed with the knowledge and consent of the actual owners of the entire land. The fact that conveyances to these owners had been placed on record does not impair the finding that Lemberger was the reputed owner, and the dates of such record were an immaterial fact, and not an issue in the case, and it was not necessary for the court to make any finding thereof. The judgment and order are affirmed.

VENTURA COUNTY v. CLAY et al. (L. A. 159.)

ACTION AGAINST COUNTY TREASURER—PLEADING—JURISDICTION OF SUPERIOR COURT.

1. A complaint on a bond by a county against its treasurer and his bondsmen to recover sums alleged to have been illegally paid out by him is not demurrable as being ambiguous because in the prayer a penalty is asked for which is not authorized in such action.

2. A complaint by a county against a county treasurer, to recover money alleged to have been paid out by him on a warrant issued for a claim on which the county was not liable, is not demurrable because it does not set out the contents of the warrant, where from the facts alleged its illegality must have been apparent on its face, if drawn in compliance with the statute (County Government Act, § 114), which provides that "all warrants must distinctly specify the liability for which they are drawn and when it accrued."

3. The superior court is not deprived of jurisdiction of an action because the separate sums sued for are less than $300 each, where the aggregate for which judgment is asked is greater than that sum.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county; B. T. Williams, Judge.

Action by Ventura county against Henry Clay and others. From a judgment for defendants on a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

H. L. Poplin, for appellant. Orestes Orr, Barnes & Selby, and Blackstock & Ewing, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of defendants on demurrer to the complaint, and whether or not the lower court erred in sustaining the demurrer is the only matter in controversy. The defendant Clay was elected to the office of treasurer of said county for the term commencing on the first Monday in January, 1893, and the other defendants are sureties on his official bond for that term; and this action is upon that official bond, to recover money alleged to have been unlawfully paid out from the treasury of said county by Clay during said term of office. The complaint consists of 38 counts, each charging the payment of a distinct sum of money from the treasury without authority of law, the sums charged to have been so paid out aggregating nearly $4,000. The only substantial differences in the counts are that the several payments are alleged to have been made at different times, and that all were not made to the same person, but a portion thereof to different persons and for different kinds of service. That part of the first count to which alone the demurrer applies is substantially a sample of that part of each of the other counts to which the demurrer is applicable, excepting the aforesaid differences, which are not material to the merits of the demurrer, and is as follows: "That on or about the 8th day of March, 1894, F. E. Smith filed a claim against the county for three-fifths of a month's service during the month of February, 1894, for the sum of $60, which services were performed, as plaintiff is informed and believes, and so alleges the fact to be, in assisting the recorder and auditor of said county in the performance of the duties of his office; and the board of supervisors of said county, on or about the said 8th day of March, 1894, without any authority of law, and when the said claim was not a legal charge against the said county, allowed said claim, and thereupon the auditor of said county drew a warrant in favor of said F. E. Smith for said sum of $60 on the treasury of said county without any authority of law, and the said F. E. Smith presented the same to the said Henry Clay as treasurer of said county, which warrant the said treasurer then paid out of the general fund of said county, while and when the said warrant and claim was not a legal charge against said county, to the damage of said county, plaintiff, in the sum of $60, which sum is due and unpaid from said defendants to said plaintiff." The official bond is in form and substance such as is required by law, and is fully set out in the complaint. The prayer of the complaint is: "Wherefore plaintiff demands judgment against said defendants for the sum of three thousand nine hundred and thirty dollars, the money so paid out by said treasurer without authority of law as aforesaid, together with twenty per cent. damages for the use of said sum of money." The grounds of the demurrer are: That each count is uncertain and ambiguous in several specified particulars; that there is a misjoinder of causes of action; that some of the alleged causes of action appear to be barred by the statutes of limitations; that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action; and that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Two of the sureties on the bond demurred separately, but all the grounds of their demurrer are embraced in the above statement.

1. The so-called specifications of uncertainty are hardly intelligible, and merit no consideration, except to say that, however defective the complaint may be in other respects, it is not subject to the objection that it is uncertain.

2. The demurrer specifies that each count is ambiguous for the same reasons that it is uncertain. In their brief, however, counsel for respondents contend that the complaint is ambiguous for a reason not specified in the demurrer, namely, that it appears doubtful whether the action is for a breach of the official bond, or for the enforcement of a statutory penalty; that, while the body of the complaint indicates that the cause of action is a breach of the bond, the prayer for "twenty per cent. damages for the use of the money" indicates that the action is based upon section 8 of the county government act, which authorizes the recovery of 20 per cent. damages in actions founded thereon. It is unnecessary to follow and answer in detail the futile arguments of counsel to sustain this point. It is enough to say that there is nothing in the body of the complaint indicating that the action is based upon section 8 of the county government act, nor that it is not wholly based upon the official bond set out in the complaint; and, conceding that the prayer asks for more damages or interest than is warranted by the facts alleged in the complaint, yet the complaint is not subject to demurrer on that ground. Bailey v. Dale, 71 Cal. 35, 11 Pac. 804; Althof v. Conheim, 38 Cal. 230.

3. It is contended that the complaint is ambiguous and uncertain as to the terms and contents of the auditor's warrants alleged to have been paid by the treasurer; and, for aught that is alleged, those warrants may have appeared to be for the payment of claims legally chargeable to the county. Assuming, as we must, that the treasurer knew the law, and especially the law prescribing his official duties, he must have known, for example, that an auditor's warrant, directing him to pay F. E. Smith $60 for services "in assisting the recorder and auditor of said county in the performance of the duties of his office," was an order to pay a claim which was not legally chargeable to the county; and that his payment of such order with money belonging to the county was a breach of his official bond; and, since such was the alleged purport and substance of the warrant, it must have appeared upon its face that the claim for which it was drawn was not legally chargeable to the county, and was therefore void. In this respect the case differs materially from the case of Los Angeles Co. v. Lankershim, 100 Cal. 525, 35 Pac. 153, 556. In that case it was held that the treasurer was excusable for having paid what purported to be an auditor's warrant on the school fund without notice that it was not based upon a requisition of the superintendent of schools, nor otherwise invalid. The decision rested upon a finding by the trial court that the payment by the treasurer "was made upon what purported to be a county auditor's warrant made payable to one C. H. Delevan," and it was held that, without any showing to the contrary, it must be presumed that the warrant was regular in form and substance. But in the case at bar the substance of the warrant is alleged to have been such that its illegality must have been apparent on its face. It is alleged that the warrant was drawn for the payment of a claim for services in assisting the recorder and auditor (a salaried officer) "in the performance of the duties of his office." This implies that the warrant stated the services for the payment of which the warrant was drawn. In addition to this, the county government act (section 114) prescribes that "all warrants must distinctly specify the liability for which they are drawn, and when it accrued." This provision, according to the rule in Los Angeles Co. v. Lankershim, supra, authorizes the presumption, nothing appearing to the contrary, that the auditor's warrants in question distinctly specified the liability for which they are alleged to have been drawn. If the complaint misstated the liability for which any warrant was drawn, to the prejudice of the defendants, such misstatement was matter of defense, and could have been corrected by answer.

4. There is no merit in the point that the cause, or any cause, of action appears to be barred by any statute of limitation. The complaint shows that all the warrants were paid by the treasurer during his said term of office, and within three years next preceding the commencement of the action; and, as above shown, the action is upon a written contract, and not upon a penal statute.

5. Nor is there anything worthy of special consideration in the point that the superior court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action. Bailey v. Sloan, 65 Cal. 387, 4 Pac. 349.

6. It seems difficult to understand why counsel claim there is a misjoinder of causes of action, unless it may be that the prayer for 20 per cent. damages had the effect to characterize all the alleged causes of action as being merely penal. But it is too clear for argument that such prayer did not change the alleged breaches of the official bond into causes of action of a penal nature.

7. The only ground upon which it is claimed that the complaint is deficient in facts necessary to constitute a cause of action is that it does not show that the treasurer had notice that the claims for the payment of which the warrants were drawn were not legally chargeable to the county. This point has been considered, but the following cases relating to the duty and responsibility of the treasurer may be added: Merriam v. Supervisors, 72 Cal. 517, 14 Pac. 137; Linden v. Case, 46 Cal. 171; Trinity Co. v. McCammon, 25 Cal. 121. The complaint fully complies with the rule announced in the case of Hedges v. Dam, 72 Cal. 520, 14 Pac. 133, cited by respondent. I think the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instruction to the lower court to overrule the demurrers.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instruction to the lower court to overrule the demurrers.

GOODRICH v. LOUPE et al. (S. F. 417.)

APPEAL—VACATION OF DEFAULT—DISCRETION.

An order setting aside a judgment by default is largely discretionary, and, where moved for at once and granted upon terms, will not be disturbed on appeal, though the showing made is not strong.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Action by one Goodrich against one Loupe and others. Plaintiff appeals from an order setting aside a default judgment in his favor. Affirmed.

Will A. Coulter and C. D. Wright, for appellant. John J. Roche, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from an order setting aside a default judgment. The motion to set aside was based upon the grounds of inadvertence and excusable neglect. The showing made by affidavit is very weak, and, if the lower court had denied the motion to vacate, its action upon appeal probably would not have been disturbed. But in matters of this kind the superior court is vested with large discretion; and in view of the fact that the motion to set aside was made promptly, and also in view of the further fact that the motion was granted upon terms, when taken into consideration with the showing made by affidavit, we have concluded to affirm the action of the trial court. The order appealed from is affirmed.

JENNINGS v. BROWN. (S. F. 181.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 18, 1896.)

AUSTRALIAN BALLOT LAW—BALLOTS.

The writing by a voter, on his ballot, of the party designation of a candidate, after the name, which he has also written in, does not constitute a distinguishing mark which invalidates the ballot.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Mateo county; George H. Buck, Judge.

Contest by J. T. Jennings of the election of J. J. Brown to the office of county supervisor. Judgment for respondent, and contestant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. C. Ross and Knight & Heggerty, for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is a contest for the office of supervisor in the county of San Mateo. The judgment appealed from confirms the election of defendant. The appeal is from the judgment, with a bill of exceptions.

In precinct No. 1 the record shows that 118 votes were counted without objection for contestant, and 11 votes were objected to and reserved by counsel for respondent; 134 votes were counted without objection for respondent, and 19 votes were objected to by contestant. It subsequently appears that all ballots were counted, and as counted the tally stood for Brown 154 votes, for Jennings 128. It is not expressly stated that the ballots objected to by respondent's attorney were ballots for contestant, or that those objected to by contestant were cast for respondent, but it would naturally be supposed that such was the case; and, if so, then the tally clerks must have made a wrong addition. It should have been, on that hypothesis, 153 for Brown, and 129 for Jennings. This would have changed the result as finally declared. The court was requested by the contestant to recount the votes, but declined to do so. There were also 4 ballots which had not been counted by the precinct officers. The bill of exceptions fails to show error in this respect. It surely does not show all that occurred at the trial; for, while it appears that some 30 ballots were objected to, it is impossible to find from the record how the court ruled upon one-half that many. There were two tally clerks, and the court reporter also kept tally. All agreed, and the court was satisfied that no mistake had been made.

We have carefully examined the ballots which were brought here for our inspection under a previous order. We find nothing upon any of these worthy of notice, unless it is the ballot upon which the voter has written, under the head "State Printer," the name "W. D. Craig, Independent Democrat." It is objected that the voter was only authorized to write the name of the person voted for, and that the addition "Independent Democrat" is unauthorized, and may constitute a distinguishing mark. Section 1191, Pol. Code, provides that after a candidate's name shall be printed his party designation, and they were so printed on the ballot. It would be quite natural, then, that one writing in the name of a candidate not in the list should add such designation. Perhaps the statute should be construed as requiring or permitting the name to be written in the same manner as the others are printed. The designation would then be a descriptio personæ, and a part of the designation of the person voted for, and authorized by the statute. This state of things existed in Tebbe v. Smith, 108 Cal. 101, 41 Pac. 454. Upon all the ballots cast at one precinct there appeared, written under the head of "Justice of the Peace," "C. G. Brown, Republican." It was shown that the writing was all in the same hand, and that but one person voting at the precinct was lawfully assisted. This court sanctioned the counting of the vote for the person lawfully assisted. There the word "Republican" was, or might have been, a distinguishing mark, just as "Independent Democrat" is here. The fact was disregarded as of no consequence. I am not inclined to hold that any of the requirements of the election law are directory only, but, while all of its provisions are mandatory, they should be liberally construed. The so-called "Australian Ballot System" only secures secrecy in voting when the elector desires it, and has sufficient independence to insist upon it. But a voter can—and, by one who has sufficient power over him, be forced to—so mark his ballot that it can be identified. Many ways could be suggested in which this could be done without destroying the legality of the ballot. It is quite manifest in this case that the words were not intended as a distinguishing mark, and, as the law may be construed as permitting it, I see no reason for changing the rule followed in Tebbe v. Smith. The judgment is affirmed.

PEYCKE et al. v. KEEFE et al. (S. F. 115.)

APPEAL—STAY OF PROCEEDINGS IN COURT BELOW.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 946, which provides that whenever an appeal is perfected "it stays all further proceedings in the court below upon the judgment or order appealed from," where a party has perfected his appeal to the supreme court from the judgment against him, and from the order of the superior court made on his motion to set aside such judgment, the court below so far loses jurisdiction of the cause that it cannot, pending such appeal, set aside the judgment of its own motion.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Action by Ernest Peycke and Julius Peycke against D. Keefe and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and an order refusing to set the same aside, defendant Keefe appealed. Pending the appeal, the trial court of its own motion set aside the judgment as against defendant Keefe, and plaintiffs appeal. Keefe's appeal dismissed. Order appealed from by plaintiffs reversed.

T. M. Osmont and Peri E. Allen, for appellants. A. D. Splivalo and Jos. M. Nougues, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to recover from the defendants, as co-partners under the firm name of D. Keefe & Co., the sum of $443.87 as a balance for money advanced by plaintiffs to defendants. Defendant Keefe answered, averring that he was the sole member of the firm of D. Keefe & Co., denied the indebtedness to plaintiffs, and by way of cross complaint, upon the facts therein stated, demanded a judgment against the plaintiffs for $136.35. Pending the case, and before a trial on the merits, such proceedings were had that, on the 4th day of April, 1893, the court below, on motion of counsel for plaintiffs, struck out the answer and cross complaint of defendant Keefe, and entered judgment in favor of plaintiffs as prayed for in their complaint. Defendant Keefe moved the court, on affidavit, and upon the papers on file, to set aside the judgment entered against him, and to restore his answer and cross complaint. This motion was denied by the court June 20, 1893. On June 26, 1893, defendant Keefe took and perfected an appeal to this court from the judgment and order refusing to set the same aside, etc. Thereafter, and on the 30th day of October, 1893, the court, upon its own motion, and without any application therefor or notice thereof, set aside the judgment against defendant and restored his answer and cross complaint. Plaintiffs in due time appealed from this last order, and, as defendant Keefe has never filed his transcript on appeal in this court, plaintiffs also move to dismiss this appeal. The motion to dismiss the appeal of Keefe should be granted.

Touching the appeal of plaintiffs from the order setting aside the judgment and restoring the answer, etc., we are of opinion, from the showing made by the bill of exceptions, (1) that the court was justified in making the order striking out the defendant's answer and rendering judgment against him, upon the ground that he willfully refused to give his deposition in the cause; (2) but these matters are so far within the discretion of the trial court that, inasmuch as it is the policy of the law to favor a fair and impartial trial of every cause upon its merits, we are not at liberty, under the circumstances of this case, to reverse the action of the court looking to that end, provided, always, the court below possessed the power to make the order at the time and in the manner pursued by the court. Addressing, then, our attention to the question of the authority of the court to make the order setting aside the judgment, etc., appealed from, the objections urged thereto are: (1) The judgment set aside had been appealed from, and (as is claimed) the court had lost all jurisdiction in relation thereto. (2) The judgment was entered more than six months prior to the order of October 30, 1893, setting it aside; hence, the court had no authority in the premises. (3) That the court had no authority to act in the premises on its own motion, and without a showing as to the justice thereof.

Touching the first proposition, section 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that, "whenever an appeal is perfected, as provided in the preceding sections of this chapter (chapter 1, tit. 13, pt. 2), it stays all further proceedings in the court below upon the judgment or order appealed from or upon the matters embraced therein, * * * but the court below may proceed upon any other matter embraced in the action and not affected by the order appealed from." In Kirby v. Superior Court, 68 Cal. 604, 10 Pac. 119, it was held that, pending an appeal, the trial court has no jurisdiction to allow an amendment to any pleading. In Bryan v. Berry, 8 Cal. 130, it was held that, where a judgment is rendered and an appeal taken to this court, the court below loses control over the judgment, and an order amending the judgment is erroneous. In Reynolds v. Reynolds, 67 Cal. 176, 7 Pac. 480, it was held that, after a case has been appealed, the trial court has no power to so change the judgment appealed from as in effect to prevent the review of alleged errors brought up by a bill of exceptions. In Savings Union v. Myers, 72 Cal. 161, 13 Pac. 403, it was held that the superior court cannot deprive the supreme court of jurisdiction of an appeal from a judgment by amending it while the appeal is pending. In Stewart v. Taylor, 68 Cal. 5, 8 Pac. 605, it was held that, pending an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial, the lower court has no authority to vacate or set aside the same. Upon the authority of these cases we are of opinion that, when the defendant Keefe perfected his appeal to this court from the judgment against him, and from the order of the superior court made upon his motion to set aside such judgment, the court below so far lost jurisdiction of the cause that it could not, pending such appeal, set aside the judgment on its own motion, and that to do so was error, for which the order setting aside the judgment should be reversed.

These views render an examination of the other points unnecessary. We recommend (1) that the order appealed from by plaintiffs be reversed; (2) that the appeal of defendant D. Keefe be dismissed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from by plaintiffs is reversed, and the appeal of defendant D. Keefe is dismissed.

ROBINSON v. THORNTON. (S. F. 29.)[1]

APPEAL—DECISION—CONSTRUCTION.

Where a judgment is reversed on appeal, and remanded for a new trial, the holding of the appellate court on a question of fact, based on the evidence in the record, is not conclusive as to such question on a subsequent trial on new evidence; hence it is error for the trial court to take it from the jury, and determine it as a matter of law.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Mateo county; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by C. P. Robinson against R. S. Thornton. From a judgment for defendant, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

T. M. Osmont, for appellant. E. F. Fitzpatrick, B. B. Newman, and Fox, Kellogg & Gray, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This case has been here before, and is reported in 102 Cal., commencing at page 675 (34 Pac. 120). In the opinion then delivered, the history of the case is fully stated, and for the purpose of this present decision it is not necessary to restate it. At the retrial, out of which this present appeal arises, the court, when the evidence had all been offered, instructed the jury as follows: "The court instructs you, as a matter of law, to wit, the law in this case as declared by the supreme court of this state in this case, that the title claimed by the plaintiff in this case has been shown to be extinguished; and that, as a matter of law aforesaid, the plaintiff has no title to the lands in dispute in this action, and your verdict must be for the defendant. The court instructs you as a matter of law, to wit, the law of this case, declared so by the supreme court in this case, that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover herein; and you are hereby directed to bring in a verdict in favor of the defendant, Thornton." In accordance with these instructions, the jury returned a verdict for the defendant. These instructions were erroneous, and were given, no doubt, through a misunderstanding of what this court decided on the former appeal. It was there decided that, by the foreclosure sale under the Wilson and Jordan mortgage, the interest of the Greens in the disputed premises became extinguished, and therefore no title to said premises was acquired by the plaintiff, Robinson, under the attachment or execution sale set forth in the record. It was decided further, however, that the Greens, who were in possession at the time of the execution sale, and also Thornton, who was a vendee of the Greens, were estopped to show that the Greens had no title at the time of such execution sale. But it was further decided that Thornton was not estopped to set up an adverse possession and title by prescription, by establishing an adverse possession for the statutory period of limitation; and, further, that the evidence taken at the former trial was sufficient to warrant the finding that Thornton did have such possession for said statutory period; and the judgment was reversed on account of said adverse possession of Thornton. But the question of such adverse possession is one of fact, and upon a subsequent trial the jury were not estopped by the decision of this court from finding the issue of such adverse possession differently from the finding at the former trial. They might have found that issue differently, even though the testimony was the same as at the former trial; but, as a matter of fact, there was at the latter trial additional testimony on that point. It was for the jury, therefore, to determine whether or not there was such adverse possession; and the court erred in taking that question away from the jury. The questions of law arising out of the documentary evidence which established undisputed facts, of course, were determined by the former decision; but that decision is not final as to the question of Thornton's adverse possession for the statutory period, which is purely a question of fact to be determined by a court or jury upon the evidence brought before it upon a subsequent trial. Benson v. Shotwell, 103 Cal. 165, 37 Pac. 147; Mahan v. Wood, 79 Cal. 259, 21 Pac. 757; Wallace v. Sisson (Cal.) 45 Pac. 1000. The verdict of the jury upon this question of adverse possession for the statutory period might have been the same as the finding at the former trial, but we cannot say as a matter of law that such should have been the verdict. For these reasons, the judgment must be reversed, and a new trial ordered. Judgment and order denying a new trial reversed.

AMADOR GOLD MINE, Limited, v. AMADOR GOLD MINE et al. (S. F. 95.)

FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER — VARIANCE — FINDING—JUDGMENT.

1. In an action for forcible entry and detainer, where the complaint alleged that defendants entered on the premises July 14th, and the proof was that they entered June 26th, there was no material variance.

2. A finding that defendants "took possession on June 26, 1893," negatives the allegation that they were in continuous possession from May 1, 1893.

3. Error in the admission and exclusion of evidence under one count is without prejudice where the judgment for plaintiff may stand on another count.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. R. Daingerfield, Judge.

Action by the Amador Gold Mine, Limited, against the Amador Gold Mine, J. H. Tibbits, and Edward Tibbits. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Lindley & Eickhoff, for appellants. Vincent Neale, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The plaintiff, an English corporation, brought this action against the defendants, a California corporation, for a forcible detainer (as defined by section 1160 of the Code of Civil Procedure) of a certain tract of mineral land on which is a quartz lode, a 60-stamp quartz mill, and other improvements, situate in the county of Amador. The complaint consists of two counts, —the first, under the second division of section 1160, alleging an unlawful entry upon said premises on July 14, 1893, in the absence of plaintiff, and a refusal to surrender possession for the period of five days after demand by plaintiff for such surrender; and the second, under the first division of said section, alleging that the defendants, by force and with strong hand and threats of violence, unlawfully hold and keep possession of said land and appurtenances. The answer of defendants to the first count denies that plaintiff was ever entitled to the possession of any part of the premises described in the complaint, and denies that on July 14, 1893, or at any time within five days previous thereto, plaintiff was in peaceable or actual possesssion or occupation of any part of said premises, as alleged in the complaint. In answer to the second count, defendants deny that the corporation defendant has ever unlawfully, or with force or threats of violence, held or kept possession of said premises, or any part thereof, at any time since July 14, 1893, "contrary to the form of the statute." After the close of the evidence, and by leave of the court, defendants amended their answer to each count of the complaint by inserting the following: "That on the first day of May, 1893, said defendant Amador Gold Mine, as was its right, did peaceably and quietly enter upon said pieces and parcels of land, and all thereof, and thence hitherto has continued to be, and now is, in the peaceable and quiet possession of said pieces and parcels of land, and all thereof." The cause, having been tried without a jury, the court found for plaintiff on both counts of the complaint, and rendered judgment for restitution of possession, and for treble damages, amounting to $450. The court denied defendants' motion for a new trial on the condition that plaintiff would remit the damages, and plaintiff performed this condition according to the order of the court. The defendants have appealed from the judgment of restitution, and from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

1. Counsel for appellants contend that the finding of the court that the defendants entered upon and took possession of the premises on the 26th day of June is a fatal variance from the complaint, in which it is alleged that defendants entered on July 14, 1893. But, since such variance could not have misled defendants to their prejudice, it is immaterial. Code Civ. Proc. § 469. The only suggestion of its materiality is that the finding brings the date of defendants' entry within one year next before the commencement of the action, and thus defeats the defense pleaded after the close of the evidence, to the effect that defendants had entered and peaceably held possession more than one year next before the action was commenced. Code Civ. Proc. § 1172. But, surely, the plaintiff, under the allegation that defendants entered July 14, 1893, was entitled to prove that they entered at any time within one year next before the commencement of the action. Within that period no variation from the date alleged in the complaint was material. Norris v. Elliott, 39 Cal. 72; Davis v. Baugh, 59 Cal. 568; Kidder v. Stevens, 60 Cal. 420; Biven v. Bostwick, 70 Cal. 639, 11 Pac. 790. The action was commenced May 7, 1894, and the finding is that defendants entered June 26, 1893. Counsel for appellants are mistaken in saying "the complaint says defendants did not take the premises until July 14, 1893."

2. Appellants contend that there is no sufficient finding on the issue tendered by the aforesaid amendment of the answer, namely, that defendants took possession of the premises on May 1, 1893, and continuously thereafter held such possession. The plaintiff alleged the date of defendants' entry to have been July 14, 1893. Defendants alleged, it to have been May 1, 1893. The court found it to have been June 26, 1893. Conceding that the finding does not necessarily negative defendants' allegation that they entered on May 1, 1893, yet it does negative the continuance of such possession until June 26th; for, unless the defendants had abandoned or lost the alleged possession taken on May 1st, they could not have taken possession on June 26th; and if, as found by the court, they took the possession complained of on June 26th, they must have abandoned or lost any possession taken by them prior to June 26th. Such prior possession, if it existed, was entirely distinct from that initiated on June 26th, and, having been interrupted between May 1st and June 26th, could not have been counted as a part of that quiet possession "for the space of one whole year together next before the commencement of the proceedings," which is required by section 1172 of the Code of Civil Procedure to constitute a defense to the action. It was therefore immaterial whether or not the defendants had taken or held possession for a period of time prior to June 26th distinct from and disconnected with that which the court found to have been initiated on the 26th day of June, 1893; and, since the defendants could not have been injured by the failure of the court to find upon that issue, the judgment should not be reversed for such failure. Robarts v. Haley, 65 Cal. 397, 4 Pac. 385; Johnson v. Vance, 86 Cal. 128, 24 Pac. 863; Miller v. Hicken, 92 Cal. 229, 28 Pac. 339.

3. The finding that defendants entered on June 26, 1893, and thence forcibly withheld the possession until the commencement of the proceeding, is justified by a great preponderance of the evidence. Nor is there any evidence substantially tending to support the contention of appellants that plaintiff abandoned the premises in question, or was not in actual possession up to and at the time defendants entered, and within five days before, though plaintiff's agents were absent from the premises at the time defendants entered.

4. In the bill of exceptions are specified 35 alleged errors in law occurring at the trial, as to which counsel for appellants say: "Under this head, appellants respectfully direct the attention of this court to the various rulings made during the trial to which defendants duly excepted, because these show quite clearly how the mind of the trial court was moved during the proceedings before it. Some of the rulings, standing alone, would perhaps be of little consequence one way or another; but the development of the court's view of the case in the direction indicated by its line of rulings we believe to have been wrong and to the prejudice of defendants." Although having read the record carefully, I have discovered no valid or even plausible ground upon which any of these specified errors can be maintained, except that perhaps it may be questionable whether the court ruled correctly in admitting and excluding evidence as to the force, menaces, and threats of violence necessary to constitute the cause of action alleged in the second count; but errors in such rulings could not have affected the finding of the forcible detainer necessary to support a judgment for plaintiff on the first count, upon which alone the judgment may stand. I think the order and judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BRITT, C.

McCULLY v. COOPER. (L. A. 144.)

ANCILLARY ADMINISTRATORS—RIGHT TO COLLECT LOCAL DEBTS.

Where the domiciliary administration of a decedent is in another state, but an ancillary administratrix has been duly appointed in California, the latter may recover from the general administrator possession of a certificate of deposit in a California bank, belonging to the estate, of which payment has been refused, on which the general administrator cannot maintain suit in California, it being a paramount object of an ancillary administration to collect local debts due the estate.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. Pierce, Judge.

Action by Jane Mason McCully, administratrix of the estate of James L. Mason, deceased, against George H. Cooper. From a judgment for defendant, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Trippet & Neale, for appellant. J. W. Hughes, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to recover possession from George H. Cooper, the defendant, of a certificate of deposit, issued by the Consolidated National Bank of San Diego, located in San Diego, Cal., for $8,000, dated April 2, 1892, payable to the order of James L. Mason, and upon which certificate there is indorsed a credit of $2,200. Defendant had judgment, from which judgment, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

James L. Mason, the holder and owner of the certificate of deposit, was a resident of the county of Hancock, in the state of Indiana, at which place he died on the 2d day of January, 1894, leaving a large amount of property, real and personal, situate and being in said county and state. On the 20th day of January, 1894, George H. Cooper was, by an order of the circuit court in and for said county of Hancock, state of Indiana, duly appointed administrator of the estate of said James L. Mason, deceased, duly qualified as such administrator, and letters of administration were duly issued to him, and he is still such administrator. At the time of his death the said James L. Mason was the owner of, and in possession of, said certificate of deposit, in said county and state; and the same came into the possession of said Cooper, as his administrator, on the 20th day of January, 1894. In June, 1893, the Consolidated National Bank of San Diego became insolvent, closed its doors, and refused to pay its depositors; and thereafter, in said year 1893, Andrew J. O'Connor was duly appointed and qualified as receiver of said bank, and is still acting as such receiver. On the 24th day of January, 1894, defendant, Cooper, as such administrator, sent by mail the said certificate of deposit to said Andrew J. O'Connor, receiver, at San Diego, Cal., for the purpose of proving up his claim as said administrator of said Mason, deceased, against said insolvent bank; and thereupon the receiver of the bank declined either to permit Cooper to prove up the claim, or to return the certificate of deposit to him upon demand. On the 9th day of March, 1895, the said receiver, upon a second demand, returned the certificate of deposit to Cooper, as administrator, at the county of San Diego, Cal., where it was retained when this action was brought, and for 20 days thereafter, and then was returned to the state of Indiana, where it has since been held by said Cooper, as administrator of said Mason, deceased. Under the laws of the state of Indiana, administrators appointed therein may, by order of the circuit court of said state, sell and dispose of all certificates of deposit in the state of Indiana, lawfully in their possession as such administrators. The status of Jane Mason McCully, the plaintiff herein, may be thus stated: On the 20th day of March, 1894, said plaintiff was duly appointed, by order of the superior court in and for the county of San Diego, state of California, the administratrix of the estate of said James L. Mason, and thereupon duly qualified as such administratrix, and letters of administration were duly issued to her; and she ever since has been, and still is, the administratrix of the estate of said Mason. The estate of said James L. Mason had not, so far as appears in this action, any property or assets in the county of San Diego, or state of California, save and except the demand hereinbefore mentioned against the Consolidated National Bank of San Diego, evidenced by the certificate of deposit hereinbefore mentioned. Before this action was brought, plaintiff demanded possession of said certificate of deposit from defendant Cooper, but defendant refused, and still does refuse, to deliver the same to her. Plaintiff sought judgment for possession of the certificate, if such possession could be had, and, if not, for $5,800, the value thereof, and for damages and costs.

The question involved is this: Can the California administratrix recover from the domiciliary administrator, appointed in the state of Indiana, who is temporarily in this jurisdiction, with the evidence of a simple contract debt, which contract debt is due and owing here, the certificate of deposit which is the evidence of such debt? There are a number of propositions bearing more or less upon the question, which are either universally conceded, or established by such a preponderance of authority as not to call for comment. Among these are:

1. Save as otherwise provided by statute, the proper jurisdiction in which to obtain letters testamentary or of administration is in the state and place of the decedent's domicile at the time of his death. Williams, Ex'rs (6th Am. Ed.) 495 et seq.; Wilkins v. Ellett, 108 U. S. 256, 2 Sup. Ct. 641; Crosby v. Leavitt, 4 Allen, 410.

2. The authority of an executor or administrator does not extend beyond the jurisdiction of the state or government under which he is invested with his authority. Code Civ. Proc. § 1913; Story, Confl. Laws, § 512, and cases there cited.

3. Where there are no debts owing by the estate in the jurisdiction where the foreign debtor resides, and no ancillary administration has been granted there, the principal administrator may, in such foreign state, receive a voluntary payment from the debtor, which will be a good acquittance to him, even if an ancillary administrator should be subsequently appointed. Klein v. French, 57 Miss. 662; Wilkins v. Ellett, supra; Schluter v. Bank, 117 N. Y. 125, 22 N. E. 572; Reynolds v. McMullen, 55 Mich. 568, 22 N. W. 41; Appeal of Gray, 116 Pa. St. 256, 11 Atl. 66, 70.

4. So an administrator who has, within the jurisdiction of his appointment, obtained a judgment against a debtor of a foreign state, or has reduced the personal property of the estate to possession, so as to acquire the legal title thereto, and it is wrongfully taken from him and carried to a foreign state, he may in such foreign state maintain an action, not officially, but in his individual capacity, upon such judgment, or to recover such personal property so wrongfully taken from him. Talmage v. Chapel, 16 Mass. 71; Biddle v. Wilkins, 1 Pet. 686; Greasons v. Davis, 9 Iowa, 219; Lewis v. Adams, 70 Cal. 403, 11 Pac. 833; Fox v. Tay, 89 Cal. 339, 24 Pac. 855, and 26 Pac. 897; Low v. Burrows, 12 Cal. 188; Story, Confl. Laws, § 516.

5. If there be assets in another state or states than that in which the principal letters are granted, an administration may be obtained there, and such administration will be regarded as ancillary to the administration of the domicile; and, as a general rule, the excess of the assets resulting from such ancillary administration, after the payment of local debts, expenses of administering, and local legacies, if any, in the jurisdiction of the ancillary administration, will be transmitted to the administrator of the domicile, to be there distributed according to the law of the vicinage. In re Apple's Estate, 66 Cal. 432, 6 Pac. 7.

6. A certificate of deposit is a negotiable security, and to that extent is upon the same footing with promissory notes. Welton v. Adams, 4 Cal. 37; Brummagim v. Tallant, 29 Cal. 503; Mills v. Barney, 22 Cal. 240; Poorman v. Mills, 35 Cal. 118.

7. An executor or administrator duly qualified to act as such may assign negotiable securities due and owing to his decedent at the time of his death, which have come to him by virtue of his office; and his assignee may sue the maker thereof in another state without the necessity of letters testamentary or of administration being had in such latter state, if by the law of the forum actions are maintainable by the assignees of negotiable securities. Harper v. Butler, 2 Pet. 239; Sanford v. McCreedy, 28 Wis. 102; Robinson v. Crandall, 9 Wend. 425; Patchen v. Wilson, 4 Hill (N. Y.) 57. There are some authorities in opposition to the proposition last enunciated, but it is thought that the cases cited, and others to like effect, are, upon principle, correct.

8. For the purpose of founding administration, a simple-contract debt is assets where the debtor resides, even if a bill of exchange or promissory note has been given for it, and without regard to the place where the bill or note is found payable. Wyman v. Halstead, 109 U. S. 654, 3 Sup. Ct. 417.

Under this state of the law, and upon the facts of the case as demonstrated in the bill of exceptions and findings, what was the duty of the defendant when plaintiff was appointed administratrix in California? He had not indorsed or assigned the certificate. The receiver had refused to allow it as a valid claim against the bank. Defendant could not maintain an action to establish it as a claim in this state. The very object of the ancillary administration in this state is to collect assets of the estate here, and it is the bounden duty of plaintiff to so collect them. A paramount object of the local or ancillary administration is to collect the assets locally situated, and to pay therefrom the demand of local creditors, if any there be. Whether there are any such creditors can only be determined by giving the notice to creditors required by our law. It would seem that, upon principle, it became the duty of defendant, when plaintiff was appointed and qualified, to surrender to the latter the evidence of the debt in question, which is upon simple contract, the payment of which can only be enforced here. We concur in the views of the supreme court of the state of Mississippi, as expressed in Klein v. French, 57 Miss., at pages 670, 671, where, after discussing cognate questions, and enunciating the general principles applicable, it is said of the domiciliary administrator: "He has the title and the possession. He has the right to receive voluntary payment. He has the right to apply for and receive the appointment of ancillary administration, or to secure it to his nominee. He cannot, therefore, hold the evidence of debt, and do nothing, for this would be most unjust to the distributees, and would result in a loss of the debt to them," etc.; and after pointing out his duty to secure his own appointment, if practicable, and, if not, it is said, "He should then take proper steps to have another appointed, and turn over to him the collection of the debt." We conclude that when, after her appointment, plaintiff demanded from defendant possession of the certificate of deposit, it was the duty of the latter to have delivered the same to her, and that upon his refusal so to do, as against plaintiff, he was the wrongful holder thereof. It follows that the findings of the court that plaintiff at the time of the filing of the complaint was not, never has been, and is not now the owner of, or entitled to the possession of, the certificate of deposit, and that defendant was and is the owner of, and lawfully entitled to the possession of, said certificate of deposit, are not supported by the evidence. We recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

EBERHARDT v. COYNE. (Sac. 44.)

ADVERSE POSSESSION—PAYMENT OF TAXES—SUFFICIENCY OF FINDINGS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 325, making the payment of taxes by an adverse holder an essential element to establish title by adverse possession, where a complaint alleged title by adverse possession to a strip of ground in dispute between the owners of adjoining lots, a judgment for plaintiff is not supported by a finding that plaintiff paid taxes on her lot, in the absence of a finding that the strip in dispute was a part of such lot. McFarland, J., dissenting.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; A. P. Catlin, Judge.

Action by Delia Eberhardt against M. J. Coyne. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Frank D. Ryan and James B. Devine, for appellant. Armstrong & Bruner and R. Platnauer, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Ejectment for a piece of land about 80 feet long and 4 feet wide in a certain block in the city of Sacramento. It is admitted that plaintiff has the paper title to the "west 32 feet" of lot 2 in said block, and that she has paid the taxes thereon since the year 1871; also, that defendant has like title to the south half of lot 1 in the same block, and that he and his predecessors in interest have paid the taxes thereon since that year. The west line of plaintiff's land and the east line of defendant's are coincident for the length of the parcel in dispute, which lies along such common boundary. In her complaint, filed December 23, 1892, plaintiff alleged herself to be the owner of the demanded premises, describing the same by reference to monuments, courses, and distances; that she and those under whom she claims have been in the adverse possession thereof, claiming title, for more than 20 years, and until she was ousted by defendant in December, 1892; that by reason of such possession "the plaintiff became and is the owner of said premises by prescription." These allegations, excepting that of ouster, were denied by defendant. At the trial defendant produced evidence tending to show that the land sued for is within the boundaries of the south half of said lot 1. The court found that plaintiff was, at the time of the commencement of the action, "and for many years prior thereto," the owner of the premises described as "commencing at the north end of a fence constructed by the defendant on lot 2," etc., the line of such fence being the east boundary of the parcel described, and no further reference being made to the lines of either lot 1 or lot 2; also, that plaintiff was in the adverse possession of such premises for 10 years next before the entry of defendant in December, 1892.

The complaint proceeds and the trial was had, apparently, on the theory that plaintiff's right to the land depends upon adverse possession thereof for the prescriptive period of five years. Since the amendment to section 325, Code Civ. Proc., which took effect May 31, 1878, the payment of the taxes by the adverse holder, if any are assessed against the land, is a necessary element in the establishment of title by means of adverse possession. The finding here has no relation to the time before May 31, 1878, when payment of taxes was not required in order to make out such possession, for it is limited to the space of 10 years next before defendant's entry; and as to such period of 10 years it is not sustained by the evidence, for the admission at the trial was that the taxes paid by plaintiff have been those assessed upon the "west 32 feet of said lot 2." This was not effectual to complete the prescriptive right to land not included within that designation. McDonald v. Drew, 97 Cal. 266, 32 Pac. 173; Baldwin v. Temple, 101 Cal. 396, 35 Pac. 1008. Respondent contends here that the land in suit is really parcel of the said west portion of lot 2, to which she admittedly has paper title. Allowing that she may thus assert an origin of her title different from that set forth in the complaint (as to which question see Eagan v. Delaney, 16 Cal. 85), then, if the assertion is sustained by the record, of course the matter of adverse possession is of no moment in the case; but it was not so alleged in the complaint, or proved at the trial, or found by the court. The respondent's argument in this particular rests on the reference in the finding to the "fence constructed by the defendant on lot 2," but plainly the land described, lying west of the fence, may be wholly within lot 1. The judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial should be reversed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order denying defendant's motion for new trial are reversed.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent. The action is ejectment to recover a small strip of land, about 4 feet wide, lying along the line between lots 1 and 2 in a certain block in the city of Sacramento. The court found that at the commencement of the action plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the disputed premises, and had been in the actual, exclusive, and adverse possession thereof for 10 years (and it might justly have been 20 years) next before December, 1892, at which last-mentioned time defendant took possession thereof, and rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff for the possession of said premises. I see no reason for disturbing the judgment. The record shows that the regular paper title to the west 32 feet of lot 2 was conveyed to plaintiff in 1872; and the evidence is amply sufficient to show that, within a year or two thereafter, she inclosed by a fence the land thus conveyed to her; that the fence included the strip now here in contest; that since 1872 she continuously had a barn on her land which extended entirely over said strip; and that for a period much longer than 10 years next preceding December, 1892, she was thus in the actual, exclusive, and adverse possession of said strip of land, openly and notoriously claiming it as her own. Defendant owns a part of lot 1 lying to the west of plaintiff's land. In 1892 a storm blew down a part of plaintiff's fence between her land and that of defendant, whereupon defendant pulled down the rest of said fence, and built a new fence about 4 or 4½ feet to the east of the old one, thus taking possession of the strip in contest. This new fence takes in the west part of plaintiff's barn, some of the boards of which defendant took off. (From the diagram in evidence it seems that the new line also runs through plaintiff's house.) The facts leave to the defendant only the defense that plaintiff has not complied with the provisions of section 325, Code Civ. Proc., relating to the payment of taxes. Payment of taxes has no natural relation whatever to the matter of actual adverse possession of land, and therefore the provision of said section should not be applied as a mere technical defense founded on an alleged slight defect in the description of land. In the present case this defense is highly technical, for it is based upon the strict letter, and not upon the spirit and intent, of the law. There is no pretense that plaintiff tried to evade the payment of her taxes, or that she did not believe that she had paid all the taxes upon her land as inclosed and claimed by her. She did actually pay all the taxes on her lot from 1872 to the present time; but the assessments for taxes on it were made in the form of the "west 32 feet of lot 2"; and it is contended that therefore she did not pay taxes upon the small strip within her inclosure which is now in contest. But, if we should concede that if the strip were actually not a part of lot 2, this would be such a want of compliance with section 325 as to be fatal, still the whole theory of the appellant on this point is based upon the assumption that the strip in contest is not a part of lot 2, but is a part of lot 1. That assumption, however, is entirely unwarranted. On the contrary, it is alleged in the complaint that the new fence built by defendant was "on the land of the plaintiff claimed by her to be a part of lot 2," and in the finding of the court the said fence is described as "constructed by defendant in December, 1892, on lot 2." It may be said that this finding is rather in the form of recital, and not direct; but there is no exception to it. Moreover, there is no averment in the answer that the strip is on lot 1, or that it is not on lot 2; and there is no exception to the findings on the ground that they do not fully enough find that the strip is a part of lot 2. It is expressly admitted by stipulation that plaintiff paid taxes as hereinbefore stated, and there was no need of a finding on that subject. These views make it unnecessary to discuss other points made by respondent in support of the judgment. In my opinion the judgment should be affirmed.

Indeed, as appears from appellant's witness, the surveyor, it is impracticable to determine with any accuracy where the true line between the two lots is, if it can be said that there is any such true line; and, in the case at bar, I cannot see any stronger evidence of the correct location of that line than is afforded by the fact that a fence on what respondent claimed to be the true line has stood for a period several times longer than the statutory period of limitation, without any objection by the coterminous owners. And, for the purpose of the payment of taxes, this fence, in my opinion, establishes the western line of lot 2.

Ex parte STEPHEN. (Cr. 160.)

JUDGMENT — CONCLUSIVENESS — HABEAS CORPUS — INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

1. Where, in a criminal action in the superior court, which is a court of general jurisdiction, a question of fact upon which the court's jurisdiction depended was litigated, and decided in favor of the prosecution, the question is judicially decided as between the parties, and the decision cannot be attacked in habeas corpus proceedings brought by defendant in another court.

2. In an ordinance by a county board fixing saloon licenses, a discrimination between those doing business in incorporated cities and those without their limits is not unlawful.

3. A provision of a county ordinance, which undertakes to prescribe the punishment of a person conducting a saloon without a license, and which is void as being in contravention of Pen. Code, §§ 19, 435, which fix such punishment, does not invalidate the other provisions of the ordinance; hence, on a conviction thereunder, the punishment fixed by the statute may be imposed.

In bank. Petition by Leo Stephen for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied.

McKelvey & Bowes, for petitioner. J. W. Ballard, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. Petitioner, convicted in the superior court of the county of Orange of a misdemeanor in carrying on a saloon and selling liquor without procuring a license therefor, as required by Ordinance No. 35 of the board of supervisors of said county, asks to be discharged on habeas corpus, on the ground, principally, that the ordinance is void for various alleged reasons. Several of the grounds of invalidity assigned may be passed over without further notice than to say that they relate to special features of the ordinance not here involved, and upon the sufficiency of which the validity of the particular provision under which petitioner was prosecuted and convicted in no way depends. One or more features of an ordinance may be void, and yet those parts not subject to the vice, and which are not dependent upon the provisions which are, will stand unaffected. Ex parte Mansfield, 106 Cal. 405, 39 Pac. 775; Ex parte Haskell (Cal.) 44 Pac. 725. We shall therefore confine ourselves to a consideration of those objections only which affect either the ordinance as a whole or section 1 thereof,—for a violation of which petitioner is held,—and certain objections made to the sufficiency of the judgment.

1. The first and main objection urged is that the ordinance was not passed at a regular meeting of the board of supervisors, as required by law, and is therefore wholly void. This claim is based upon the alleged fact that the board has never established by ordinance a time for its regular meetings; and it is argued that, no such time having been fixed, there could be, in legal contemplation, no such thing as a regular meeting of the board. But, assuming that such omission on the part of the board, if shown, would render void the ordinance here involved, the inquiry is one which does not competently arise. The question whether Ordinance No. 35 was regularly passed is dependent upon certain facts as to the existence of which it was within the province of the superior court, at the trial of petitioner, to inquire. One of those facts was whether the ordinance was passed at a regular meeting, and this fact involved the further one as to whether the time for such meeting had been competently established. The jurisdiction of the court to punish petitioner for the alleged infraction of the ordinance depended upon the existence of these facts, and, this being so, the judgment of conviction must be taken, upon this collateral view, as conclusively establishing such facts. We are bound to presume, in support of that judgment, that the fact about which question is really made—whether Ordinance No. 1, found in the records of the board of supervisors, fixing the time of regular meetings, was published, so as to take effect—was established to the satisfaction of the court by competent evidence. Unlike a court of limited jurisdiction, every intendment is to be indulged in favor of the regularity of the proceedings and judgment of the superior court, acting within its jurisdiction, and this whether the jurisdiction exercised be original, or, as in this instance, appellate. "After its appellate jurisdiction has once been acquired, its action within the limits of that jurisdiction, unless in direct contravention of some positive statute, is entitled to all the presumptions of regularity that attach to the exercise of its original jurisdiction." Sherer v. Superior Court, 94 Cal. 354, 29 Pac. 716. The judgment of the superior court is, as was said of the judgment in Ex parte Sternes, 77 Cal. 156, 162, 19 Pac. 275, 276, in considering a similar objection, "the record of the court, acting within its legitimate powers, and that record must be considered as speaking the truth, and as conclusive, until it has been in some way set aside or vacated. No evidence can be received to contradict it. Freem. Judg'n. §§ 619, 126; Lewis v. Dutton, 8 How. Prac. 103; Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 407. 'When jurisdiction depends on a fact that is litigated in a suit, and is adjudged in favor of that party who avers jurisdiction, then the question of jurisdiction is judicially decided, and the judgment record is conclusive evidence of jurisdiction until set aside or reversed by a direct proceeding.' Bloom v. Burdick, 1 Hill, 138." And see Ex parte Cottrell, 59 Cal. 421. Habeas corpus is a collateral, and not a direct, proceeding, when regarded as a means of attack upon the judgment, and so long as the judgment is regular upon its face, and was given in an action or proceeding of which the superior court had jurisdiction, no extrinsic evidence is admissible here to show its invalidity.

2. It is contended that the ordinance discriminates unlawfully between those engaged in the liquor business in Orange county, in that it imposes a much heavier license tax upon those conducting such business outside of incorporated cities and towns than upon those within such municipalities, and is for this reason void. But, while this discrimination exists, it is not unlawful. It is no doubt based upon the fact that those carrying on the business within incorporated cities and towns are compelled to pay a municipal license tax, while those without are not, or for other good reason affecting the business. Such discrimination the board has a right to make. Amador Co. v. Kennedy, 70 Cal. 458, 11 Pac. 757; Ex parte Haskell (Cal.) 44 Pac. 725. Nor can the ordinance be said to be unreasonable or oppressive. Ex parte Haskell, supra.

3. Section 1 of the ordinance provides that any person opening, keeping, or carrying on, etc., such liquor business, without first procuring a license, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and makes such misdemeanor punishable by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $200, or by imprisonment for not less than 100 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and also provides that any judgment that defendant pay a fine shall direct that, in default of payment, he shall be imprisoned in the county jail until the fine is satisfied, not to exceed 1 day's imprisonment for every $2 of the fine. The judgment in this instance imposed a fine upon petitioner of $250, or, in default of payment, confinement in the county jail at the rate of 1 day for every $2 of the fine. Petitioner contends that this punishment, being greater than that prescribed by the ordinance, was in excess of the power of the court, and renders the judgment void ab initio. The punishment is undoubtedly in excess of the maximum prescribed by the ordinance, and the only question is, therefore, what effect has this upon the judgment? It is unnecessary to determine what its effect would be if the penal clause of section 1 were valid,—whether it would render the judgment void in toto, or only to the extent to which the maximum limit is exceeded,—for that portion of section 1 prescribing the punishment must be held void as in contravention of the general law of the state. It undertakes to punish the same act—carrying on a business without having a license therefor—which is punishable under section 435 of the Penal Code. That section provides: "Every person who commences or carries on any business, trade, profession or calling, for the transaction or carrying on of which a license is required by any law of this state, without taking out or procuring the license prescribed by such law, is guilty of a misdemeanor." The last section does not itself fix the punishment for such misdemeanor, but section 19 of the same Code declares: "Except in cases where a different punishment is prescribed by this Code, every offense declared to be a misdemeanor is punishable by imprisonment in a county jail, not exceeding six months, or by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or by both." In Ex parte Sic, 73 Cal. 142, 14 Pac. 405, it is held that a provision in an ordinance undertaking to punish precisely the same acts which are punishable under the general law of the state is to be deemed in conflict with such general law, and for that reason void. And this principle was affirmed in the recent case of Ex parte Mansfield, 106 Cal. 400, 405, 39 Pac. 775. But the invalidity of the penal clause of section 1 of the ordinance did not affect the other portions of that section, being wholly severable therefrom; and defendant, having been convicted of the misdemeanor therein provided against, was punishable therefor under the general statute. Ex parte Mansfield, supra. The judgment is not in excess of the punishment prescribed by the latter, and is consequently valid. Of course, what is here said has no reference to the other penal clauses to be found in the ordinance, as they are not involved.

4. There is nothing in the objection that the judgment does not show of what offense petitioner was convicted. The recital in the judgment is: "That whereas, the said Leo Stephen having been duly convicted in this court of the crime of establishing and carrying on a saloon, and there selling and giving away malt liquor without a license," etc. This is quite sufficient to designate the general nature of the offense. Ex parte Murray, 43 Cal. 455; Ex parte Turner, 75 Cal. 226, 16 Pac. 898; Church, Hab. Corp. § 365. We discover nothing in the objections entitling petitioner to his discharge, and the writ is accordingly dismissed, and the petitioner remanded.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; McFARLAND, J.; HARRISON, J.; HENSHAW, J.; TEMPLE, J.

KAHN v. SUTRO et al. (S. F. 534.)

COUNTY GOVERNMENT ACT—APPLICATION TO CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

1. Under the consolidation act (St. 1856, p. 145), which provided that the corporation known as the "City of San Francisco" "shall remain and continue to be a body politic and corporate in name and in fact, by the name of the City and County of San Francisco," such corporation, in matters of government, must be regarded as a city.

2. The territory within which a municipal government is exercised is still a part of the state, and, for all purposes other than municipal government, is subject to the state's control, with the right on the part of the state to authorize the election therein of such officers as may be required to execute its general laws, or to perform such functions, disconnected with the municipal government, as may pertain to the government of the state; hence, as to such officers, the city and county of San Francisco is within the provisions of the county government act of 1893, declaring what county officers shall be elected, prescribing their duties, and fixing their tenure of office at four years. Beatty, C. J., and Temple J., dissenting.

3. Officers whose election is authorized in the corporation of the city and county of San Francisco by the county government act of 1893, and who are the same in name, and are given the same or similar functions, as are officers authorized by the consolidation act (St. 1856, p. 145) to be elected in San Francisco, do not cease to be municipal officers, since the legislature cannot abridge the constitutional right given by its charter to said corporation to change its officers every two years if it shall so elect.

4. The city and county of San Francisco being under a municipal government, there is no authority for its division into townships; hence the provisions in the county government act of 1893, fixing the term of office of justices of the peace for the townships into which the several counties are divided at four years, do not apply to the justices of the peace elected for the city and county of San Francisco.

5. Act March 18, 1885, creating a police court for the city and county of San Francisco, confers upon that court certain jurisdiction, which is elsewhere exercised by justices' courts; hence its judges' terms of office were not changed by the county government act of 1893, since that act does not apply to justices of the peace in San Francisco.

In bank. Appeal from the superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Julius Kahn against Adolph Sutro and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. L. Barnes, W. W. Foote, T. C. Coogan, and Rodgers & Paterson, for appellant. F. Adams, for county clerk. Garrett W. McEnerney, for other respondents. Reddy, Campbell & Metson, amici curiæ.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff brought this action to restrain the board of election commissioners of San Francisco from calling an election for city and county officers at the coming general election, and from incurring the expenses attendant thereon; claiming that under the provisions of the county government act of 1893, as construed in the case of Hale v. McGettigan (recently decided) 45 Pac. 1049, there can be no election for such officers until the general election in 1898. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants upon a demurrer to the complaint, and the plaintiff has appealed therefrom.

The question presented for determination is whether the above act of 1893 applies to the city and county of San Francisco, and the determination of this question depends upon the character of that body corporate in its relation to the other portions of the state,—whether it is to be regarded as a city or as a county. One feature by which a city is distinguished from a county, in this state, is the source from which its authority is derived. The powers to be exercised under a county government are conferred by the legislature, irrespective of the will of the inhabitants of the county, whereas the inhabitants of a city are authorized to determine whether they will accept the corporate powers offered them, to be exercised by officers of their own selection. In Hamilton Co. v. Mighels, 7 Ohio St. 109, the distinction between these two bodies was given in these words: "Municipal corporations proper are called into existence through the direct solicitation, or by the free consent, of the people who compose them. Counties are legal subdivisions of a state, created by the sovereign power of a state, of its own sovereign will, without the particular solicitation, consent, or concurrent action of the people who inhabit them. The former organization is asked for, or at least assented to, by the people it embraces. The latter is superimposed by a sovereign and paramount authority." While the corporate name of this body politic is "The City and County of San Francisco," it is recognized by the constitution as having the attributes of both a city and a county, and also as having attributes distinguishing it from either. Geographically, it is one of the legal subdivisions of the state, and in that respect is recognized in section 1 of article 11 of the constitution, as one of the counties of the state. Politically, it is regarded in that instrument as a municipal corporation. It was held in People v. McFadden, 81 Cal. 489, 22 Pac. 851, that a county is not a corporation for municipal purposes, within the meaning of section 7 of article 11 of the constitution. The provision in this section that "city and county governments may be merged and consolidated into one municipal government, with one set of officers, and may be incorporated under general laws providing for the incorporation and organization of corporations for municipal purposes," implies that such political body is a municipal corporatin, and that its government is a municipal, and not a county, government. At its first session after the adoption of the constitution, the legislature passed an act known as the "McClure Charter," purporting to provide for the government of San Francisco, and to be carried into effect irrespective of any action by the inhabitants of the city. St. 1880, p. 137. In Desmond v. Dunn, 55 Cal. 242, it was held that under the constitution the act could not have any effect, except with the consent of a majority of the electors of San Francisco. If it had been considered that the government for San Francisco was a county government, this argument would have been inapplicable, and the court would have regarded the provisions of section 4 of article 11 as sufficient to sustain the validity of the act, but the act was held invalid on the ground that the charter of the city then existing should remain in force until superseded or changed in the mode prescribed by the constitution. The charter of San Francisco is made up of the consolidation act and the various amendments thereto, together with such other statutes relating to the government of the city and county, or conferring powers upon its officers, as were in force at the adoption of the present constitution. It was urged by counsel in the case last cited that the "cities" mentioned in section 6 were corporations other than consolidated cities and counties, and, therefore, that the clause was not applicable to San Francisco; but it was held that the clause in section 7, "the provisions of this constitution applicable to cities, and also those applicable to counties, so far as not inconsistent or not prohibited to cities, shall be applicable to such consolidated government," meant that such consolidated governments are to be regarded as cities, and that "all the provisions of the constitution which are applicable to cities are likewise applicable to consolidated governments."

The city of San Francisco was created, and its limits defined, by the act of April 15, 1850 (St. 1850, p. 223); and section 2 of that act declared that "the inhabitants of the city of San Francisco, within the limits above described, shall be, and they are hereby constituted, a body politic and corporate in fact and in law, by the name and style of the 'City of San Francisco.'" Section 1 of the act of April 19, 1856 (St. 1856, p. 145), commonly known as the "Consolidation Act," by virtue of which the present corporate character of San Francisco exists, declares, "The corporation or body politic and corporate now existing and known as the City of San Francisco shall remain and continue to be a body politic and corporate in name and in fact, by the name of the City and County of San Francisco," etc. The effect of this legislative action was merely to continue, with extended boundaries and additional powers, the city of San Francisco, which had been incorporated in 1850; and, although the provisions of the charter were in many respects appropriate for a county, the corporation thus created remained a city, under a different name, but the inhabitants of the territory thus brought under the provisions of the city charter were not invested with county government. People v. Supervisors, 21 Cal. 668; Wood v. Election Com'rs, 58 Cal. 561. Section 8 of article 11, of the constitution, as originally adopted, provided that any "city" containing a population of more than 100,000 inhabitants might cause a freeholders' charter to be framed for its own government. Under this provision of the constitution the inhabitants of San Francisco elected a board of freeholders in 1880; and the validity of this election, and the power of the board to frame a charter, were upheld in People v. Hoge, 55 Cal. 612, upon the ground that, under this section of the constitution, San Francisco was a city. In Staude v. Election Com'rs, 61 Cal. 313, it was held that the provisions of section 4109 of the Political Code, as amended in 1881, by which the time for the election of city and county, as well as other officers throughout the state, was changed, were applicable to San Francisco, by virtue of the clause in section 6 of article 11, that "cities or towns heretofore organized shall be subject to and controlled by general laws." It may therefore be regarded as settled by the decisions of this court that the city and county of San Francisco is a municipal corporation, and, in matters of government, is to be regarded as a city. But, while the people of San Francisco are thus to be regarded as under a municipal government, with the right to select officers to execute the powers of that government according to the terms of its charter, the territory over which that government is exercised is at the same time a county; and for those purposes for which county officers exercise authority not derived from the charter, and disconnected with municipal government, its officers are properly termed "county officers." Considered in its political and judicial relations to other portions of the state, the officers elected by its voters, to the extent that they exercise only such powers as are given by laws relating merely to counties, and who do not derive any of their authority from the charter, are to be regarded as county officers, as distinguished from city officers.

It is not possible to make a harmonious construction of the terms "county," "city," and "city and county," as they are used in the constitution. The term "county" is sometimes used therein as a geographical subdivision of the state; sometimes as a political division for the exercise of governmental functions, and in the latter use it is sometimes employed as the equivalent of "city and county," and sometimes as distinguished therefrom; and the term "city and county" is sometimes used as the equivalent of "city." San Francisco is distinctly recognized therein as the geographical equivalent of a county, as in the provision for the election of judges of the superior court, and for the formation of a district for the election of a railroad commissioner; and to hold that it is not a county for any purpose would render inoperative many provisions of the constitution, and of the statutes of the state which have heretofore been recognized as applicable to it, with the result that unsuspected difficulties and perplexities would arise in the administration of justice. Without enumerating many instances, it is sufficient to call attention to the fact that there would be in that city no provision for a grand jury, or for a board of equalization, or for the exercise of any appellate jurisdiction by the superior court, or for the exercise of eminent domain, or for creating the lien of a judgment upon real estate, or for the probate of wills, or for filing articles of incorporation; and the practitioner will readily perceive the confusion that would result in criminal jurisprudence, as well as in civil practice, if the city and county of San Francisco is to be excluded wherever the term "county" is used.

The constitution of Missouri provided for the extension of the limits of the city of St. Louis, and its incorporation into a separate and distinct body politic, under a charter to be framed by a board of freeholders, and that it should be independent of the county of St. Louis. After its organization under a charter thus framed, the governor appointed a sheriff for it, upon the ground that by its organization it became a new county, or political subdivision of the state. The right of this appointee to exercise the office was presented in State v. Finn, 4 Mo. App. 347, and in discussing the character of the new body politic the court said: "The question in this case is not whether the city of St. Louis, as now organized under the scheme and charter, is a county, in the sense in which that word is used in the constitution to describe the normal county of the state. It is not such a county. It has not, nor was it intended to have, a county court, and it has a chief executive and two houses of legislation. In spite of these and other features which distinguish it from the normal county, it may be a county so far as to keep up a relation as such to the rest of the state. It may be a part of the general county system, and it is so unless the framers of the constitution intended to segregate it, and to dissever in the case of St. Louis that county relation which every other portion of the state bears to the state. Because the organization of this body as a city is pronounced, and its features strongly marked, and because they thus reduce its attributes as a county into comparative insignificance, it does not follow that the latter do not exist; and it cannot be denied that it is a county, in the sense in which that term is used, when, if not a definition, at least the nearest approach to a definition which the constitution affords, is attempted, —'a legal subdivision of the state.' Unless the words are plain, it cannot be held that the convention intended to create a political body which should be outside of that county system which prevails, not only in this state, but throughout the country. The researches of the counsel for the relator have not enabled them to find any instance in the United States of a municipal corporation which is not either within some county, or which does not itself bear a county relation to the state. Much of the reasoning of the relator implies that the city of St. Louis cannot be a county because it is a city, but it will readily be admitted that the framers of the constitution could have made it a city, and also have made it a county. That they have not done so must be shown by the provisions of the constitution, not by arguing that it cannot be a county because it is a city. The fact that a county essentially differs from a city does not prove that a city may not contain the features of a county organization. Cities and counties may be distinct organizations in the state generally, but the constitution may by special provisions establish a body which shall have the peculiar powers and obligations of a municipal corporation, properly so called, and yet shall bear those relations to the sovereign power which constitute a county."

Prior to the enactment of the consolidation act the county of San Francisco extended to San Francisquito creek on the south, but by that act the boundaries of the city were enlarged to their present extent; and section 9 of the schedule annexed to the act provided that "there shall be formed out of the southern portion of the county of San Francisco a new county, to be called San Mateo." There was no express declaration that the remaining territory which was placed under municipal government should cease to be the county of San Francisco, nor was there any further designation by the legislature of the county boundaries until the adoption of the Political Code in 1872, but the limitation of the new county to the "southern portion" of the county of San Francisco implies that the other portion continued to remain the county of San Francisco as before. Section 3901 of the Political Code defines a county as "the largest division of the state having corporate powers," and section 3902 declares, "This state is divided into counties, named, bounded and constituted as provided in this title," and the names and boundaries of the several counties are given in section 3909, and the succeeding sections. Section 3950 gives the boundaries of the territory which remained of the county of San Francisco after its inhabitants had been incorporated into a municipal corporation under the consolidation act, and the name given to this territory is "San Francisco (City and County)." By these sections this territory was declared to be one of the counties of the state, and continued to be such county until the adoption of the present constitution, in which (article 11, § 1) it is declared, "The several counties as they now exist are hereby recognized as legal subdivisions of the state." Title 2 of part 4 of the Political Code is devoted to "the government of counties," and in chapter 3 of that title are found provisions designating the officers of a county, and prescribing their powers and duties. Until this portion of the Political Code was superseded by the county government act, it was the only statute of the state which defined the powers and duties of certain officers elected by the voters of San Francisco, and upon the enactment of the county government act that statute alone became the source from which these officers have derived their powers. San Francisco is therefore both a city and a county, and, although the boundaries of the two bodies corporate are coincident, the electors within this territory vote for officers whose authority and functions are derived exclusively from the charter of the city, and also for officers whose powers and duties are prescribed by general laws, and upon which the charter is silent. It must follow from this that some of its officers are city officers, and others are county officers. There is nothing unusual or inconsistent in this. The "government" of the city is municipal, and the officers who are to exercise that government are municipal officers; but the territory in which that government is exercised is still a part of the state, and, for all purposes other than municipal government, is subject to its control, with the right on the part of the state to authorize the election therein of such officers as may be required to execute its general laws, or to perform such functions disconnected with the municipal government as may pertain to the government of the state. It would not be contended, if the city was only a portion of the county, or if a county should be composed entirely of incorporated cities, that the state would be precluded from authorizing the election by the voters of the county of officers to carry out those provisions of its laws which pertain to the state at large, and which have no connection with municipal affairs, and this rule is not changed where the county consists of a single city instead of several. Although the same body of voters choose the different officers, the functions of the officers chosen by them are distinct in their nature, and the character of the officers must be determined by the source of their authority and the functions they are to exercise.

Section 5 of article 11 of the constitution declares, "The legislature by general and uniform laws shall provide for the election or appointment in the several counties of boards of supervisors, sheriffs, county clerks, district attorneys, and such other county, township and municipal officers as public convenience may require." In obedience to this direction the legislature passed the county government act of 1893, declaring what county officers shall be elected, in which are included those designated in the above section, prescribing their duties, and fixing their term of office at four years. Some of the officers whose election is thus authorized are the same in name, and are given the same or similar functions, as are officers authorized by the consolidation act to be elected in San Francisco, while others whose election is authorized by each of these statutes have no authority except that which is given in the county government act. On the other hand, the consolidation act authorizes the election of several officers whose election is not authorized by the county government act, and who are not named therein as county officers. Those officers whose election is authorized by each of these statutes, but who are required by the consolidation act to perform the duties therein prescribed, do not cease to be municipal officers because, under the county government act, similar duties are prescribed for county officers of the same name. To the extent that these officers are a component part of the municipal government, they are municipal officers, and do not cease to be such by reason of the fact that other functions which pertain to county officers are imposed upon them. The guaranty given to the city and county of San Francisco by the constitution, of the right to continue its government under the charter which it held at the adoption of that instrument until it shall adopt another, including the right given by that charter to change its officers every two years if it shall so elect, cannot be taken away by the legislature under the form of imposing upon these officers certain functions exercised by county officers in other counties of the state, and fixing the term of such county officers at four years. But, as the territory thus placed under municipal government still remains a county, and is not taken out of the control of the state for all purposes not embraced within the scope of municipal government, the authorization by the legislature of an election by the voters of that territory for officers to carry out these laws does not make the persons so elected city officers. The constitution has declared that certain officers shall be elected within each county, and, if San Francisco is a county, the legislature is authorized to provide for the election of these officers by its voters, and is not precluded therefrom by the fact that they are voted for by the electors of the municipality at the same time with the election of its municipal officers. Prior to 1876 the voters of San Francisco elected one of the members of the board of state harbor commissioners, but that fact did not constitute him a city officer.

The officers of the city and county of San Francisco are designated in the act of April 2, 1866 (St. 1865–66, p. 718), as follows: "There shall be elected hereafter for the city and county of San Francisco, by the qualified electors thereof, at the times hereinafter mentioned, and in the manner prescribed by law for the election of state and county officers, one mayor, who shall be ex officio president of the board of supervisors, a county judge, police judge, an attorney and counsellor, probate judge, district attorney, sheriff, county clerk, recorder, treasurer, auditor, tax collector, assessor, coroner, public administrator, surveyor, superintendent of common schools, superintendent of public streets, highways and squares, chief of police, harbor master and state harbor commissioner. There shall be elected in each of the twelve present election districts of said city and county, which shall hereafter constitute municipal districts, and be designated and known in law as wards, by the qualified electors thereof, one supervisor and one school director." The term of office for these officers was fixed by the act at two years. The time for their election was subsequently changed, and is now fixed by section 4109 of the Political Code. The offices of county judge and probate judge were abolished by the constitution, and that of harbor master by statute. The police judge has been superseded by the judges of the police court, and certain changes have been made in the mode of electing supervisors. The chief of police and the state harbor commissioner have ceased to be elective officers. It will be observed that this statute does not declare that these are city officers, or are officers of the city and county, but merely that these officers "shall be elected for the city and county of San Francisco, by the qualified electors thereof"; leaving the character of the officer, whether he is to be denominated a county officer or a municipal officer, to be determined by the nature of the duties he is to perform, and the source from which he derives his authority. Of the officers above enumerated, the mayor, attorney, and counselor, sometimes styled "City and County Attorney" (see St. 1871–72, p. 232), superintendent of public streets, highways, and squares, and school directors, are not named in the county government act as county officers, and consequently cannot be subject to the provisions of that statute. Judges of the police court are not named in the county government act either as county or township officers, and no provision is found therein relative to their duties or term of office. This court has its existence by virtue of section 1 of article 6 of the constitution, which authorizes the legislature to establish inferior courts in any incorporated city, town, or city and county; and the act establishing it in the city and county of San Francisco (St. 1893, p. 9) declares that the court "shall consist of four judges, who shall be elected at the general election held according to law, each of whom shall hold office for the term of two years." The treasurer, auditor, tax collector, and surveyor are designated in the consolidation act as officers of the municipality, and are required to perform certain municipal duties which are not required from county officers who are elected for these offices in their respective counties. In addition to these duties the treasurer is constituted a part of the appointing power for the license collector (St. 1871–72, p. 736); the auditor is made a member of the board of new city hall commissioners (St. 1875–76, p. 461); and the auditor, the tax collector, and the city and county surveyor are members of the board of election commissioners for the city and county (St. 1877–78, p. 299). If it should be held that these are merely the officers designated by those names in the county government act, it would follow that their functions would be solely those given in that act, and not those given in the consolidation act; otherwise the county government act would cease to be uniform in its application to these officers in all the counties of the state, and would have the effect to repeal the provisions of the charter requiring them to exercise these municipal functions. The supervisors authorized by the consolidation act to be elected do not constitute the same body as that authorized by the county government act, although they bear the same name. The board of supervisors authorized by the consolidation act is for the government of the city and county, and consists of 12 members, while the board of supervisors authorized for a county consists of only 5 members, and exercises functions peculiarly appropriate to a county, but has not the authority required for providing for the wants of a city.

Section 11 of article 6 of the constitution vests in justices of the peace a part of the judicial power of the state, and makes them a part of the judicial department of the state (People v. Ransom, 58 Cal. 558); and section 11 of the same article declares, "The legislature shall determine the number of justices of the peace to be elected in townships, incorporated cities and towns, or cities and counties, and shall fix by law the powers, duties and responsibilities of justices of the peace." Section 3 of article 22 declares, "All courts now existing, save justices' and police courts, are hereby abolished"; and section 11 of the same article declares: "All laws relative to the present judicial system of the state shall be applicable to the judicial system created by this constitution until changed by legislation." By these provisions the justices' courts in existence at the adoption of the constitution were continued as a part of the judicial system of the state established by that instrument, and the laws relative to those courts, as well those providing for their organization as those which define their powers and duties, were continued in force until they should be changed by the legislature. By the act of March 26, 1866 (St. 1865–66, p. 423), a justices' court was created for the city and county of San Francisco, for which five justices of the peace were to be elected by the electors of the city and county at large for the term of two years; and the division of the city and county into townships for the purpose of electing justices of the peace and constables, which was authorized by section 6 of the consolidation act, as amended by the act of April 18, 1857 (St. 1857, p. 210), was abolished. This act was further amended by the act of February 10, 1870 (St. 1869–70, p. 56), and by section 12 thereof the office of constable in said city and county was abolished. These acts were in force at the adoption of the constitution, and, as seen above, are yet in force, unless they have been changed by the legislature. Section 11 of article 6, above quoted, recognizes the propriety of different provisions for justices of the peace in townships and incorporated cities, or cities and counties; and, at the first session of the legislature after the adoption of the constitution, that body revised title 1 of part 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and in chapter 5 assumed to comply with the directions of the above section of the constitution, and fixed the term of office of justices of the peace at two years. Section 85 declares, "There shall be in every city and county of more than one hundred thousand population a justice's court, for which five justices of the peace shall be elected, by the qualified electors of such city and county, at the general election next preceding the expiration of the terms of office of their predecessors." It is suggested, rather than argued, by counsel herein, that this act is unconstitutional; but, without passing upon this question, it is sufficient to say that, if it should be so held, it would follow that the above laws relative to San Francisco in force at the adoption of the constitution were not thereby changed, but still remain in force, unless they have been superseded by other legislation. This act was considered by this court in People v. Ransom, supra, and was held constitutional, so far as the matter then before the court was concerned.

Section 58 of the county government act of 1893 (St. 1893, p. 366) declares the officers of a township to be two justices of the peace and two constables, and directs the board of supervisors of each county to divide their respective counties into townships for the purpose of electing justices of the peace and constables. The legislature has never made the provision for township organization authorized by section 4 of article 11, and the township which is authorized by section 58 of the county government act is only a geographical subdivision of the county "for the purpose of electing justices of the peace and constables," and does not possess any attributes of government to be exercised by an officer. See Ex parte Wall, 48 Cal. 279. As the city and county of San Francisco is under a municipal government, and as there is no board of supervisors for the "county" of San Francisco, there is no authority for the division of the city and county into townships, and there has been no such division, and consequently these provisions of section 58 for the officers of a township, as well as the provisions of section 60 for the election of township officers, are inapplicable. It is not contended that there is any authority for the election of a constable in San Francisco. Even if a justice of the peace could, by any construction, be styled a "county officer," he has not been classed with the county officers enumerated in section 57 of the county government act, but, by section 58 of that act, has been specifically declared a township officer. But, as we have above seen, there is no provision for township officers in San Francisco.

Being a part of the judicial system of the state, justices of the peace are not included in the system of county government which the legislature is directed to establish and cause to be uniform throughout the state, and provisions relating to their election and term of office, as well as those relating to their powers and duties, are more appropriately placed in laws relating to the judicial department than in those relating to the system of county government. The different provisions in the constitution relating to the powers, duties, responsibilities, and election of justices of the peace are found in article 6, which treats exclusively of the judicial department. There is no provision in this article, or in the article relating to the legislative department, which requires that the term of office of a justice of the peace shall be the same in all parts of the state; and there are many reasons why the powers and duties of this officer, as well as his term of office, should be different in an incorporated city from those applicable to a sparsely-settled township. Section 10 of article 22 declares that judicial officers shall be elected at the time and in the manner that state officers are elected, but there is no requirement that the term of office of such judicial officers as the legislature may authorize to be elected shall be uniform throughout the state. The provision in section 11 of article 6 that the legislature shall determine the number of justices of the peace to be elected in townships, incorporated cities, and towns, or incorporated cities and counties, shows that it was not intended that the laws relating to this portion of the judicial system should be uniform throughout the state, but the number for each of these subdivisions or bodies corporate is to be fixed by the legislature as it may deem applicable to their respective needs. This provision recognizes the necessity of different provisions for these bodies, and, in the absence of constitutional restriction, gives to the legislature the power to adapt its laws to their respective conditions. The further provision in section 11 that the legislature shall "fix by law the powers, duties and responsibilities of justices of the peace," is limited by section 25 of article 4, which prohibits that body from passing a local or special law "regulating the jurisdiction and duties of justices of the peace, police judges and constables," and by section 11 of article 1, that "All laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." The term of office of an officer is, however, entirely distinct from his jurisdiction or duties; and a law of a general nature has a uniform operation, if it affects all the individuals of a class for which the legislature is authorized to make specific laws. The act of March 18, 1885 (St. 1885, p. 213), gives to the police courts therein created certain exclusive jurisdiction of matters which by the general law is vested in justices of the peace; and in People v. Henshaw, 76 Cal. 436, 18 Pac. 413, this act was sustained and held not to be a local or special law. The act creating the police court for the city and county of San Francisco confers upon it certain jurisdiction which is elsewhere exercised by justices' courts. From these considerations it must be held that the provision in the county government act fixing the term of office of justices of the peace for the townships into which the several counties are divided at four years does not apply to the justices of the peace elected for the city and county of San Francisco.

We hold, therefore, that the term of office of the foregoing municipal officers, and also of the judges of the police court, and of the justices of the peace who were elected at the general election in 1894, has not been changed by the county government act, and that an election for their successors must be held at the coming general election. The term of office of the assessor was made four years by section 4109 of the Political Code, upon its adoption in 1872, and by section 3 of article 9 of the constitution the superintendent of schools is to be elected at each gubernatorial election. Under these provisions these officers were elected in 1894 for the term of four years. The district attorney, sheriff, county clerk, county recorder, coroner, and public administrator are officers whose powers and duties are given by the county government act, or by other general laws, and do not derive any authority from the consolidation act, or exercise any function in the municipal government of San Francisco. These officers are therefore county officers, and their term of office, as well as the time of their election, are those provided by the county government act. The demurrer to the complaint was therefore properly sustained, upon the ground that it was necessary for the defendants to make preparation for the election of municipal officers at the coming general election. The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; HENSHAW, J.; VAN FLEET, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

TEMPLE, J. (dissenting). I am unable to agree with the conclusion reached by my associates. I fully concur, however, in the view that the consolidated city and county is a municipal corporation. The consolidation act of 1856 realized the intention stated in its title. It repealed the several charters theretofore existing of the city, and it consolidated the government of the city and the county. The two governments were merged, and both, so far as rights and liabilities and public functions were concerned, were continued in a new corporation then created,—the consolidated city and county. It succeeded to all the property rights and liabilities of both, and its officers performed all the functions which had been performed by county officers, and also all the functions imposed upon them which were purely municipal. All were, however, the officers of the municipal corporation. In no sense can it be said that some were county officers, and that some were city officers. The sheriff and county clerk are as much officers of the municipal corporation as the mayor or the police judge. Whatever may be said of their powers and duties, they are part and parcel of the corporate organization known as the "City and County of San Francisco." Any one officer is no less so than another. The legislature could then have made of the new corporation anything it chose, and it chose to create a consolidated government, upon which it imposed the duties, and to which it granted the powers, both of a city and of a county. It was thus enabled to maintain the relation of the state to the territory as a county, and to give to the inhabitants the benefit of a city government. But the officers of the consolidated government, who had the powers and performed the duties elsewhere performed by county officers, did so as officers of the new consolidated municipality. These powers and duties were expressly conferred upon them in the act of 1856 as officers of the municipality. Section 4 of that act provides, "All the existing provisions of law defining the powers and duties of county officers, except those relating to supervisors and boards of supervisors, so far as the same are not repealed or altered by the provisions of this act, shall be considered as applicable to officers of the said city and county of San Francisco, acting or elected under this act." We cannot, therefore, select certain officers, and say that they are county officers, and of others that they are city officers; for all are municipal officers, and municipal officers only. Therefore, if it be true that the legislature cannot in this mode change the terms of the officers of the municipality, because that would be to alter the charter, this law can have no application to the city and county of San Francisco. It would not follow from this that general laws affecting the powers and duties of county officers would not apply to the officers of the consolidated city and county. The idea of a consolidated government of this character is that thereby the state provides for the inhabitants of the included territory the benefit of a county government. To do this effectually such laws must apply to the consolidated government. As to the corporate existence of the municipality and the officers through whom the corporate functions shall be discharged, no reason exists why such interference should be allowed; and, if it were conceded that the legislature could so change the municipal charter, we cannot presume that it was intended. It was not necessary that the act shall include the consolidated city and county, in order that the law shall have a general and uniform operation. The city and county of San Francisco is not a mere county, but is recognized in the constitution itself, again and again, as constituting a class apart. Of course, if it is a municipal corporation, and therefore the legislature cannot thus change its charter, this point need not be further discussed. In my opinion, the legislature did not intend to ordain that some of the officers should hold office for four years, and others for two, there being no reason for the difference.

DUBOIS v. SPINKS et al. (Sac. 109.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 18, 1896.)

SALE—STATUTE OF FRAUDS—SUFFICIENCY OF DELIVERY.

Plaintiff purchased and took a bill of sale for wood piled on land of a third person, and subject to a lien for the cutting. The wood was measured and formally delivered, but was not moved. Within 3½ hours thereafter, the seller paid off the lien of the choppers out of the money received from plaintiff. Held, that there was a sufficient delivery and change of possession, within Civ. Code, § 3440, declaring void, as against creditors, a transfer of personalty, unless there is an immediate delivery, followed by a continued change of possession.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; A. P. Catlin, Judge.

Action by M. Dubois against Alfred Spinks and D. Dierssen. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Holl & Dunn, for appellants. White, Hughes & Seymour, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to recover damages for the conversion of 120 cords of wood. On October 12, 1894, John A. Meyer and his wife entered into a contract with two Japanese, by which the latter agreed to cut wood on land belonging to the former. The Japanese on the same day leased from T. D. Scriver a portion of his land, and by the agreement they were to haul the wood from the land where it was to be cut and pile it upon said leased land, and retain the possession of the wood until the price for cutting the same should be fully paid. Subsequently there was a change in the agreement as to the hauling, it being modified, verbally, so that the hauling might be done by the Meyers, and they were to be allowed a reduction therefor. Under the agreement about 126 cords of wood were hauled prior to November 20, 1894, and piled by Scriver's direction in two tiers outside and along and near his fence. On November 20, 1894, while the wood was so placed, the Meyers, for the purpose of raising money to pay the Japanese, borrowed the sum of $220 from the plaintiff, delivering to him their promissory note therefor; and, at the same time, and as security for its payment, they executed to him a bill of sale for said wood. After the bill of sale to plaintiff was signed, Meyer and his wife went with plaintiff and pointed out the wood to him, and measured it with a tape line. Meyer then said: "Mr. Dubois, there is the wood. It is yours. Do what you like with it." Within 3½ hours thereafter Mrs. Meyer paid the Japanese for the cutting of the wood, and they released their lien and possession. The wood was not marked in any way, nor was it moved. It was understood by plaintiff and the Meyers that whatever security the Japanese had on the wood should inure to the benefit of plaintiff. On November 23, 1894, the wood was seized by the defendant Spinks, a constable, on a writ of execution issued out of a justice's court upon a judgment in favor of defendant Dierssen against said J. A. Meyer. No notice of garnishment was served on plaintiff. On December 4, 1894, plaintiff served upon defendant Spinks a verified claim in writing, stating that he claimed the wood under a bill of sale from John A. and Agnes M. Meyer. On December 6, 1894, and before the sale of the wood on execution, plaintiff informed defendant Spinks that he had loaned the Meyers $220 on the wood, and held a promissory note dated November 20, 1894, payable 60 days from date. The wood was sold in pursuance of said levy, and purchased by the defendant Dierssen. The court below gave judgment in favor of plaintiff for $312.50. The appeal is from the judgment, and from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

1. Appellants contend that the transfer of the wood was void against them, for want of an immediate delivery, followed by an actual and continued change of possession, as required by section 3440 of the Civil Code, and decisions construing it. What constitutes an immediate delivery, or an actual and continued change of possession, in the sense of section 3440 of the Civil Code, is a question of fact to be determined on the evidence; and where, as in this case, the evidence tends to prove such delivery and change of possession, the finding of the court will not be disturbed. Porter v. Bucher, 98 Cal. 459, 33 Pac. 335; Claudius v. Aguirre, 89 Cal. 503, 26 Pac. 1077. In Samuels v. Gorham, 5 Cal. 226, it was said: "By immediate delivery is not meant a delivery instanter, but the character of the property, and its situation, and all the circumstances must be taken into consideration in determining whether there was a delivery within a reasonable time, so as to meet the requirement of the statute." This case was cited and approved in the case of Carpenter v. Clark, 2 Nev. 246, in which Lewis, C. J., said: "Perhaps a delay of two or three days in making a delivery, after the sale is otherwise complete, might not be sufficiently immediate to meet the requirements of the statute. That is a fact, however, which is to be determined by a consideration of all the circumstances of each case." Bassinger v. Spangler, 9 Colo. 189, 10 Pac. 809, is to the same effect, wherein the court said: "The fact that the property was sold one day to the plaintiff, and not delivered until the next day, does not render the sale void, if it appears in evidence that the delivery was impossible on the day of sale; and it is properly a question for the jury to answer whether the property was so situated and the parties were so located at the time of the making of the sale that instant delivery could not be made, and whether it was made as soon thereafter as practicable." See, also, Parks v. Barney, 55 Cal. 239; Hesthal v. Myles, 53 Cal. 623; Redington v. Nunan, 60 Cal. 632. Considering the ponderous and bulky nature of the 126 cords of wood, it was not necessary to change its situation for the purpose of effecting a delivery of possession (Hutchins v. Gilchrist, 23 Vt. 86); and, had the order of the acts constituting the whole transaction been reversed, there could have been no question that they constituted an immediate delivery. But, since all those acts were done within 3½ consecutive hours, I think that, under the circumstances, the court may have properly considered the satisfaction and release of the lien held by the Japanese, and the delivery of the wood to plaintiff, as parts of the same transaction, and substantially contemporaneous. As soon as practicable after the money loaned by plaintiff was received by the Meyers, Mrs. Meyer paid the demand for which the wood was held in pledge by the Japanese, and they released their lien, thus removing all valid objections to plaintiff's rightful possession of the wood. It makes no difference whether the transaction be a sale or a pledge, since, in either case, it is a "transfer of personal property," in the sense of the statute. Woods v. Bugby, 29 Cal. 476; Hilliker v. Kuhn, 71 Cal. 214, 16 Pac. 707.

2. It is next contended by appellants that, if in plaintiff's favor at all, the judgment should have been limited to the amount of the debt due from the Meyers to him. The only case cited to sustain this view is Treadwell v. Davis, 34 Cal. 601. But in that case it was held that the plaintiff, a pledgee, was entitled to recover the full value of the property, in an action against the sheriff, on the ground that the sheriff, instead of seizing the property itself, should have served a notice of garnishment. The interest of the pledgor may be reached under an execution, but it can only be done by serving a garnishment on the pledgee, and not by a seizure of the pledge. By pursuing the latter course the sheriff became a trespasser, and therefore could not be said to be in privity with the pledgor. The same rule should apply here.

3. Appellants claim that plaintiff was not entitled to judgment because he did not make such a claim upon the defendant constable as is required by section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The claim did not state that the plaintiff had taken the wood in pledge. It stated, however, that he was entitled to possession under the bill of sale. And that was true. I think the notice was sufficiently explicit. Section 689 is intended solely for the protection of the officer making the levy, and the notice was sufficient for that purpose.

4. The view of the case above taken renders it unnecessary to discuss in detail the alleged errors in the admission of evidence. It need only be said that such evidence was relevant for the purpose of showing the situation of the wood, as bearing upon the questions of delivery and change of possession. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

WELLS v. WOOD. (S. F. 246.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—STREET IMPROVEMENT —ASSESSMENT.

1. A description of a street improvement, in a resolution of intention and subsequent proceedings, as "grading and macadamizing," is sufficient to authorize a regrading and remacadamizing, where the street for a part of its width had been graded and macadamized some 15 years previously.

2. Where a lot is assessed for more than its proper proportion of the cost of a street improvement, and the owner fails to appeal from the assessment, the error is waived.

3. The failure of the superintendent of streets of a municipal corporation to record a contract for a street improvement at the proper time does not affect the right of the contractor to enforce the lien of a street assessment levied to pay the contract price.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Joseph Wells against Joseph M. Wood. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph M. Wood, in pro. per. Edwin C. Knapp and William H. Chapman, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to enforce lien of street assessment in the sum of $101.46 for labor and material performed and furnished by plaintiff's assignor under contract with the superintendent of streets in improving Mission street, in the city of San Francisco, from Cortland avenue to West avenue. The judgment was in favor of the plaintiff for the sum demanded, and defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. On the trial defendant proved that the portion of Mission street to which said contract related had been graded, curbed, and macadamized to official grade in March, 1877, about 14 years prior to the letting of the contract in question, and also proved that in 1888, by order of the board of supervisors, that part of Mission street involved in this action had been widened by adding 16½ feet to the eastern side thereof. On June

1, 1891, the board of supervisors passed a resolution of intention to order the improvement in question, describing it as follows: "That Mission street, from Cortland avenue to West avenue, be graded to the official line and grade, that redwood curbs and rock gutterways be laid thereon, and that the roadway and sidewalks thereof be macadamized." In all the subsequent proceedings, including the contract, the improvement was described as in the resolution of intention, except that certain specifications, in accordance with general orders of the board, were added to the contract. The principal ground upon which appellant claims a reversal of the judgment is that the improvements were not properly nor sufficiently described in the resolution of intention nor in the subsequent proceedings; that while the work done on the addition of 16½ feet to the east side of the street may have been grading and macadamizing, that done on the old part of the street was regrading and remacadamizing, and should have been so denominated. Waiving other possible answers to this objection, I think the description of the proposed work was sufficient. The substantial nature of the work of grading and that of regrading is the same, namely, grading. The latter is only a repetition of the former. The statute requires only a description of the work; that is to say, an intelligible description, sufficient to notify owners of lots fronting on the proposed improvement of the nature and extent of the work of which the improvement is to consist. It would add nothing material to such notice to inform the lot owners that work of the same kind, in the same place, had been done 10 or 15 years before, since they are bound to pay for a repetition of the work whenever, in the discretion of the board of supervisors, such repetition is deemed necessary. McVerry v. Boyd, 89 Cal. 304, 26 Pac. 885. The fact that the street had been graded and macadamized 15 years before the proposed repetition of such grading and macadamizing constituted no defense to this action, even if it had been pleaded as such; nor, as evidence, did it tend to rebut the prima facie case of plaintiff, as proved by the assessment, warrant, diagram, etc.

2. It is contended that the amount of the whole assessment was not equally distributed to the lots fronting on the improvement, and that defendant's lot was assessed for more than its proper proportion. Defendant's lot fronted on the improvement, and was lawfully assessable. If it was assessed for more than its lawful proportion, the defendant waived the error by failing to appeal to the board of supervisors, and the error cannot be corrected on this appeal. Perine v. Forbush, 97 Cal. 305, 32 Pac. 226; McDonald v. Conniff, 99 Cal. 386, 34 Pac. 71; Dowling v. Conniff, 103 Cal. 75, 36 Pac. 1034; Warren v Riddell, 106 Cal. 352, 39 Pac. 781.

3. The point that the superintendent of streets failed to record the entire contract at the proper time, even if conceded, is of no consequence as affecting any right of the contractor. Diggins v. Hartshorne, 108 Cal. 154, 41 Pac. 283; McVerry v. Boyd, 89 Cal. 304, 26 Pac. 885. But the record furnishes no ground for this point, since due recordation of the contract is alleged in the complaint and is not denied in the answer. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PEOPLE v. EPPINGER. (Cr. 131.)

CRIMINAL LAW—JUDGMENT—NEW TRIAL.

1. On a conviction under an indictment charging the making and passing of a fictitious check with intent to defraud (Pen. Code, § 476), it is error to enter judgment of conviction of forgery (section 470), though the penalty is the same for both offenses.

2. A motion for new trial, or permission to make such motion, on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, is properly denied,—no affidavits being produced or offered, or statement made of the nature, character, or time of discovery of the evidence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco, William T. Wallace, Judge.

W. L. Eppinger appeals from a judgment entered on a conviction under an indictment charging the making and passing of a fictitious check with intent to defraud. Reversed.

W. M. Cannon, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

HAYNES, C. On April 4, 1895, the defendant was convicted under an indictment for passing and publishing a fictitious check, with intent to defraud, and which also charged a prior conviction for petit larceny. A verdict of guilty was returned by the jury as to making and passing the fictitious check, but the verdict was silent as to the prior conviction for petit larceny. An appeal was taken from that judgment to this court, and the court below was directed to treat the verdict as a finding against the defendant upon the crime charged and in favor of the defendant upon the question of prior conviction, and the judgment was reversed, with directions to the trial court to pronounce a judgment and sentence upon defendant, in the exercise of his discretion, upon the facts and circumstances of the case, as provided for by section 476 of the Penal Code, and further directing the court that the judgment should designate the offense as the making, passing, and publishing a fictitious check with intent to defraud. 109 Cal. 294, 41 Pac. 1037. On November 8, 1895, after the remittitur had gone down from this court, the defendant was called for judgment, and was asked if he had any legal cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced against him. As to what then occurred the bill of exceptions taken by the defendant shows the following facts: "The defendant thereupon, through his counsel, did not make a motion for a new trial, but offered and requested permission to make a motion for a new trial, upon the ground that, since the taking of the last appeal, new evidence had been discovered material to the defendant, and which he could not with reasonable diligence have discovered and produced at the trial. The defendant did not offer or request permission to read in support of said motion any affidavit, and, being called on to state what the newly-discovered evidence was, the counsel declined to do so." The court refused to allow the said motion for a new trial, and to its refusal the defendant excepted, and assigns the same as error. The court thereupon rendered judgment as follows: "That, whereas, the said W. L. Eppinger having been duly convicted in this court of the crime of felony, to wit, forgery, it is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said W. L. Eppinger be punished by imprisonment in the state prison of the state of California, at San Quentin, for the term of fourteen years." And from this judgment the defendant appeals, upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions. Upon this record two questions are made and argued by appellant: (1) That the charge upon which he was tried and convicted was for making and passing a fictitious check with intent to defraud, while the judgment is for a different offense, namely, "forgery." (2) That the court erred in refusing to permit him to make a motion for a new trial.

1. The indictment upon which the defendant was tried and found guilty was held, upon the former appeal, to charge the crime of making and passing a fictitious check, with intent to defraud. As to the correctness of that ruling no question is made by either party. That the crime of forgery as defined in section 470 of the Penal Code, and that of making and passing a fictitious check with intent to defraud, under section 476 of the same Code, are different offenses was held in People v. Elliott, 90 Cal. 586, 27 Pac. 433. In that case the defendant was charged with forging a certain check signed "A. F. Rice & Co." This court said: "If we assume that there was such a firm in existence, then the judgment must be reversed, and a new trial ordered, by reason of the insufficiency of the evidence in not showing that the check was not signed by such firm. If we assume there was no such firm in existence, then the check was a fictitious check, and the prosecution should have been had under section 476 of the Penal Code, and the case must be reversed upon that ground. From the facts set forth in the information, it is apparent that it was filed and conviction had under section 470 of the Penal Code, which section is quite broad in its scope, but not sufficiently broad to include matters contained in section 476." See, also, People v. Eppinger, 105 Cal. 36, 38 Pac. 538. In People v. Johnson, 71 Cal., at page 388, 12 Pac., at page 262, it is said: "The clerk has no power to enter, and it is at least error in the court to direct, a judgment declaring that a defendant has been convicted of one offense when in fact he has been convicted of another and distinct offense. The entry of a judgment declaring that a defendant has been convicted of an offense of which he has not been convicted is more than a mere 'technical' error. A judgment is a solemn record, which is ordinarily conclusive evidence of the facts recited in it, and we ought not to permit such evidence to stand, when, on direct appeal, it appears that the matters recited in it are not true. Inasmuch as no proper judgment has been entered in the court below, the judgment in form must be set aside, and a proper judgment entered." In that case the information charged an embezzlement, while the judgment was for grand larceny; and there, as in this case, the penalty is the same for the offense charged as for that named in the judgment, and it was contended that the error in the judgment did not affect any substantial right of the parties; but this court cited section 1207 of the Penal Code, which provides: "When judgment upon a conviction is rendered the clerk must enter the same in the minutes, stating briefly the offense for which the conviction was had," etc.,—and said: "There can be no doubt that this statement of the offense is part of the judgment." It may be added that accuracy in the designation of the offense is rendered more important under the provisions of the Penal Code, which authorizes the fact of a previous conviction of another designated offense to be charged in the indictment or information, and which requires the jury to find upon it, unless the defendant admits it. If the record of the previous conviction should show that the indictment charged a forgery, and the judgment was for a different offense, which of the different offenses should be charged in the indictment, and which would be sustained by the record? These are questions which we do not propose to answer now, but which we may have to answer if the judgment in its present form is permitted to stand.

2. It is not quite clear, from the record, whether the defendant made a motion for a new trial, or asked permission to make such motion. The bill of exceptions is not clear upon the point, while the judgment recites that a motion for a new trial was made, and denied by the court. In either case, however, the ruling was right. The grounds of the motion, or proposed motion, were stated by counsel to be the discovery of new evidence after the former appeal had been taken.

No affidavits, either of the defendant or his counsel, or of the persons by whom the newly-discovered evidence could be given, were produced or offered; nor was there any statement by counsel of the nature or the character of the newly-discovered evidence, or when it was discovered, or that its discovery was so recent as to prevent the obtaining of the affidavits by the use of reasonable diligence. The question discussed by counsel as to the right of a defendant to show cause against a new judgment need not be considered. That question does not necessarily arise upon this appeal. Appellant, however, asks that the judgment be reversed, with permission to show cause against a new judgment in the manner provided by sections 1200 and 1201 of the Penal Code. Without considering or deciding the question of defendant's right under those sections to show cause why a proper judgment should not be rendered, it is sufficient to say that there is nothing in the record before us which indicates that the defendant has any grounds for such motion, and the request of counsel should therefore be denied.

The judgment appealed from should be reversed, with directions to the court below to render judgment against the defendant for the offense of making and passing a fictitious check with intent to defraud.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is reversed, with directions to the court below to render judgment against the defendant for the offense of making and passing a fictitious check with intent to defraud.

PEOPLE v. WHITEMAN. (Cr. 119.)

FORGERY—EVIDENCE—GUILTY KNOWLEDGE — ORDER OF ADMITTING EVIDENCE.

1. In a prosecution for forging and uttering a check, the admission in evidence of the certificate of protest of the check, while erroneous, was not prejudicial, where the fact of nonpayment of the check was admitted.

2. On a trial for forging and uttering a check, other checks, signed by different names, though shown to have been issued by defendant at about the same time, and to have been protested, are not admissible to prove guilty knowledge, without proof that they were forged.

3. The fact that letters of a defendant, containing admissions, were admitted in evidence before the corpus delicti had been proven, will not authorize the reversal of a judgment of conviction, the order of testimony being largely discretionary with the trial court.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

A. J. Whiteman was convicted of forgery, and from the judgment, and an order denying a new trial, he appeals. Reversed.

W. S. Hinkle, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

TEMPLE, J. The defendant was convicted of forging and uttering a check which purported to be the check of one Frank Dixon. The check as described was drawn in favor of defendant upon the Traders' & Importers' Bank of New York. The appeal is from the judgment and an order refusing a new trial.

The first point made by appellant is that the court erred in admitting in evidence the protest which accompanied the check which it is charged was forged and uttered by the defendant. It is not seriously denied that this ruling was error, but it seems impossible that injury could have resulted therefrom to defendant. The only materiality in the evidence, and the only way in which injury could have resulted, is that it tended to show that the check was not paid upon presentation in New York. But this was never a fact in controversy. It was proven in many ways, and was admitted by the defendant.

The next point relates to the admission of four other checks which there was evidence tending to show defendant negotiated, and upon which he obtained money, and which were not paid by the drawees. They were each objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and also upon the ground that there was no proof even tending to show that the check set out in the indictment was a forgery. The checks all purported to be drawn upon banks of the city of New York. The first was as follows: "No. 876. New York, M'ch 27, 1894. $200. The Importers' and Traders' National Bank of New York, through the New York Clearing House Association: Pay to A. J. Whiteman, or order, two hundred dollars. $200. G. S. Hyman." Indorsed: "A. J. Whiteman." It was accompanied by a protest for nonpayment which was also read in evidence. It was shown that the defendant had procured money upon this check from one Maxwell, who is the same person upon whom the check mentioned in the indictment had been passed; also, that the check had been presented to the bank in New York, and payment was refused, and that defendant, upon being informed of the fact, had repaid the money to Maxwell. The prosecution produced no evidence whatever tending to show that the check was forged, and none to show G. S. Hyman was a real person, and, of course, none to show that, if he was a real person, he had not authorized defendant to use his name in that way. Possibly this statement should be qualified in one respect, for, after all the checks had been read in evidence, as well as certain letters which it was admitted defendant wrote, an expert upon the examination of the handwriting testified that in his opinion they were all in the same handwriting. But, if this evidence tended to prove that they were all written by the defendant, there was still wanting evidence that the apparent drawer was a real person, or, if he was, that he had not authorized such use of his name. Another of the checks was for $250, drawn on the Bank of Commerce of New York, March 27, 1894. It purported to have been signed by S. W. Williams, and was payable to E. A. Delafield, or order. Delafield, it was proven, was an alias by which defendant was then known. The check was indorsed, "Pay to the order of A. J. Whiteman. E. A. Delafield," and had upon it the indorsement, "A. J. Whiteman." There was proof that the defendant had passed this at the Bank of California, and had been enabled to do so through the indorsement of Thomas Day & Co., who ultimately had to pay the check to the Bank of California. As to this check, also, there was a total lack of evidence as to its being a forgery, except as in the case of the last-mentioned check. Another check, dated April 1, 1894, was drawn upon the Importers' & Traders' Bank of New York, and purported to have been signed by Ensign & Carney. Defendant procured money upon it from W. F. Roeder. It was shown that the check had been presented to the drawee, and that payment was refused. The proof in regard to its being a forgery was exactly as in regard to the first-mentioned check. Still another of the checks was dated New York, March 24, 1894. It purported to have been drawn by E. A. Delafield. It was indorsed by defendant in that name, and by him negotiated. It was shown that payment had been refused. As in the case of the other checks, there was no proof of the forgery, or the existence of the apparent drawer, or of lack of authority.

The prosecution was also permitted to prove that defendant was registered at the Occidental Hotel under the name of E. A. Delafield, and while there he procured money from the cashier of the hotel upon three checks drawn on the Importers' & Traders' Bank of New York. The checks purported to be drawn by J. A. Delafield & Co. in favor of E. A. Delafield, and were indorsed by him in that name. There was also some effort to show that in all of the checks put in evidence the same blank forms had been used. One of the three last-named checks was forwarded to New York, and presented to the bank, and payment was refused. Upon being informed of this, the defendant refunded the money, and took them all up. They were, therefore, not produced, and, of course, as to them, there was not the slightest attempt to prove that they had been forged. As Delafield was confessedly an assumed name, it is probable that the signature J. A. Delafield & Co. was a fictitious firm. There was, however, no proof upon that subject.

We have here, then, including the check described in the indictment, eight different checks, for small sums, purporting to have been drawn by five different drawers upon New York banks. They were all negotiated within a few days in San Francisco, and none were paid on presentation. Letters written by the defendant were also read, in which he seems to admit that he did not think they would be paid. But as to none of them was there evidence that they had been forged. No evidence short of conclusive proof of guilt could have been more damaging. At least, this evidence tended very strongly to prove that the defendant was a cheat and reckless swindler. The evidence was admitted only for a limited purpose, and, in the charge of the court, its effect was expressly restricted to that purpose. When one of the checks was offered, and had been objected to, the court said: "I understand that all these matters are simply to show guilty knowledge in the transaction mentioned here, and for no other purpose." To which the prosecuting attorney responded, "Yes, sir." In the charge the court said: "Now, in order to show guilty knowledge, the prosecution have been allowed to introduce before you cases of other checks alleged by them to have been forged; but you will be careful to remember that such evidence is applicable only to the question of guilty knowledge." The jury was also told, as to the principal check, that the fact that there were no funds to meet it did not tend to prove that the check was forged. These checks were not, then, offered or received for the indorsements which were admitted to be in the handwriting of defendant, for the purpose of comparison, nor as the basis of a theory tending to show that all the checks were forged, but to show guilty knowledge only. But there was no proof that the other checks were forged, and, therefore, it was not shown, nor was there evidence tending to show, that about the same time the defendant had passed other forged checks. When the fact of guilty knowledge becomes material, it must appear that the check described in the indictment was itself a forgery. Proof that defendant passed other checks which were forged cannot be introduced, when unaccompanied with other inculpating facts, to establish the corpus delicti. And, when the body of the offense has been established, and that defendant passed the check, and it is sought to show guilty knowledge by the fact that defendant also passed other forged paper, the prosecution assumes the same burden as to all the other checks introduced. It must show that such checks were forged.

The evidence did tend very strongly to prove the defendant a swindler, and I have no doubt that it would be much easier to convince a jury that defendant forged the Dixon check after they had been convinced that he was a swindler. And such an impression is natural and reasonable. But to allow proof of the bad character of a defendant as a step in the proof of guilt has never been the policy of the law. On the contrary, pains is sometimes taken to prevent knowledge of the bad character of the defendant from reaching the jury. Thus, where a defendant has been previously convicted of an infamous offense, and such fact is charged in an indictment, a method is devised by which a defendant may prevent that part of the indictment from being read to the jury. As to the three checks which were not produced there was no evidence of their genuineness, and, as to the others, none except that the expert testified that all were in the same handwriting, as were also certain letters which it is admitted defendant wrote. There was no evidence that the persons by whom the checks purported to be drawn were real persons, and none that, if they were real persons, defendant was not authorized to use their names.

It is stated—perhaps through some misapprehension—that the learned judge of the trial court ruled that it was incumbent on the defendant to show that he had such authority, after it has been shown that he has drawn checks in the name of another. The attorney general does not contend for any such doctrine, and it is repudiated in the charge of the court in this case. The jury were told: "When an accused man pleads not guilty, as he has pleaded here, immediately there arises a presumption of innocence in his favor, which accompanies him all through the trial, and never deserts him." To prove that an accused person signed the name of another to an instrument, and that he passed such instrument as genuine, does not prove the commission of a crime. It must still be shown that it was a false instrument, and this is not proven until it is shown that the person who signed another's name did so without authority. Until this proof is made, it is not shown to be a false instrument, and the defendant is not put to his proof at all. The defendant, when on the stand, admitted that he drew two of the four checks which were produced at the trial, and that he negotiated them. He claimed, however, that he had authority from the drawers to so use their names. Waiving the necessity of corroborating evidence as to the corpus delicti, would any one contend that this proved forgery? Suppose that he had admitted that he drew the Dixon check, and claimed that he had authority from Dixon to draw it, would this admission have put the burden upon him to show such authority? It would be a new departure in criminal law. It arises from a difficulty which is inherent in our system. We have inherited the idea, which we carefully place in all our constitutions, that an accused person must be confronted by his witnesses in court. State process cannot cross state borders, and hence justice is sometimes defeated. The courts have not created the difficulty, and cannot provide a remedy by depriving a defendant of the presumption of innocence, and putting the burden upon him.

I do not think there was reversible error in admitting letters of the defendant which contained certain admissions before there was proof of the corpus delicti. The rule is that there must be other and independent proof that a crime has been committed by some one. Then it can be shown by the extrajudicial confessions that defendant is the guilty party. In some cases it has been held that the order of proof is material. That it is the fairer course that there should be independent proof, first, as to the body of the offense, cannot be doubted. But I do not think a case should be reversed merely because of a departure from the natural and just order of evidence.

It is said that the case must be reversed because the prosecution produced no evidence that defendant was not authorized to use Dixon's name, and also because they did not show that Dixon was a real person. Perhaps there was no such evidence when the prosecution rested, but, after the court had refused an application to instruct the jury to acquit the defendant, he voluntarily took the stand as a witness, and supplied the evidence which had been lacking. If there was error, it was thus cured. For the error above indicated, however, the cause is remanded and a new trial ordered.

ROBRECHT v. REID et al. (S. F. 305.)

EJECTMENT—TITLE TO DEFEAT RECOVERY.

Recovery by plaintiff in ejectment of premises which he claims under foreclosure of mortgage cannot be defeated by one not connecting himself with the title, by a showing that, three years before execution of the mortgage, the mortgagor was declared a bankrupt under the federal laws, and that the register in bankruptcy then conveyed to the assignee in bankruptcy the bankrupt's property,—notice of the assignee's appointment not having been published, and the assignment to him not having been filed for seven years, though Rev. St. U. S. § 5054, required immediate publication of the notice, and recording of the assignment within six months; and it appearing that the mortgagee never had notice of the bankruptcy proceedings till after the foreclosure, and that nothing was done by the court or assignee in bankruptcy till nearly seven years after appointment of the assignee, when he sold out his claim to the property, worth $7,000, for $50, and the mortgagor having till then remained in undisturbed possession, claiming the property as his homestead.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Ejectment by Anthon Robrecht against George W. Reid and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Scrivner & Schell and Horace Hawes, for appellants. E. R. Taylor, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action of ejectment to recover possession of a lot of land in the city of San Francisco. The complaint is in the usual form, alleging ownership and right of possession in the plaintiff, and his ouster by defendants, and the damages sustained. The answer admits that defendants are in possession of the lot, but denies that plaintiff is the owner or entitled to the possession thereof, and alleges ownership and right of possession in the defendant Reid. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and the findings and judgment were in favor of the plaintiff, from which judgment, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal.

The facts proved are, in substance, as follows: The lot in question is situated between Seventh and Eighth streets and Folsom and Clementina streets. It has a width of 25 feet, facing on the two last-named streets, and a length of 160 feet between them. There are two two-story buildings on the lot, one fronting on Folsom and the other on Clementina street, and there is a fence, between them, with a gate or opening through it for passage from one house to the other. Both houses were constructed for use as flats, except the lower story of the one on Folsom street. The front part of that story was intended for a store, and in the rear were rooms for family use. In March, 1874, one P. F. Cusick became the owner of the said lot, and on July 26, 1878, he, his wife joining with him, executed in proper form a declaration of homestead thereon, and on the next day caused the same to be duly recorded. At that time he was residing with his family on Langton street, but, the night before executing the declaration of homestead, he and his wife went to the Folsom street house and slept there, on a mattress, in one of the back rooms in the lower story. They took their supper that night and their breakfast the next morning at their house on Langton street, but a few days later they moved into the Folsom street house, and thereafter made it their place of residence. On July 30, 1878, Cusick filed, in the United States district court for California, his petition in bankruptcy, with accompanying schedules, showing, among other things, that the property here in controversy was incumbered by a mortgage to one Portal for $5,000, bearing interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum, and on August 7th he was regularly adjudged to be a bankrupt under the federal bankrupt laws then in force. Thereafter, on September 2d, one J. H. B. Wilkins was regularly chosen and appointed assignee of the estate of said bankrupt, and on that day the register in bankruptcy, by an instrument in writing, assigned and conveyed to the said assignee all the estate, real and personal, of the said bankrupt. No notice of the assignee's appointment was published, and the assignment to him was not filed in the office of the clerk of the court or recorded in the office of the county recorder until April, 1885, though the immediate publication of such notice and the recording of such assignment within six months were required by the bankrupt act (Rev. St. U. S. § 5054). Cusick remained in possession of the said property, using a portion thereof as a place of residence for himself and family, and collecting the rents for the portions leased to tenants, until March 3, 1881, when, to pay off the mortgage thereon to Portal for $5,000 he borrowed from plaintiff the sum of $5,100, for which he and his wife executed to plaintiff their promissory note, payable two years after date, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, and also at the same time executed to him a mortgage on the said premises to secure payment of the said note. To complete the transaction all the parties met at the city hall, and the plaintiff then, at the request of Cusick, paid the money loaned to Portal, who then satisfied his mortgage. Before making the loan plaintiff employed an attorney to examine the title, and after an investigation the attorney reported to him that it was good. Neither the plaintiff nor his attorney had ever had any knowledge or notice of any of the said bankruptcy proceedings. The said note not being paid, plaintiff commenced an action in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against Cusick and his wife to foreclose his mortgage, and such proceedings were had therein that on March 26, 1885, a judgment and decree was duly given and made foreclosing the same, and adjudging that the whole amount of principal and interest due thereon was unpaid and owing from the defendants to plaintiff, and directing that the mortgaged premises be sold for the purpose of satisfying the mortgage lien. Under this decree the said premises were regularly sold by the sheriff and bid in by the plaintiff, and on September 29, 1885, he obtained a sheriff's deed therefor, which was duly executed, acknowledged, and recorded. So far as appears, nothing, except as above stated, was done by the court or the assignee in the bankruptcy proceedings until April 6, 1885, when the assignee executed to the defendant a deed of the said premises, who thereupon took possession of the same, and thereafter retained such possession up to the time of the trial. The consideration for the deed was $50, and it was proved that the value of the said property at that time was more than $7,000. Shortly after obtaining his deed the defendant commenced an action against the plaintiff herein to quiet his title to the property, and on appeal to this court it was held that the deed was void and conveyed no title. Reid v. Robrecht, 102 Cal. 520, 36 Pac. 875.

Upon these facts the appellant contends that the findings of the court were not justified, and that the judgment should therefore be reversed. This contention is based upon the following propositions: (1) That the declaration of homestead executed and filed by Cusick and his wife was invalid and of no effect, because the declarants were not at the time of executing the same actually residing upon the property. (2) That, when the register assigned the property of the bankrupt to the assignee, the assignment related back to the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, and vested the title to the property in the assignee as of that time. (3) That, when Cusick and his wife executed the mortgage to the plaintiff, they had no estate or interest in the property, and could not incumber or convey the same in any way whatever, and hence the mortgage created no lien on the property. (4) That the fact that the plaintiff loaned his money to pay off a pre-existing valid mortgage on the property did not in any way subrogate him to the rights of the prior mortgagee. (5) That it is immaterial whether the plaintiff had notice of the bankruptcy proceedings when he took his mortgage, as under the bankrupt law a purchaser from the bankrupt can acquire no right to property vested in the assignee, whether he has notice of the proceedings or not. (6) That it was competent for the defendant to defeat the plaintiff's title by showing, as he did, that the title was outstanding in the assignee.

We do not deem it necessary to discuss these several propositions at length, for, conceding that each one of them is sound, still they are not, in our opinion, controlling in this case. It is true that in an action of ejectment, when the plaintiff relies upon a paper title, the defendant may show the true title with right of possession to be outstanding in a third person, without connecting himself with it, and may thus defeat the action. Moore v. Tice, 22 Cal. 514; Simson v. Eckstein, 22 Cal. 581; Dyson v. Bradshaw, 23 Cal. 528; Cranmer v. Porter, 41 Cal. 462. Here it appears that Cusick and his wife remained in undisturbed possession of the property, claiming it as their homestead, for nearly seven years after the bankruptcy proceedings were commenced. This possession was evidence of an admitted right on their part to the possession of the property, and was certainly sufficient to have enabled them to maintain an action to dispossess any mere intruder upon it. And that this right was recognized by the assignee is shown by the fact that, during all the time named, he took no steps to obtain possession of the property himself, as it would otherwise have been his duty to do, and at the end simply sold out his claim thereto for $50, when the property was in fact then worth more than $7,000. But, when the plaintiff obtained the sheriff's deed under the foreclosure proceedings, he succeeded to all the rights of the mortgagors, whether existing at the time the mortgage was executed or subsequently acquired, and was therefore entitled to maintain his action against the defendant, who in no way connected himself with the title. The bankrupt law provided as follows: "No suit, either at law or in equity, shall be maintainable in any court between an assignee in bankruptcy and a third person claiming an adverse interest, touching any property or rights of property transferable to or vested in such assignee, unless brought within two years from the time when the cause of action accrued for or against such assignee." Rev. St. U. S. § 5057. Whether, in view of this statute, the assignee, at the time he made his deed to the defendant, could have maintained an action to recover possession of the property, is a question which does not arise here, and need not be considered. In any event, however, the defendant should not be permitted to defeat this action by the showing made as to the title of the assignee. It follows, in our opinion, that the findings of the court were justified, and that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

TONINI v. CEVASCO et al. (S. F. 220.)[1]

LIBEL — PLEADING DAMAGES — CONSTRUCTION — HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Sustaining an objection to a question, the purpose of which was to show that witness was unfriendly to defendant, if error, is harmless; witness having already testified that he was unfriendly to him.

2. Publishing, concerning one engaged in the railway and steamship ticket business, that a certain firm engaged in that business were compelled to discharge him for "conduct not irreprehensible," followed by a publication that while such person gives notice in a circular that he is no longer with such firm, but has moved his business, "as a matter of truth, and to guard the public against any surprise, we must confirm the statement, already publicly made," that he "has not moved away, but has been discharged" by said firm "for conduct not irreprehensible," is libelous per se, so that special damages need not be averred or proved; Civ. Code, § 45, defining "libel" as a false publication "which exposes any person to * * * obloquy."

3. That the court, in an action for libel, left to the jury the determination of the meaning of the publications, with instructions that they were to be taken in the sense that is most natural and obvious, and in that sense in which those persons to whom the publications should come would be most likely to understand them, cannot be complained of by defendant; the publications being such as might properly be construed as defamatory.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by M. G. Tonini against Cevasco & Crespi. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. J. McGee and Jos. F. Cavagnaro, for appellants. Gordon & Young, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to recover damages for an alleged libel by the defendants, in a newspaper owned by them, to the injury of plaintiff. The jury rendered a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $1,000, which, on the motion for a new trial, was reduced by the court to $500. Defendants appeal from the judgment, and from the order denying a new trial.

---

[1] Rehearing denied.

Appellants' first contention is that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence, but this contention cannot be maintained. The main issues of fact were whether or not the respondent was discharged as an employé by the firm of Cevasco & Co., and whether the alleged libelous matter was true. While the evidence upon these two issues was conflicting, there certainly was sufficient evidence to warrant the jury in finding in favor of the respondent upon both said issues.

Appellants contend that the judgment should be reversed on account of errors committed by the trial court with respect to the admissibility of evidence, but we think that this position taken by appellants is not tenable. When the defendant Crespi was on the stand as a witness for respondent, he was asked by the appellants whether or not the alleged libelous article was true, and an objection by respondent that this question was not in cross-examination was sustained; and this ruling is claimed to have been erroneous. But nothing was asked witness on the examination in chief about the truth of the article, and we do not think the court erred in holding the question not proper on cross-examination. Afterwards the said witness was examined on the part of the appellants, when the whole matter of the truth of the article might have been properly gone into by the appellants, and was, to a considerable extent. Upon cross-examination of the same witness by appellants, he was asked whether or not the appellants Cevasco had not sued him on a certain note, and attached his interest in the paper, and an objection to this question by respondent was sustained. Whether or not this ruling was technically correct, it is evident that no harm could have been done to appellants by the ruling. The only purpose of the question was to show an unfriendly feeling on the part of the witness to the appellant Cevasco, but the witness had already testified that he was unfriendly with said Cevasco. When the respondent, Tonini, was being examined on his own behalf in rebuttal, and at the very close of the evidence, he was asked on cross-examination if, after the second publication made by the appellants, and set forth in the complaint, he had not also had an advertisement in a certain paper called the "L'Elvezia"; and the respondent objected to the question as not rebuttal, irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial, and that the advertisement spoken of was after the commencement of the suit. The court sustained the objection, and appellants contend that this ruling is reversible error. We do not think that the ruling was erroneous. We do not see how the matter proposed to be proven was competent, or that the court abused its discretion in not allowing it at that stage of the trial. The foregoing are the only objections to rulings of the court as to the admissibility of evidence which are presented in the brief.

Appellants contend that the language alleged in the complaint to have been published is not libelous per se, and that, as no special damages were proved, respondent should not have recovered. At common law there was great difficulty in determining, in actions of either slander or libel, when language was actionable per se,—that is, language from which the law would presume damage,—and when is was actionable only upon averment and proof of special damage. It is quite evident that such an action can rarely be successful where the plaintiff is compelled to plead, and specifically point out and prove, the time, place, mode, and circumstance of his damage. Under the earlier decisions in actions of slander, words were held not to be actionable per se unless they imputed a crime involving moral turpitude, although, even in actions of slander, the rule was afterwards greatly relaxed. But there was always a distinction running through the cases between actions of slander and actions of libel,—between words spoken and words written or printed; and, in actions of libel, language was held actionable per se which would not have been so held in actions of slander. Some few judges thought this distinction not sound, but they admitted that it was well established by the authorities. See notes to section 18, p. 71, of Townshend on Slander and Libel. Townshend says (section 18): "To language in writing is attributed, in most cases, a greater capacity for injury than is attributable to language spoken or speech, so that language which, if spoken, gives no right to redress, may, if reduced to writing, give a cause of action." In Broom, Com. Law, 760, it is said, "There is, however, this great distinction between the two actions: that from a libel damage is always implied by law, whereas only some kinds of slander are actionable without proof of special damage"; and in 1 Chit. Gen. Prac. 45, it is said that the distinctions between slanders and libels "proceed upon the principle that the former are often spoken in heat, upon sudden provocations, and are fleeting and soon forgotten, and therefore less likely to be permanently injurious, but that written slander is more deliberate and more malicious, more capable of circulation in distant places, and consequently more likely to be permanently injurious." For the same reasons, no doubt, libel is, in most countries, a public offense, and its perpetrator may be punished criminally, while the author of spoken slander is liable only to damages in a civil action. However, in most of the states there is a statutory definition of libel, and in such case language which is fairly included in such definition is libelous per se. It is only when the libelous meaning of the publication is covert—not apparent on the face of the language used—that averment and proof of special damage is required. Our Code defines "libel" as follows: "Libel is a false and unprivileged publication by writing, pictures, effigy or other fixed representation to the eye, which exposes any person to hatred, contempt, ridicule or obloquy, or which causes him to be shunned or avoided, or which has a tendency to injure him in his occupation." Civ. Code, § 45. This definition is very broad, and includes almost any language which upon its face has a natural tendency to injure a man's reputation either generally, or with respect to his occupation.

In the case at bar it is alleged in the complaint that the parties are all Italians by race, and members of what is known as the "Italian Colony" of the city of San Francisco; that for many years plaintiff had been engaged in San Francisco in the business of railway and steamship agency, selling railway and steamship tickets, and doing all business incidental thereto; that such business was done principally with Italians; that such business required mutual confidence, and that great reliance was placed in plaintiff's honesty, honor, and trustworthiness; and that defendants are also engaged in the same business, and are business rivals of plaintiff, having their place of business at No. 632 Montgomery street, in said city. It is further averred that defendants are also the proprietors and publishers of a certain newspaper of general circulation, called "La Voce del Populo," which circulates among, and is read by a large number of, the Italian residents of said city, and is declared by defendants to be the organ of the Italian population in California, and that on November 16, 1893, and on several other occasions, the defendants published in the Italian language, in said newspaper, concerning plaintiff, certain words, which, being translated into English, are as follows: "The agency of G. B. Cevasco & Co. must state, besides, as a matter of truth, that since the first of November they were compelled to discharge Mr. M. G. Tonini for his conduct not irreprehensible." It was further averred that afterwards, on December 6, 1893, the defendants made the further publication of language, which, being translated into English, is as follows: "We have received from the agency of G. B. Cevasco & Co. the following: 'Mr. M. G. Tonini gives notice in a circular that he is no more at 632 Montgomery street, but that he has moved to another place his business.' As a matter of truth, and to guard the public against any surprise, we must confirm the statement already publicly made; that is, that Mr. Tonini has not moved away, but has been discharged by the firm of G. B. Cevasco & Co. for conduct not irreprehensible." The complaint also contains the usual averments as to defendants' intent in publishing said language; how it was understood by those who read it, etc. We think that the language charged, upon its face, tended naturally, necessarily, and proximately to produce some, at least, of the results mentioned in section 45 of the Code above quoted; that its natural effect was to expose plaintiff to "obloquy,"—among the definitions of which given by Webster are "blame, reprehension,"—and to "injure him in his occupation"; and that, therefore, no averment or proof of special damage was necessary. "To expose one to obloquy is to expose him to censure and reproach, as the latter terms are synonymous with the word 'obloquy.'" Bettner v. Holt, 70 Cal. 275, 11 Pac. 713. Surely no intelligent man could read these publications without understanding them to mean that plaintiff was not an honorable person, and had been guilty of such reprehensible misconduct as should deter people from trusting him in his occupation. It cannot be justly said that the language does not import anything of a defamatory character concerning the plaintiff. See Bettner v. Holt, 70 Cal. 270, 11 Pac. 713; Lick v. Owen, 47 Cal. 252; Edwards v. Society, 99 Cal. 431, 34 Pac. 128; Fitch v. De Young, 66 Cal. 339, 5 Pac. 364.

We do not see that, in the matter of instructing the jury, any error was committed prejudicial to appellants. It is no doubt the law that, where the language of an alleged libel is unambiguous, it is the province of the judge to determine its construction, and that where it is capable of two constructions the jury are to determine in what sense it was used. Van Vactor v. Walkup, 46 Cal. 124; Townsh. Sland. & L. §§ 281, 286. In the case at bar, while the judge did not expressly state upon which of these two theories he proceeded, still he actually left to the jury the determination of the meaning of the publications. In that state of the case, if the verdict had been for defendants the plaintiff might have plausibly made the point that he had been injured because the judge had not himself construed the language as defamatory. The verdict, however, was for plaintiff; and defendants were not prejudiced, unless upon the proposition that the language was not defamatory, and that the jury should not, and could not rightly, have found it to be of that character,—a proposition which cannot be maintained. The judge gave a large number of instructions requested by defendants, which stated their side of the case fully and fairly, and we do not think that any prejudicial injury arose out of the refusal to give a few other instructions which they asked. These latter, so far as they were correct, were fairly included in the instructions given. The jury were told, among other things, that "the publications alleged to be libelous are to be taken in the sense that is most natural and obvious, and in that sense in which those persons to whom the publications should come would be most likely to understand them"; and this was certainly putting the case as favorably for defendants as it could rightfully have been put if the judge had himself construed the language. Upon the whole, we see no good reason for reversing the judgment. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. MILLER et al. v. DAVIE et al. (S. F. 420.)

CITIES—AMENDMENT OF CHARTER—SPECIAL ELECTION—OFFICERS—SHORTENING OF TERM.

1. Under Const. art. 11, § 8, providing that proposed amendments of city charters may be submitted to a vote of the electors at "a general or special election," such amendments may be legally submitted at an election held for the sole purpose of voting thereon.

2. The term of an incumbent of a city office may be shortened by an amendment of the city charter abolishing the office, or devolving its duties upon other officers.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; A. L. Frick, Judge.

Quo warranto by the state on the relation of W. N. Miller and R. A. Hughes, against John L. Davie and others and the city of Oakland. Judgment for respondents, and relators appeal. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald and Geo. E. De Golia, for appellants. Reed & Nusbaumer, S. F. Daniels, J. A. Johnson, and J. K. Piersol, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an investigation instituted in the name of the people, in the nature of quo warranto, to test the title to office of the present board of public works of the city of Oakland; said board consisting of three commissioners. The defendants the mayor, the city attorney, and city engineer are ex officio the commissioners, and form this board of public works. They claim title to office under and by virtue of certain amendments to the charter of the city of Oakland. Their tenure of office is attacked by plaintiff upon two grounds: First, that the election at which the amendments to the charter were submitted to the people was not authorized by law, and therefore said amendments never became part of the city charter; and, second, it is contended that, if the election was legal, and the amendments adopted in accordance with law, still Miller and Hughes, as members of the board of public works, were entitled to hold office for a full term of four years.

The amendments to the charter were submitted to the people under an election called and held by virtue of a power claimed to exist in the city council, coming from section 8, art. 11, of the constitution of the state, which provides: "The charter * * * may be amended at intervals of not less than two years by proposals therefor, submitted by the legislative authority of the city to the qualified electors thereof, at a general or special election, held at least forty days after the publication of such proposals for twenty days in a daily newspaper of general circulation in such city, and ratified by at least three-fifths of the qualified electors voting thereat, and approved by the legislature, as herein provided for the approval of the charter." Appellants' position as to this provision of the constitution is that the words "special election" refer to an election held for the purpose of filling a vacancy in office (section 1043, Pol. Code); that a special election, under the Code, is an election held for that purpose; and that the legislative mind had such an election in view when this provision of the constitution was enacted. It is further insisted that such provision is a limitation of power, and the mode there prescribed is the measure of the power. Appellants then claim that, these amendments having been voted upon at an election held solely for the purpose of voting upon them, such an election was neither a general nor special election, and hence there was no power and authority vested in the city council to call and hold the election that was so called and held. In People v. Hoge, 55 Cal. 612, the provision of the constitution here under consideration was before the court, and it was then held to be self-executing. As to the legal soundness of such holding we have no doubt, and, that being the fact, the sole question remaining upon this branch of the case rests upon the signification to be given the words "special election." It is urged by appellants that in the Hoge Case there is found an intimation that these words refer to an election at which a vacancy in office is to be filled, but there was no such question before the court in that case. As to what constituted a special election, in the light of this constitutional provision, was not under consideration by the court. The election involved in that case was a special election, from any point of view, and the merit of that litigation was in no way dependent upon the construction to be given those words. For these reasons we hold the case is no authority in support of appellants' position. All elections are either general or special. This election was not a general election. Hence it must have been a special election. This much is conceded, but it is contended that it must be a particular kind of special election; that is, an election held to fill a vacancy in office. We find no warrant in the language used to justify such an interpretation. A special election to fill a vacancy in office contemplates haste and urgent action. The notice of election may be given for only 5 days. To adopt amendments to a charter there must be a publication of notice for 20 days, and a further lapse of time of 40 days before election day. Thus, the application of the construction contended for would be wholly impracticable, and in this regard almost nullify the law. An election held for the single purpose of voting a special tax, or for the issuance of bonds, is a special election. Yet appellants do not even contend that such an election is the special election referred to by the provision of the constitution. Again, no good reason can be urged why such an election should be held at the time and place where an election is being conducted to fill a vacancy in office. But, aside from any indirect reasons that may be invoked, looking against appellants' position, we are clear that the meaning of the provision itself, gazing squarely at it, is that the words "special election" refer to an election held for the purpose of voting upon the amendments to the charter. Such is the plain and natural construction of the language, and that such was the intention of the framers of the instrument we have no doubt.

The charter being legally amended, it is still maintained that the incumbents of the offices of commissioners of public works at the date that the amendments took effect should hold office for the balance of the four-year term for which they were appointed. Among other matters, these amendments to the charter provided: "There shall be a department of public works under the management of three commissioners, who shall constitute the board of public works. The commissioners shall consist of the mayor, city attorney and the city engineer. * * * General municipal elections shall be held biennially on the second Monday in March, commencing with the second Monday in March next after the adoption of this amendment. At each such general municipal election there shall be elected a mayor, who shall be ex officio a commissioner of public works, * * * a city attorney, who shall be ex officio a commissioner of public works, * * * and a city engineer, who shall be ex officio a commissioner of public works." The salary of a county or city officer may be reduced during his term of office by the legislative power, or his term of office shortened or even extinguished. And, when we consider the foregoing provisions of the charter as amended, which provide who shall constitute the board of commissioners of public works, and when the commissioners shall be elected, it is patent that upon such election a new board was created, and that the old members were no longer clothed with official authority. These amendments to the charter necessarily repealed by implication any provisions of the law fixing the term of office at four years. For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

MARCH v. BARNET et al. (S. F. 436.)

SUBROGATION — RIGHTS OF INDORSER OF NOTE AGAINST MAKER.

A sale on execution of the property of an indorser of a note, to satisfy a judgment against him and the maker, gives such indorser a cause of action against the maker only for the amount actually credited on the execution, after paying the costs of the sale out of the proceeds thereof, since it was the duty of the indorser to have voluntarily paid the judgment, without levy and sale.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; J. H. Logan, Judge.

Action by William F. March against S. B. Barnet and others for the recovery of money. From a judgment for plaintiff against defendant Jacob Steen, and an order denying a new trial, said Steen appeals. Modified.

Z. N. Goldsby, for appellant. W. D. Story, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. One Button recovered a judgment against Steen and March, the maker and indorser, respectively, of a certain promissory note. He assigned the judgment to Barnet. Barnet's assignee took out execution, and levied upon the property of March. Under execution sale this property, to the extent of $770, was applied to the payment of the judgment and costs of sale. The present action is brought by March against Steen, Barnet, and others, who were assignees of the judgment at certain times, for the sum of $1,400. The complaint alleges the value of March's property levied upon and sold to be that sum, and charges the defendants with conspiracy in making the levy, etc. The trial court rendered judgment against Steen for the sum of $770, and also rendered judgment in favor of the other defendants for their costs. Steen appeals from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The judgment being in favor of all the defendants except the appellant, Steen, it becomes unnecessary to pass upon many of the objections made to the complaint by demurrer. For the same reason, any lack of findings upon issues of fact pertaining to the defendants not appealing will not be considered. Indeed, it is somewhat difficult to determine the exact theory upon which plaintiff formulated his complaint. And, as far as this appellant is concerned, both the complaint and findings largely abound in matters of surplusage. But it does appear by both complaint and findings that a judgment was rendered against Steen, the maker, and March, the indorser, of a certain promissory note; and it further appears that March's property was levied upon, sold, and the proceeds applied to the satisfaction of that judgment. These facts created a liability against Steen, and in favor of March; for, if March had voluntarily paid the judgment, he would have had a cause of action against Steen for the amount paid, and he had the same cause of action when his property was sold by the sheriff, and the proceeds applied upon the judgment. Such liability appearing by both complaint and findings, we see no necessity for a reversal of the judgment and a new trial. It appears that while plaintiff's property brought $770 at forced sale, still only $596.10 were credited upon the execution returned to the court, the balance being applied to the payment of the costs of sale. As to the owner of the judgment, it was the duty of the plaintiff, March, to pay the entire amount without a levy and sale of his property, and we see no reason why Steen should be liable for the costs of the sheriff in selling March's property. See Simpson v. Griffin, 9 Johns. 131. Steen only received a benefit from March to the extent of the amount of money actually applied upon the judgment, and that amount measured his liability. The superior court therefore erred in giving to the plaintiff a judgment against Steen for $770, instead of the $596.10; and it is accordingly directed to modify the judgment, and to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff against Steen for the sum of $596.10, with interest thereon from June 10, 1892, and costs, and, as so modified, the judgment and order will stand affirmed.

NIOSI v. EMPIRE STEAM LAUNDRY et al. (L. A. 225.)

APPEAL—FILING POINTS AND AUTHORITIES.

A motion to dismiss an appeal will be denied, notwithstanding appellant's failure to file his points and authorities within the time required by the supreme court rules, if appellant presents such points before the hearing of the motion, and it appears that the appeal is presented in good faith, and that the delay was caused in part by a misunderstanding of counsel, and in part by appellant's inability by reason of his poverty, to obtain the money necessary to pay the expenses of the appeal.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by Rosario Niosi against the Empire Steam Laundry and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. On motion to dismiss. Denied.

Murphey & Gottschalk, for appellant. J. S. Chapman, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal for the failure of appellant to file his points and authorities within the time required by the rules of this court. The points and authorities should have been filed not later than June 1, 1896. The motion to dismiss the appeal was made upon June 12th, and appellant's points and authorities were presented before the hearing of the motion. It appears that the appeal is prosecuted in good faith, and that the delay was occasioned in part by a misunderstanding between counsel for the respective parties, and in part by reason of the difficulties which the appellant by reason of his poverty, experienced in obtaining moneys necessary to pay the expenses of appeal. Altogether, sufficient is shown in excuse of the failure and neglect of appellant; and, as no hardship is worked to the respondents by reason of the delay, the motion to dismiss is denied.

PEOPLE v. SANDERS. (Cr. 95.)[1]

CRIMINAL LAW—CONTINUANCE—EVIDENCE TENDING TO PROVE ANOTHER CRIME—INSTRUCTIONS—CONDUCT OF COUNSEL.

1. Where a year elapsed between the indictment of a defendant and his trial, during which both prosecution and defense searched without success for persons who were material witnesses, the court was justified in refusing a further continuance on the ground of their absence.

2. In a trial of a defendant charged with having forged and uttered a draft, evidence that the person whose name purported to be signed to such draft had, prior to its date, been murdered by defendant, is pertinent and material, both as tending to prove that the instrument was forged, and also the knowledge of its false character by defendant when he uttered it; and it is not rendered inadmissible by the fact that it tends to prove the commission by defendant of a separate crime.

3. Where evidence is properly admitted in a criminal trial, though it tends to prove the defendant guilty of another crime than the one charged against him, counsel for the prosecution has the right to discuss such evidence to the jury, and to argue any theory which may legitimately be deduced therefrom.

4. Where the prosecution, to prove as a fact material to the issue that a certain person had been murdered by defendant, was permitted to introduce evidence tending to show that such person was seen riding with defendant, and that at a point further along the road defendant was riding alone, it was prejudicial error to exclude the testimony of a witness offered by defendant to the effect that at a point still further along the road the witness met the defendant and another riding with him, and tending to show that such other was the person claimed to have been murdered.

5. Testimony of witnesses shown to have been in the vicinity that they did not see a vehicle claimed by defendant to have passed along a certain road is admissible, its weight being for the jury to determine.

6. Where the existence of a certain person in regard to whom a defendant has testified is questioned by the prosecution, it may introduce testimony in rebuttal showing that efforts have been made by the officers to learn of the existence or whereabouts of such person, and that they were unsuccessful.

7. The fact that witnesses have testified that, in their opinion, a letter offered in evidence by a defendant is genuine, while there is no direct testimony in rebuttal, does not require the court to instruct the jury that they must consider the letter as genuine, where the evidence of the prosecution tends to establish other facts which disprove its genuineness.

8. Where the prosecution claimed that certain instruments executed before the defendant as a notary were forged and fictitious, while defendant testified to their genuineness, the refusal of the court to instruct as to the presumption of genuineness arising from the defendant's certificate as notary was not erroneous, as such presumption added nothing to the positive testimony of defendant, or to the presumption of his innocence, which cast the burden of proof on the prosecution.

9. In a prosecution for uttering a forged draft, where the prosecution had introduced evidence tending to show that the purported drawer had been murdered by defendant previous to the time when the draft was written and uttered, it was proper to refuse to instruct the jury that they should not presume the death of such person, as a circumstance tending to show defendant's guilt, unless such death and defendant's knowledge of it were proven beyond a reasonable doubt; defendant's guilt not being necessarily dependent on such fact, and the jury being entitled to consider the evidence in relation to it in connection with the other evidence, though they might not regard it as established beyond a reasonable doubt.

10. It is improper for a prosecuting attorney to comment in argument on the failure of a defendant to testify upon any particular point.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. R. Webb, Judge.

W. A. Sanders was convicted of forging and uttering a draft, and appeals. Reversed.

Frank H. Short and F. E. Cook, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

HENSHAW, J. W. A. Sanders was indicted for forging the name of William Wootton in a draft upon the Kutner-Goldstein Company for the sum of $1,400, payable to the order of said Sanders, and for uttering and passing the said draft, knowing the same to be false and forged. From the judgment of conviction, and from the order denying him a new trial, he prosecutes these appeals.

[1] Rehearing denied.

The story, as told by the evidence in this case, is extraordinary, and in some respects without parallel. The defendant is a man nearly 60 years of age, who has resided in this state for more than half of his lifetime. For many years he was prominent in educational circles. He had been a teacher in the public schools in different parts of the state. He was well educated, and possessed of much learning, and more than local reputation as an agriculturist, horticulturist, and botanist. He was married, and the father of children, who were growing up about him in his home in Fresno county, where he had resided for many years, and where he seems to have enjoyed, up to the time of these transactions, the universal regard and respect of his fellow men. Wootton was an old man, past 70 years of age, possessed of valuable farming lands lying near the home of Sanders. Wootton was unmarried, and lived upon his land alone, saving for the presence of Charles Rohloff, who was employed as a farm hand. Sanders and Wootton were friends. For some time prior to the date of these occurrences, Sanders represented to Wootton and to others that one John Knausch had in contemplation the purchase of the Wootton land, designing to devote so much of it as was practicable to the culture of citrus fruits. Acting, as he represented, for Knausch, who was in San Francisco or elsewhere, Sanders made an examination of the Wootton land, platted it, showing its sources of water supply, fences, and other improvements, describing the nature of its soil; in short, collating such information as a purchaser unfamiliar with the property would naturally desire to possess. This information he sent by letter to Knausch. Wootton was reluctant to sell, or at least reluctant to sell for any price which Knausch was willing to give. Sanders, by letter, suggested to Knausch that, when he should come to bargain in person with Wootton for the property, it would be well for him to bring $20,000 in gold coin, the sight of which would tend to excite old Wootton, to stimulate his desire to sell, and enable Knausch to secure a better bargain. Knausch being unfamiliar with the Wootton land, Sanders also suggested to him that, when he came, he should not drive directly to the Wootton house, but should drive up a valley to the rear of Wootton's house, and, leaving his vehicle there, cross the steep, high hill which interposed between the valley and Wootton's home; that, by this mode of approach, he would be enabled to take from the top of the hill a comprehensive view of the Wootton property, and thus save much time which would otherwise be spent in travel and inspection.

The matter of these transactions was in agitation for over a year. Upon the 1st day of February, 1894, Sanders was at Wootton's house, whither he had driven, as he says, to await the coming of Knausch, whom he was daily expecting. The hour for the noonday meal had arrived. Rohloff, the farm hand, came in from the field. The noonday meal was eaten, and Rohloff went back to his work, which was that of sowing grain; Sanders agreeing that when he should leave for home, as he proposed to do later in the afternoon, he would bring out to him upon his buckboard some sacks of seed grain. After Rohloff had gone, and when Sanders and Wootton were alone in Wootton's house, John Knausch appeared, accompanied by a man named Graves, the two having crossed on foot by the trail over the hill to the rear of Wootton's house, Knausch carrying with him a stout valise containing $20,000 in gold coin, which would weigh about 73 pounds. The subject of the purchase and sale of the Wootton ranch was speedily broached. There was haggling over the terms and price, when Knausch opened his valise, and began to pour the gold upon the table. Wootton became much interested, told Knausch to keep on piling up the gold, that the table could stand it, and, with visible excitement, exclaimed, "We can trade!" The terms of the transaction were then and there agreed upon. Some papers relating to it had been brought by Knausch in anticipation of effectuating the bargain. Others were prepared upon the spot. The result was that Wootton deeded all of his property to Knausch. Knausch would have nothing to do with any of the land saving that which was fit for citrus culture, and, by an arrangement between him and Sanders, such part of the land as was unsuitable for that purpose was to be conveyed to Sanders, while Sanders, in exchange, was to convey land of his own suitable for such purposes. In addition, there was drawn up and signed by the parties a long agreement, under which the lands were to be planted with citrus-bearing trees, under the direction and management of Sanders, who was to receive a salary for his services as superintendent. Knausch was to tunnel the hills for water for irrigating purposes, and, being a practical miner, was to have charge of that work. The expenses were to be borne equally by the four, saving that Knausch was to lend to Sanders, if necessary, moneys with which Sanders was to furnish his share of the expense. This land was to be deeded to a son of Sanders, because the son was a minor, and was to be redeeded by him to the individual owners, upon demand, after he had attained his majority. Sanders was a notary public. The acknowledgments to each and all of these papers which could have been acknowledged before him were taken before Sanders. In the matter of the deed from Knausch to Sanders, and of Sanders' deed in exchange to Knausch, because Sanders could not acknowledge a deed to himself or from himself, the plan of an intermediary dummy was suggested and adopted. Knausch deeded to one Abbott, a young man of the neighborhood, Sanders taking the acknowledgment to this deed; and he afterwards, and upon Sanders' representations and explanations, deeded the same land to Sanders. Wootton took the $20,000 in gold. For the remaining part of the purchase price, Knausch offered Wootton a check for $25,000. Wootton refused the check, and it was understood that he should accompany Knausch and Graves either to Fresno or to Los Angeles, where the rest of the money would be paid him. The papers were left with Sanders, with directions from all the parties that, if he heard nothing from them to the contrary in the course of a few days, he was to place them on record, which in fact he did. Wootton, dazzled with the sight of the money, and exercised over the transactions of the day, showed an ever-increasing excitement, until he acted, as Sanders said, like a man dazed or in his sleep. Knausch and Graves left the house, walking back over the hill by the trail to the valley where they had left their vehicle, with the understanding that they should drive down the valley to the county road leading to Fresno, while Sanders and Wootton should proceed down the road from Wootton's house until they overtook them, when the four were to make the rest of the journey to Fresno together. Sanders harnessed his mules to his buckboard, loaded the seed grain for Rohloff, and drove down the road, accompanied by Wootton. The money was in a valise at Wootton's feet. The farm hand, Rohloff, had used up his seed grain, and was looking to see whether Sanders was coming with more, when he noticed the buckboard and its two occupants driving hurriedly down the road. When it reached the spot where Sanders was to unload the grain, it was stopped, and, according to the testimony of Rohloff, Sanders climbed over the seat of the buckboard, holding the reins in his hand, and, without dismounting from the vehicle, kicked and thrust the grain off upon the ground, some of the sacks striking a barbed wire fence, which tore them open, and scattered their contents. The buckboard was then driven hurriedly on by Sanders to a gate, which was closed. Here Sanders dismounted, opened the gate, came back, took the reins, which he had placed upon the seat, and, holding the reins as he stood upon the ground, drove through, closed the gate, climbed into the buckboard, and drove off. Rohloff was some distance from the road, but noticed that Wootton, whose habit it was never to leave the ranch without instructing the hired man what to do in his absence, and informing him of the date of his return, upon this occasion sat with his hands in his lap, seemingly staring straight ahead. Sanders testifies that Wootton, in his nervousness and anxiety to get away, said that he did not want to see or speak to anybody, and urged Sanders to hurry up; that the mules were restive, having been without exercise for some days, and took a rapid pace of their own accord. He denies, however, that he drove through the gate, saying that Wootton took the lines himself, and drove through. A mile and a half below the point where the two were thus seen by Rohloff, two men, Wiseman and Record, plowing near the county road, saw Sanders, and recognized him, and testified that he was driving alone. This Sanders denies, insisting that, at the time, Wootton accompanied him. Some miles further on, Sanders was again seen by an acquaintance, Gobin, who testifies that, when he passed him, Sanders was driving alone. This is admitted by Sanders in his testimony, and explained as follows: He said that he drove on with Wootton until they overtook Knausch and Graves; that Wootton, in his nervousness, became exercised over the way in which Knausch was driving the buggy, fearing a breakdown, which would prevent their arrival at Fresno, and insisted upon getting out of Sanders' buckboard, and into Knausch's vehicle, to drive for them. This he did. It was while he was so driving in Knausch's buggy that Sanders, pursuing the journey upon another road, was met and passed by the acquaintance who testified to seeing him alone. Thereafter Wootton returned to Sanders' buckboard, and rode with him. While so riding with him, Sanders, who was much elated at the outcome of the day's work, and at the prospect of receiving $500 commission for effecting the sale, indulged in some jocose remarks to Wootton, such as, "Another milestone is passed, and your money is safe." These remarks roused the old man to great indignation. He declined to travel further with Sanders, and insisted upon dismounting, and getting into the vehicle with Knausch and Graves. This he did, carrying the gold with him. Sanders, realizing from the old man's indignation that it was idle for him to continue the proposed journey to Fresno with them, turned off to his home. This is the last, so far as the evidence goes, that was ever seen of Wootton, even according to the testimony of Sanders. The last statement, however, is to be taken with this reservation: A witness testifies that he saw Wootton in San Francisco on or about the 10th of February, 1894. He is certain that it was Wootton, but not certain of the date.

Of Graves, Sanders himself could tell little, and no one else anything at all. He was a friend of Knausch, whom Sanders had casually met two or three times before. Upon one occasion he recognized Knausch in San Francisco, followed him into a church, and sat in the pew adjoining that occupied by Knausch and his companion, whom he afterwards knew as Graves. The only thing that he remembered was that Graves upon that occasion "made a splendid, good prayer." Concerning Knausch the evidence is much fuller, though not much more satisfactory. Sanders had known him for many years. He had "grub-staked" him in the early days, when Knausch was a miner, and Sanders a school teacher. He had lost track of him until some years before, when Knausch appeared in the section of the country where Sanders resided. He was a tall, dark man, and wore an enormous mustache. Knausch informed Sanders that he had made a good deal of money, and was looking about for an investment in fruit lands. He was with Knausch once in San Diego, and spent the night with him in his room. Upon the occasion of this trip they inspected citrus lands. Knausch was solitary, retiring in deportment, a recluse by habit; seldom, if ever, stopped at hotels; had no fixed abiding place of which Sanders knew; wrote him occasionally, rarely or never directing where the replies should be addressed. Knausch was in the neighborhood of Sanders' home upon one occasion, but would not visit his home, because he had met a woman in Oregon who had formerly worked for defendant, and this woman said that defendant's wife had given him "such a setting out it made him chill." For this reason he never wanted to see defendant's wife, and would not therefore go to defendant's house. One George Sargent testified that in 1884 or 1885 he was introduced to John Knausch by Sanders. The credibility of Sargent's evidence is impeached by the testimony of witnesses who testified that he is unworthy of belief. A. G. Sanders, son of the defendant, 17 years of age, testified that he had seen John Knausch while his mother was East, five, six, or seven years before. There is no other or further evidence of the existence or whereabouts of Knausch or of Graves, saving the testimony of Sanders, to the effect that after these occurrences, and in pursuance of a letter which he had received from Knausch, he went to Mojave, to meet Knausch, Graves, and Wootton. He found neither Knausch nor Wootton, but only Graves, who represented to him that Knausch and Wootton were in the country, looking at mining property. Graves urged him to go with him and join them, but there was an undefinable something about Graves, a suspicious air and bearing, which caused Sanders to mistrust him, without defining why; and, in consequence, Sanders refused to go, and took the next train home. Letters, however, were received by Sanders and others through the United States mail, purporting to come from and to be written by Wootton. The genuineness of these is claimed by the defendant, and disputed by the prosecution.

It was not disputed that Sanders presented and obtained money upon the draft, it being claimed by Sanders that the draft was an inclosure in a registered letter received by him from Wootton, which letter was mailed at San Fernando; that he believed it to be the genuine writing of Wootton, and had no cause or reason to believe otherwise. The expert evidence is, as usual, conflicting; the witnesses for the prosecution testifying that the writing of the draft was not the handwriting of Wootton; others, for the defense, testifying to their belief in its genuineness. It was proved that the letter was, in fact, mailed at San Fernando, but by whom is not established.

The theory and argument of the prosecution is that Knausch and Graves were myths; that Wootton was done to death by Sanders upon the 1st day of February, and his body concealed; that each and all of these acts were part of a preconceived and elaborately executed design to obtain the property, real and personal, of William Wootton. On the 19th of May, 1894, this indictment was presented against the defendant. On May 21, 1894, the defendant was arraigned. Upon March 9, 1895, defendant moved for a postponement and continuance of the trial, upon the ground of the absence of material witnesses, Knausch, Wootton, and Graves. On April 8, 1895, the trial was actually commenced. There had thus elapsed between the date of the indictment and the date of the trial nearly one year, all of which time was available to defendant to procure the attendance of these witnesses. Their importance was known to the defendant and to his counsel. It appears also that the prosecuting officers during this time were making diligent search for them. The failure of both sides thus to learn the whereabouts of these witnesses, and to procure their attendance, gave reasonable cause to believe that no further postponement would secure their attendance, and the court was justified in refusing a continuance.

The draft in question was dated Los Angeles, February 5, 1894. Evidence was introduced by the prosecution, over the objection and exception of the defendant, tending to show that William Wootton, upon February 5, 1894, was dead; that upon the 1st day of February, 1894, he had been murdered by the defendant, Sanders. The point most strongly urged by appellant is that the court erred in admitting this evidence, in that it was evidence of a separate and distinct crime from the one charged in the indictment, and that a defendant may be charged with but one crime in a single indictment, and tried for but one offense thereunder. An indictment, it is true, must charge but one offense; and, generally speaking, evidence of a separate and distinct offense is not admissible in proof of the one charged. Thus, it will not be permitted generally to prove that a defendant committed some other, independent, and distinct crime from the one charged, as the basis of inference and argument that he may have committed the particular one for which he is on trial; for—First, the defendant shall be charged with and tried for but one crime under a single indictment; second, he may and probably will be unprepared to meet with evidence the offense undisclosed by the pleadings; and, third, there being no logical connection between the two offenses, the first does not tend to elucidate or prove any material fact connected with the second, and does tend strongly to distract the minds of the jury from the issue which they are called upon to decide, and to subject the defendant to unjust suspicion and discredit. People v. Jones, 32 Cal. 80. But so far the rule goes, and no further. Carefully as the law guards the rights of a defendant charged with crime, to see that he is not exposed to unwarranted aspersion or attack, it does not extend that care into indulgence. A defendant in a criminal case is treated with fairness, but not with favor. If the evidence of another crime is necessary or pertinent to the proof of the one charged, the law will not thwart justice by excluding that evidence, simply because it involves the commission of another crime. People v Tucker, 104 Cal. 440, 38 Pac. 195. The general tests of the admissibility of evidence in a criminal case are: First. Is it a part of the res gestæ? Second. If not, does it tend logically, naturally, and by reasonable inference to establish any fact material for the people, or to overcome any material matter sought to be proved by the defense? If it does, then it is admissible, whether it embraces the commission of another crime or does not, whether the other crime be similar in kind or not, whether it be part of a single design or not. The commonest instance of the admission of evidence of another crime is where it becomes pertinent to prove the scienter or guilty knowledge under the particular charge. Thus, where a man is charged with passing counterfeit coin, it is allowable, in order to prove his knowledge that the coin was counterfeit, to show that upon other occasions, with knowledge of the false character of the money, he has passed similar coins. In People v. Cunningham, 66 Cal. 668, 4 Pac. 1144, and 6 Pac. 700, 846, in the prosecution of the defendant for the larceny of cattle, to rebut the presumption that the defendant came innocently into the possession of the cattle, it was permitted to be shown that a steer belonging to a third person, which was found in the defendant's possession with the cattle of the complaining witness, was stolen. In People v. Lane, 101 Cal. 514, 36 Pac. 16, where the charge was murder, the defense pleaded insanity, claiming that the deflowering of defendant's daughter by deceased had upset his reason. The people, in rebuttal, were permitted to show that the defendant had committed incest with that very daughter, as combating the view that deceased's acts could have deranged defendant's mind.

In the case at bar it was incumbent upon the prosecution to show that the instrument purporting to be executed by William Wootton was in fact a forgery. One mode by which they undertook to establish this was by evidence that Wootton was dead before the day upon which the instrument bore date. True, this would not conclusively establish the false character of the draft, for a man might postdate such an instrument. Nevertheless, it would be evidence tending to show its false character. Again, it was a proper part of the case of the prosecution to show that the defendant uttered and passed the instrument knowing it to be forged; and if the prosecution could establish to the satisfaction of the jury that Wootton had died before the day upon which the instrument bore date, and that Sanders knew of his death, it would, unquestionably, be strong evidence tending to show that he knowingly passed a forged instrument. But the prosecution, having the undoubted right to prove these things, was not to be deprived of that right merely because the proving of the death involved evidence of the crime of murder against the defendant. The prosecution, in proving the death of Wootton, was entitled to show the manner of his death; and if, in so showing, it was made to appear that he had been foully dealt with, and had come to his end at the hands of the defendant, it was not for that reason to be excluded from the consideration of the jury. The evidence was thus not introduced to besmirch the defendant, or cast unwarranted suspicion upon him. It was necessarily introduced in proof of a material fact, which it was competent for the prosecution to show.

As to the argument of the counsel for the people, of which appellant bitterly complains, it need but be said that, with the evidence properly before the court and the jury, the prosecution was entitled to base thereon any reasonable argument or theory within the legitimate purview of that evidence, being controlled therein by the sound discretion of the court.

For the reasons we have already discussed the evidence of Rohloff, Wiseman, Record, and Gobin, tending to show that on and prior to the 5th day of February, 1894, Wootton was dead, was admissible, even though it also tended to show that he was murdered by Sanders.

It will be remembered that in explanation of the fact that, at the time he was seen by the witness Gobin, he was driving alone, Sanders, in his narration of the events of the day, declares that during that portion of the journey Wootton had left the buckboard, and was riding with Knausch and Graves, over a different road. He further explains that the four met again near the town of Reedley; that Wootton once more took his place in Sanders' buckboard, and the two vehicles and their occupants proceeded along the road together. Defendant sought to introduce the evidence of a witness, Wesley Traver, an acquaintance of defendant, to prove that there and at that time Traver saw Sanders, and was able to identify him and his conveyance; to prove further that he saw another vehicle in company with that of Sanders, and that each of these vehicles contained two men; to prove by general description, if not by exact identification, that the man riding with Sanders was William Wootton; to show the time when the meeting took place, the direction in which the men were traveling; and to afford something of a description of the other two men. Under the circumstances, and under the nature of the evidence which had been brought to bear against Sanders, he should have been allowed the fullest latitude in the matter. The court, however, under objections from the prosecution, refused to admit the evidence of the witness Traver, and left such fragments of it as were admitted in an eviscerated and well-nigh unintelligible condition. Only by setting out in detail the record of the case, disclosing the futile efforts of the defense to present to the jury the evidence of this witness, could the hardship and injury which were worked to the defendant be adequately shown. The following, however, will serve as an example: The witness, having been allowed to testify that he did see Mr. Sanders, is asked: "Q. Who did you first see, Mr. Sanders or the others? Mr. Snow: We object to that as incompetent. Mr. Hinds: Irrelevant for any purpose whatsoever. Mr. Short: Q. What way were they going when you saw them? Mr. Hinds: We object on the ground it is incompetent and irrelevant for any purpose. The Court: Same ruling. Mr. Short: Q. What position were the men in when you saw them,—the three men you have described? Mr. Hinds: We object on the ground it is incompetent and irrelevant for any purpose. The Court: Let the objection be sustained." Considering the claim of the prosecution that in the mile and a half of road which lay between the place where Rohloff saw Wootton and Sanders driving together, and the place where Wiseman and Record, plowing in the field, saw Sanders driving alone, Wootton and all trace of him had disappeared as completely as though he had been whirled to another sphere, the importance to the defendant, Sanders, of evidence, even the slightest, showing or tending to show that after that time Wootton was seen in his company, and in the company presumably of the two men whom the prosecution claims to be myths, is manifest; and no discussion is needed to show the injury which the rulings worked. The language of this court in People v. Myers, 70 Cal. 582, 12 Pac. 719, in reviewing similar rulings of the trial court, may here be appropriately employed: "In other words, if needed in order to more clearly present the ruling: If the evidence offered would tend to show the guilt of the defendants, it was admissible; but, if to show their innocence, it was inadmissible."

Prior Nance and his wife lived in the valley up which Sanders testified that Knausch and Graves drove upon the 1st of February, and in which they tied their team when they crossed on foot over the hills to Wootton's home. Nance and his wife were allowed to testify that they saw no vehicle or men there upon that day. The evidence was admissible. The weight of it was for the jury.

In rebuttal and in disproof of the testimony of Sanders as to the existence and whereabouts of Knausch, the prosecution called as a witness J. Scott, the sheriff of the county, and proved by him that he had made search and inquiry as to the existence and whereabouts of the said Knausch. He testified that he had written letters to people in different parts of the state where Sanders had at one time or another located Knausch; that he wrote to the hotels, livery stables, and prominent men in the southern part of the state; made a trip to Los Angeles and San Bernardino; made a thorough search; "wrote north and to every locality I have heard of his being"; that within the county of Fresno he had inquired of all the old citizens, and at every hotel, livery stable, and railroad ticket office; that he had carried on these investigations all over the state for something over a year; and that during the whole time he had never found a man that had ever heard or known of John Knausch. The prosecution, as part of its case, here undertook to prove a negative,—to prove the nonexistence of John Knausch. As the evidence of the defendant left Knausch a wanderer, without fixed habitation or abode, the only evidence in rebuttal which the people could introduce was evidence that, after diligent investigation and inquiry in every place where the testimony of Sanders located Knausch as having been, no trace of him could be discovered, and to this effect was the evidence of Scott. It may at once be said that the evidence was not conclusive; that, under the circumstances shown, Knausch might still have existed, and yet knowledge of his existence have escaped the inquiries of the officer; but this goes merely to the weight of the evidence, which was exclusively for the jury. Conceding, indeed, that the evidence was slight, it was in its nature the best evidence which the prosecution could bring forward, and how much or how little importance should be attached to it was for the jury alone to say.

The defense introduced in evidence a letter purporting to have accompanied the alleged forged draft, which letter made reference to the draft as an inclosure, and gave directions as to the disposition of the moneys to be obtained upon it. Four witnesses familiar with the handwriting of Wootton testified, for the defense, to their belief that the letter was written and signed by him. Against this no direct opposing evidence was offered by the people. The court refused certain instructions proposed by the defense (Nos. 51 and 52), to the general tenor and effect that the failure of the prosecution to introduce rebutting evidence made it the duty of the jury to treat and consider the letter as written and signed by Wootton. These instructions were properly refused. While there was no expert evidence upon the question of the letter in opposition to that introduced by the defense, other evidence in the case, and, indeed, all of the evidence in the case upon the part of the people, tended to show that it was impossible for the letter to have been written by Wootton. The mere fact that experts were not called in direct rebuttal of the testimony of the defense upon the subject of the letter did not leave the case of the people without any evidence tending to show its fictitious character.

It will be remembered that the notarial certificates to many of the instruments introduced in evidence were executed by the defendant, Sanders, himself a notary public. The defendant offered, and the court refused, certain instructions (Nos. 53, 54, and 55) as to the presumption that public officers properly perform their duties; that a notary public is a public officer; and that the certificate of a notary of the acknowledgment of a deed is prima facie evidence of the facts stated in the certificate. These instructions are sound, as expositions of the law, but they were properly refused by the court in this case. In a civil action the notarial certificate of acknowledgment entitles a deed to be placed of record, and, when thus placed of record, the recordation carries constructive notice to the world. When offered in evidence, the effect of such a deed with its certificate is to shift the burden of proving that it is not a genuine and duly-executed instrument to the side opposing. For this reason it has come to be and is truly said in the law that the notarial certificate is prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated, and of the character of the officer taking the acknowledgment, which character is recited therein. But in this case the burden of proof was always upon the people to show the false and fraudulent character of the instrument, and the presumption of innocence always remained with the defendant until overcome by evidence. It was upon the prosecution to establish to the satisfaction of the jury that the instruments were not genuine. The defendant testified with positiveness that they were genuine. As against the proof required to be established by the people, and the declarations thus made by the defendant himself, the mere presumption of regularity or due execution amounted to nothing. The presumption could neither have added to nor detracted from the weight and effect of defendant's own statements.

Many of the instructions proposed by the defendant and refused by the court were sufficiently covered by those given of the court's own motion. Others, however, were not fully embraced in the instructions given. Defendant's proposed instruction No. 18, as to the reception by the jury of evidence of extrajudicial admissions or confessions, was unobjectionable in law, and should have been given. Instruction No. 40 might also well have been given. Instruction No. 46 declared to the jury that they were not to presume, as a circumstance in the case tending to show that the defendant was guilty of uttering the instrument with knowledge that it was forged, that the said William Wootton was dead at the time the draft was written, passed, or uttered, unless the prosecution had established by the evidence in this case, to their satisfaction, and beyond a reasonable doubt, the fact that he was dead at that time, and that the defendant so knew. Some stress is laid upon the alleged error of the court in refusing this instruction. We think, however, it was properly refused. The jury were not to be debarred from considering this evidence, with all the evidence in the case, because the death of Wootton might not have been proved to their satisfaction beyond a reasonable doubt; for the death of Wootton might not have been, under the evidence and in the view of the jury, necessary to be conclusively established to warrant a verdict. If, however, the jury believed from the evidence that the defendant was not guilty, unless it were proved that Wootton was dead, and that Sanders knew of his death, then, under such a state of the evidence, it would unquestionably be incumbent upon the prosecution to establish the fact of his death, and of defendant's knowledge thereof, beyond and to the exclusion of any reasonable doubt.

We note no other points presented by appellant that seem to call for a special comment, saving the objection to the argument of the district attorney. A book of blank drafts introduced in evidence was claimed by the prosecution to be in a different condition from that in which it was upon a former trial. Defendant was not interrogated upon the subject of the book. The district attorney, in argument, commented upon this, saying that, if it was in the same condition now as it had previously been, the defendant, better than any one, could have explained and testified to that fact. Defendant's failure to testify upon any particular point should not be commented on in argument. People v. McGungill, 41 Cal. 429; State v. Fairlamb (Mo.) 25 S. W. 895.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

In re HOWELL. (Cr. 176.)

PERJURY—STATEMENTS OF OPINION.

A prosecution for perjury cannot be predicated on the testimony of a witness in giving his estimate of the value of certain assets of a bank, where it does not appear that he made any misstatements of facts, or that he did not answer all questions in accordance with his best judgment.

Department 2. Application by John W. Howell for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ granted, and prisoner discharged.

Frank H. Farrar and James F. Peck, for petitioner. F. G. Ostrander, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The petitioner, John W. Howell, after examination before a justice of the peace in the county of Merced, upon a charge of perjury, was held to answer before the superior court of said county upon said charge. He claims that his imprisonment is illegal, in that he was committed to the custody of the sheriff of the county upon the charge of perjury without reasonable, probable, or any cause, and in substantiation of this claim a transcript of all the evidence taken before the committing magistrate is brought before this court for consideration and review. It appears from this evidence that the petitioner was cashier of the Merced Bank. At the time of these occurrences the Merced Bank was in liquidation. The bank commissioners of the state sought to learn whether or not the bank was actually insolvent, or whether, by allowing it to continue in business, it would be able to realize upon its assets, and meet its obligations in the course of business as they fell due. For the purpose of acquiring this information, the said John W. Howell was put under oath by the commissioners, and interrogated as to the condition of the affairs of the bank. There had been prepared and presented to the commissioners a statement of the assets and liabilities of the bank, and as part of the assets there was an item of $176,000 for loans and overdrafts. A statement had likewise been prepared showing in detail the items which composed the $176,000 loans and overdrafts. These items were made up of the names of the bank's debtors, alphabetically arranged, and opposite each name was set down the face value of the indebtedness. The total amounted to the sum of $176,000. The cashier was charged with having falsely sworn that the loans and discounts were of the value of $176,000, "whereas in truth and in fact the value of such loans and discounts was not then and there of the value of $176,000."

The principal witness in support of this charge was J. B. Fuller, one of the bank commissioners. His testimony in chief amounted substantially to this: that with the statement in his hand, showing in detail the debtors of the bank, he interrogated the cashier as to the value of each item on the list, and that the cashier told him that the claims were collectible and good. It is not pretended that the cashier ever swore that the value of the loans and overdrafts was $176,000, but that he made representations, while under oath, to the bank commissioners, that the separate items aggregating $176,000 were good and valid assets. There is nowhere in the record any evidence that the cashier did not answer fully and fairly and in accordance with his best judgment upon the matter of these items. There is no evidence that any of the items were false, or simulated, or manufactured, or that the statements of the cashier were willfully made, and in perversion of the truth, and not in the exercise of his best judgment, however faulty that judgment may have been.

When the evidence of the witness Fuller comes to be analyzed, it abundantly appears that the sum of $176,000 was not accepted as a direct and positive statement, made under oath, by the cashier, of the value of the assets, but that the same was reached in the exercise of a common judgment upon the part of the cashier and of the bank commissioners in estimating the value of these assets. It is quite true that in most cases the information as to the value was derived from the statements of the cashier, but, as has been said, it nowhere appears that the cashier either suppressed the truth or made declarations willfully false, or did anything but express his own opinion and judgment upon the value; and, even after he had so done, many of the items credited as valid assets were so credited in the independent exercise of the judgment of the commissioners. To illustrate: One item was "W. P. Applegate, $3,550.30." Bank Commissioner Fuller is asked: "Q. What value did Mr. Howell place upon that? A. He said it was good after the court decided it was good. It was left with the court. He reported to me just that,—that the court said the bank would have to wait; that they would probably get it. Q. Is that what you call reporting a good asset? A. Yes, I think it is a good asset. Q. If there was a probability of getting it, you would call it a good asset? A. In a bank liquidation, yes. Q. Then, if it was doubtful, you would put it in as good? A. Yes, a doubtful one; yes." It was under these circumstances that this item was marked "Good" by the bank commissioner. Again, the witness is asked, as to a claim of $119.60, what report Howell made as to that, and the answer was that he reported it "good in part; perhaps all. Q. What value did you set on that? A. The full value. Q. That was considered good for all? A. I should say so. It seemed that there was a probability of collecting it." Still again, the witness being interrogated as to certain notes which the cashier told him were in suit, says: "You could not know how the suit was going to be decided. Until it was decided, you could not tell how much you was going to get out of it. When he said a note was in suit, I would put it down good, because you could not say it was bad. Q. Notes that were in suit you would call good? A. Yes, sir. Q. In this statement all the notes reported to you as in suit you put down good? A. Yes, sir; couldn't write it off. You couldn't say it was bad until the court had so decided. Q. Whenever Mr. Howell told you one of these notes was in suit, and might be collected at the end of a lawsuit, you put that down as a good asset? A. For a bank in liquidation, yes." The witness further testified that as to many of the items, amounting in the aggregate to over $10,000, the cashier told the commissioners that he "thought the claims were good." All of these items which the cashier declared that he thought were good were entered by the bank commissioners as collectible assets of full face value.

Numberless other extracts might be made from the evidence showing the nature of the cashier's testimony, and the method by which the bank commissioners reached their conclusion. It would but unduly and unnecessarily extend this consideration to notice them all. One further example, however, should be given: At the close of this examination before the bank commissioners, when the discussion became general upon the question of the bank's solvency, the same witness, Fuller, bears testimony as follows: "The cashier was there, and we talked to him about the solvency of the bank. He said, in so many words, that, with a good season, there would be no doubt of the bank paying every dollar it owed. Q. It was a qualified statement? A. Yes, sir. Q. If they had a good season? A. Yes." The result of it all was, by Fuller's own testimony, that of the items composing the $176,000 the cashier had reported $12,000 to be of no account, and over $14,000 he "thought to be good," while many others, without any concealment or evasion upon the part of the cashier, and under a plain statement of facts, were set down by the commissioners themselves as being good. The only evidence to prove the falsity of the cashier's statement was evidence of other witnesses conversant with the value of real estate, or of the financial standing of the debtors of the bank, who, testifying that they rejected all claims which they did not feel certain were collectible, made the cash value of the assets, as it naturally would be, very much less than the result reached by the bank commissioners, who allowed full value for every item which was not demonstrated to be totally bad. There was in this evidence no reasonable or probable cause for holding the defendant for trial. It appears throughout, as has been said before, that the defendant was giving to the commissioners his judgment upon matters of extreme uncertainty,—the value and collectibility of debts. We do not mean to say that, even in a matter calling for the exercise of judgment, a perjury might not be predicated if one willfully and wickedly and maliciously refrained from exercising and giving expression to the exercise of his best judgment, if in law he was bound so to do. But, in the absence of a showing that there was such a willful failure and refusal to exercise an honest judgment, a charge of perjury could not be successfully maintained. And, moreover, as appears from the quotations above made, the fixed sum of $176,000 was reached quite as much in the exercise of the judgment of the commissioners in determining under the statements of the cashier what they believed to be good assets as from any declaration of the cashier himself. Let the prisoner be discharged.

FISK v. FRENCH. (No. 15,811.)

ATTACHMENT—SUFFICIENCY OF AFFIDAVIT—DISSOLUTION.

1. Where the facts which the statute requires to be stated in an affidavit for attachment are not so stated, the attachment should be dissolved, even though such requisite facts are alleged in the complaint.

2. In an action on notes, in which an attachment was issued, where the petition shows that one of the notes was secured by an assignment of corporation stock as collateral security, and the affidavit for attachment falsely states that the notes have not been secured by any mortgage or lien on real or personal property, or any pledge on personal property, the attachment will be dissolved.

3. The defect in the affidavit is not cured by an amendment to the petition stating the fact that such note was secured by the assignment of stock as collateral, that the collateral was sold in accordance with the contract, and the proceeds credited on the note, and that a balance stated remains due and unpaid thereon.

Action by Asa Fisk against J. B. French on four notes, in which an attachment issued and levied. From an order discharging the attachment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

P. L. Benjamin and Daniel Titus, for appellant. Knight & Heggerty, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Appeal from an order discharging an attachment in an action on four promissory notes,—the first for $30, dated December 5, 1891; the second for $40, dated March 25, 1892; the third for $100, dated April 12, 1892; and the fourth for $238.58, dated November 17, 1892,—the first and last two drawing compound interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per month, and the second like interest at the rate of 2½ per cent. per month. Neither the substance nor legal effect of any one of the notes was stated in the body of the complaint, but a copy of each note was attached to the complaint, and therein referred to as an exhibit. Immediately under the note of November 18, 1892, for $238.58, was written an assignment by defendant to plaintiff of 100 shares of Belcher mining stock, "as collateral security for the payment" of the last-mentioned note, and an authorization of plaintiff to sell the stock at public or private sale, with or without notice, in case of default in payment of principal or interest of that note, and to apply the net proceeds of the sale to the payment of the last-mentioned note, and the surplus, if any, to the payment of any other obligations of defendant to plaintiff which might be held by the latter at the time of such sale.

The following is a copy of the affidavit for attachment: "State of California, City and County of San Francisco—ss.: Asa Fisk, being duly sworn, says: That he is the plaintiff in the above-entitled action; that the defendant, J. B. French, in the said action, is indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of three hundred and seventy-six and $^{38}/_{100}$ dollars, gold coin of the United States, over and above all legal set-offs and counterclaims, upon an express contract, for the direct payment of money, to wit, four promissory notes, and that such contracts were made and are payable in this state, and that the payment of the same has not been secured by any mortgage or lien upon real or personal property, or any pledge upon personal property. That the said attachment is not sought, and the said action is not prosecuted, to hinder, delay, or defraud any creditor or creditors of the said defendant. Asa Fisk." After the writ of attachment had been issued and levied, defendant moved, on the complaint, affidavit for attachment, and other papers on file, to discharge the attachment, upon the ground that the affidavit upon which the attachment was issued is false in the statement therein that the payment of the notes had not been secured by any mortgage, lien, or pledge upon personal property; and is otherwise insufficient in that it does not state that the collateral security appearing on the face of the complaint had become valueless without any act of the plaintiff, nor even allude to that security. When the motion to discharge the attachment came on to be heard, the plaintiff, by leave of the court, amended the fourth count of his complaint (founded on the note dated November 17, 1892) by substituting for the second paragraph thereof the following: "(2) That plaintiff has ever since been, and now is, the owner and holder of the said note. That to secure the payment of the said sum of $238.58, and the interest thereon, according to the terms of said promissory note, the said defendant did, on the 17th day of November, 1892, assign and transfer to said plaintiff one hundred shares of the capital stock of the Belcher Mining Company, with full power and authority in said plaintiff to sell the stock at any time after the note became due, without notice to said defendant, at public or private sale, at plaintiff's option, and to apply the net proceeds of the said sale of said stock to the payment of the said principal sum and the interest thereon, according to the terms of the note. That after the said principal sum and interest became due, and on, to wit, the 17th day of February, 1893, the said plaintiff, under the said authority and power, sold the said capital stock so pledged to him as aforesaid by said defendant, and realized from the said sale the sum of $74 net; and the said plaintiff applied the sum of $74 in payment of the interest then due, amounting to $14.62, and the balance thereof, amounting to $59.38, on said principal. That the interest has been paid on the said note to February 17, 1893, and the sum of $59.38 has been paid on account of the principal of the said note, and that no other payments have been made on the said note, and the sum of $179.20 of the principal of said note, together with the interest thereon from the 17th day of February, 1893, is now due, owing, and unpaid by defendant to plaintiff." I think the court did not err in discharging the attachment. The amendment of the complaint did not supply or cure the defects in the affidavit for the attachment; but, on the contrary, incontestably proved that it was false in the material statement that the payment of the notes had not been secured by any mortgage, lien, or pledge upon personal property, and that it was fatally deficient, in that it failed to state that the security had become valueless. What the statute requires to be stated in the affidavit must be stated, and truly stated, in the affidavit; and, if not stated in the affidavit, the attachment should be dissolved, even though the requisite facts, omitted in the affidavit, are alleged in the complaint. Complaints on contracts for the direct payment of money generally and necessarily state nearly all the facts required to be stated in an affidavit for attachment in actions on such contracts; yet the statement of such facts in the complaint alone does not satisfy the requirement of the statute that they must be expressly and directly stated in the affidavit for an attachment. The case of Hathaway v. Davis, 33 Cal. 168, has no bearing on the question under consideration. In that case there was no pretense that the affidavit was defective in any respect.

If the views above expressed are correct, it is unnecessary to consider the other questions argued by counsel. I think the order should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order is affirmed.

BURRIS v. LANDERS et al. (S. F. 48.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 18, 1896.)

TRIAL—FINDINGS BY COURT—RESPONSIVENESS TO ISSUE—PAROL GIFTS OF LAND—ENFORCEMENT IN EQUITY—PROMISE TO MAKE GIFT—WHEN ENFORCED.

1. A complaint which alleges that defendant's intestate, in his lifetime, made a parol gift "in relation and in respect to" certain land, whereby "he promised and agreed," if plaintiff would go into possession, to make a deed on demand; that plaintiff subsequently took possession, and made valuable improvements; and that intestate died without making a conveyance, etc.,—does not plead an attempted gift, defective in form, which equity will perfect, but alleges merely a promise to make a gift, the execution of which was never attempted by the donor; and a finding that intestate made a gift to plaintiff is without the issues.

2. A parol gift of real estate in præsenti will be enforced in equity against the donor or his representatives, if the donee enters into possession, and makes valuable and permanent improvements.

3. One who enters into possession of land in reliance on the owner's verbal promise to give him a deed on demand, and makes permanent improvements, exceeding the rental value of the premises, may enforce such promise, in equity, against the promisor or his legal representatives.

Action by Butler Burris against Amy Landers and another, administrators of the estate of Michael Landers, to enforce a verbal promise by defendant's intestate to convey real estate. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

J. W. Carter and Adams & Adams, for appellants. Andrew Thorne, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The appeal is from the judgment, taken within 60 days after its rendition. The evidence is brought up for review by a bill of exceptions. The action was brought by plaintiff against Amy Landers as administratrix, and William J. Landers as administrator, of the estate of Michael Landers, deceased. The complaint charged that Michael Landers was upon the 16th day of April, 1883, the owner of a certain piece of land,—a lot with 25 feet frontage by 90 feet in depth, situated upon Shotwell street, in the city and county of San Francisco, upon which had been erected a dwelling house. It then averred "that in consideration of long-continued, faithful services of plaintiff to said Michael Landers, on said 16th day of April, 1883, and in his lifetime, the said Michael Landers made a parol gift in relation and in respect to said lot of land and the improvements thereon, whereby the said Landers promised and agreed to and with this plaintiff that if he (this plaintiff) would go into the possession and occupancy of said land and premises, hereinafter described, he (the said Landers) would at any time thereafter, upon demand, when so requested, make a good and sufficient deed to this plaintiff of the legal title thereto; that on said day, and subsequent to said agreement, and previous to the death of said Landers, this plaintiff, with the knowledge, consent, and concurrence of said Landers, took possession of said lot and premises, and made lasting and valuable improvements thereon, paid the state, city, and county taxes thereon, and all charges for street improvements; that said Michael Landers died as aforesaid on the 20th day of October, 1886, seised of the legal title to said lot of land, without having made a conveyance thereof to this plaintiff." A decree was sought compelling the representatives of Landers, deceased, to execute a conveyance to plaintiff of the property in question.

It is claimed that the action is one in which the aid of a court of equity may be invoked to compel due execution of a parol gift of land, but the complaint does not sufficiently state a cause of action for this purpose. It does not aver a gift of the land, but "a gift in relation and in respect to said lot of land, whereby the said Landers promised and agreed to make a good and sufficient deed to plaintiff upon demand." Under the complaint, which must govern plaintiff's right of recovery, a case is not pleaded of an attempted gift, defective in form, which, to prevent injustice upon the donee, equity will perfect. It is an effort simply to enforce a promise to make a gift, the execution of which was never attempted to be completed by deceased in his lifetime. The cases are numerous, and the rule may be considered well settled that where a parol gift of real estate is made in præsenti, and the donee has entered under the gift, and has made permanent and valuable improvements upon the realty, and the circumstances are such that it would be an injustice upon the donee if he were thereafter to be deprived of the property by reason of imperfections in the gift, equity will treat the acts of the donor, together with the acts of the donee, as being such performance of the gift as will relieve the contract from the operation of the statute of frauds, and it will, under such circumstances, lend its assistance to the perfection of the donee's title. Thornt. Gifts, par. 372 et seq. That, however, is not the case here pleaded, and the finding of the trial court that upon the 16th day of April, 1883, Landers made a gift of the property to Burris, is without the issues.
